TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Persecution still rampant in Italy.

A WP wire from Rome states: Despite representations made to the Italian government last October over the interference of the police with Protestant church groups, the persecution continues. The Pentecostal Temple at Messina is watched day and night by the police, who prevent the sect's leader from entering to withdraw the Bible and prayer-books. Meetings are dispersed. When the group hired an eminent attorney to present its case to the County Attorney, the latter expressed the view that a magistrate would have to decide on an acquittal if the Pentecostals were brought before a court. The authorities, however, do not enter written records of the suppressions, thus making a legal appeal impossible.—"The Sentinel, Toronto", 2/8/53.

Persecution in Colombia.

The Fourth General Assembly of the Evangelical Confederation of Colombia met from August 10th to 14th, and authorised the following official statements. In 1948 there were 213 Protestant churches and chapels, but during the past five years of persistent persecution, 42 have been destroyed by fire or dynamite, 31 other buildings used for worship have been damaged, and ten buildings have been confiscated. During the same period 110 Protestant primary schools have been closed, 54 by order of the Government and the remainder by mob violence. A million children in Colombia lack any public school facilities, and owing to sabotage 3,343 Protestant children are deprived of the privilege of education. Since 1948, 51 Colombian Protestants have been murdered; National Police and Government officials were instrumental in 28 of these murders. The Government is insisting that Catholic priests shall be appointed as chaplains of non-Romanist schools—one such Presbyterian school has 662 girl students. It is a common experience for Evangelical Christians to be attacked while at worship in Church, or in their houses. Protestantism, however, is progressive. The Word of God, as preached for the first time to the Colombians, reveals the meaning of salvation by faith in the SAVIOUR and wins response. It is computed that 50,000 Colombians and 750 non-Colombians attend Protestant services every week. The total Protestant constituency in the country is conservatively estimated at 100,000 people. But our Protestant brethren are worthy of our prayers and sympathy as the following facts seriously emphasise.—"The Christian", 11/9/53.

R.C. Prelate Sees Brazilian Youth Deserting Faith.

A Roman Catholic youth leader in Sao Paulo, Brazil, Msgr. Tavora, declared recently that his country's young people have become "tremendously unChristianized", a situation he sees as reflecting a world-wide tendency.

Msgr. Tavora made the statement in his address to a conference of Roman Catholic Working Youth of South America. He pointed out that although 90 per cent of Brazilian youth are baptised, only about 4 per cent practise the "Roman Catholic religion". The others, he concluded, live in "deep religious ignorance".—"The Sentinel, Toronto", 2/7/53.

Former Priests in Germany.

Bielefeld, Germany.—Twenty of some thirty former Roman Catholic priests, now serving as pastors of congregations in the Evangelical Church of Germany, met in a special conference at the Benshiem Institute of Denominational Science here, it was announced by "Evangelische Presse-dienst", official news bulletin of the Evangelical Church in Germany.

According to "Evangelische Pressedienst", the conference discussed "The Reformation's rediscovery of Scripture", ways to familiarise congregations more intimately with the Bible, biblical research problems, and other related issues.

A special feature of the conference, "Presse-dienst" added, was the recital of the experiences that led some of the former priests to become evangelical pastors.—"The Churchman".

Religious Liberty in Italy.

The true nature of the Roman system has ever been exhibited in its treatment of the Waldensian Church, whose heroic faithfulness to the Word of God through centuries of cruel persecution deserves to be more widely known.

Presiding at the annual meeting of the English Committee, held at Livingstone Hall, the Bishop of Rochester recalled that one hundred years ago these sturdy Protestants began to receive something like religious toleration, and in 1948 they believed that it was secured to them in the new Constitution, which provided that all churches were free to practise their own religion.

But the restrictive clauses of the Vatican Concordat were not repealed, and to-day they were being applied with more vigour than in Fascist days.

As the people were led to believe that the only alternative to Romanism was Communism, it was easy to cast suspicion upon the Waldenses and to class them as atheists. The London Committee valued the help of the World's Evangelical Alliance. Through it they would be able to make representations to the World Council of Churches, and through them to the United Nations, with regard to the intolerance suffered by Protestants in Italy to-day, and thus to have the matter dealt with on the highest level.

The Waldensian Church needed our prayers, that amid all the difficulties it might be kept spiritually minded and missionary hearted, and our practical help, without which they could not extend their work of evangelism.

Pastor Paolo Marauda, of Pomaretto, who for two months had been engaged in deputation work in England, expressed the gratitude of the Waldensian Church for the practical sympathy of Christians in Britain. True to its ancient motto, "Light Shineth in Darkness", the Waldensian Church sought to bring the light of the Gospel to the Italian people, who were steeped in ignorance and superstition.

Religious liberty for any church, other than the Roman Catholic, did not exist. New churches or halls could not be opened without a permit from the police, which it was difficult to obtain; open-air meetings were forbidden, except by special permission, and all Protestant pastors had to be approved by the police. Recently the Cardinal of Milan asked the Italian Government to restrict Protestant work on the pretext that it destroyed national unity.

Despite the difficulties, however, the witness of the Waldensian Church was spreading, and through the testimony of individuals new congregations were springing up in various parts of the country, for whom special responsibility was felt.—"English Churchman".

Battle of the Books.

Two objectives are attributed to Catholic apologists by the periodical: "One is to prevent the public libraries from buying books which the Roman Catholic hierarchy disapproves; the other is, if public libraries do buy (such) books . . . employees . . . who are Roman Catholics are directed to see that these books are not put out on the shelves where the public can inspect them, but to secrete them, and when they are asked for, to say that they are 'out' . . . The principle of trying to suppress the sale and reading of books distasteful to the Roman Catholic hierarchy is violative of our Bill of Rights."

Here is the story of an R.C. organisation which has been established for this very purpose. In the valley of St. Louis (U.S.A.) an organisation has been created by R.C. Father James Keller, entitled "The Christophers", to combat among other things fundamental damage done to R.C. truth by books in libraries.

The Christophers, which he heads, work as individuals. They take out no membership, pay no dues, attend no meetings. The "holy" father hopes, so he says, to enlist a million persons as Christophers who will carry his preaching into the market-place.

In further describing Priest Keller's activities, the bulletin said: "The Christophers published a manual on 'Library Work: Arsenal of Ideas', with detailed instructions on how 'public' librarians of Roman Catholic persuasion should prevent or discourage the reading of books disapproved by their church, and actively work to place pro-Catholic books in borrowers' hands."

Here is an excerpt from the August issue of "The Christian Register", which exhorts all Roman Catholic "public" librarians to follow the example of one "alert, experienced Christopher librarian . . . who was responsible for changing the location of certain questionable books on prominent display in the local branch of the library where she worked and putting, in their stead, volumes of sound content. . . ." Another passage (in "The Christian Register") declares that a Christopher librarian will "discourage books that are likely to confuse and degrade the reader—books, for example, like Rousseau's 'Emile', a volume which did more to undermine the religious philosophy of education than any book within memory".

A number of standard works, such as "The Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire" by Gibbon, and Green's "History of England", were, as far back as 1895, deleted of material which did not please the Romanist.—"The Churchman".

We would be glad to hear, with a view to making public, from anyone who has had occasion to make use of our own Public Lending Library who has had similar experiences and discovered exactly the same Roman Catholic Action technique. Such evidence would demonstrate that R.C. Action is identical in all freedom-loving countries. The policy of the R.C. hierarchy is apparently to capture all such positions as can exercise any control on the selection and lending of books.—Quoted from "The Herald of His Coming" by "The Vigilant", Melbourne. 15/6/'53.

"Position of Protestants in Ireland."

Professor W. B. Stanford addressed a meeting of the Criterion Club in the Grosvenor Hotel, Dublin, on "The Position of Protestants in Ireland". He referred to the name of the club, and asked what were the criteria of Protestantism. In reply, he said that, although some people in this country would say that nationality, politics or class were the criteria, and although the Gaelic name for Protestant was Sassenach, none of these had any bearing on Protestantism, which was international and embraced all shades of opinion and class.

Protestantism was not a negative religion simply protesting against abuses, but rather was it a positive one, deriving its name from the Latin word, protestari—to bear witness for. The criteria of Protestantism were faith, worship and conduct based on the authority of the Bible and the rights of individual conscience.

Professor Stanford, in mentioning the Protestant patriots, said that an evening could be spent in dealing with the Protestant contribution to Ireland, even the Protestant Ascendancy having left its imprint on the country in the form of hospitals, houses, stately buildings and educational centres.

In Republic.

Turning to the present Protestant position in the Republic, Professor Stanford stated that many Protestants had two fears which he would call external fear and internal fear, the external being the alarm felt at the activities of pressure groups and consequently of religious persecution, whilst the internal was the fear of dying out.

The fear of persecution was groundless as the majority of the Irish people were too tolerant and fairminded to countenance the oppression of a minority for its religious beliefs, and he paid tribute to the fair treatment received by the minority in the Republic. The fear of dying out was, also, baseless, and the position would now appear to be brighter as there had been an increase, at the last Census, in the number of Protestant children in the group from one to five years of age; Protestant schools were now thriving; in some parts of the country, schools which had been closed had been re-opened; and there were more children in the average Protestant family. He was looking forward to the 1956 Census, as it was his opinion that an increase in the Protestant population would be revealed.

In the field of politics, said Professor Stanford, Protestant young men and women were taking a greater part in the public life of the country. They were joining the major political parties and offering themselves as candidates at national and local elections.

In conclusion, he urged full co-operation between the religious majority and minority, from which only good could come.—"Irish Times", 26/11/'53.

Wife Deserted Her Protestant Husband.

The story of a wife's decision not to live with her Protestant husband unless they got re-married in a Roman Catholic church, and promised to have their child and any future children they might have brought up in that faith, was told in the Northern Ireland High Court, recently.

The Husband, Constable Robert Fraser, R.U.C., Orient Circle, Lurgan, was granted a decree nisi of divorce against Mary Ellen Fraser (nee O'Connor), described as a cook, c/o Mrs. Mary O'Connor, Garvey, Legge's P.O., Co. Fermanagh. The husband was also granted custody of the child of the marriage. The suit was undefended.

Constable Fraser said that he was married to Mary O'Connor, a Roman Catholic, in Nelson Memorial Presbyterian Church, Belfast, on March 4th, 1947. He continued to attend his own church, but his wife did not go to any church. The marriage was very happy until 1950, when his wife's brother died following an accident, and witness and his wife went to Garvey to attend the funeral.

His wife remained with her mother. Later, he received a letter from her which said: "Now, after Pat's death, I see my position more clearly. My conscience is not happy, because I did not carry out the laws of the Catholic Church. I cannot see my way to return to you unless we get married in the Catholic Church and give certain definite promises that the child will be brought up in the Catholic religion, and any future children we might have. If you do not want to do this, then I cannot possibly go back to you."

"If you read the book I am sending, you will see, and you will understand, why I feel this way about the whole affair. Living with you in the present state means that I am giving up the religion into which I was born. You ought to know that the Catholic Church is the one and only Church founded by Christ. This book will help you to become a Catholic, and everything will

MR. FULTON OURSLER AND ST. PETER.

A couple of months ago we drew the attention of our readers to the way in which the late Mr.

Oursler had been augmenting the history of St. Paul as told in Acts. That rewriting of the sacred narrative appeared in the American "Collier's Magazine".

Now we find more of Mr. Oursler's creative writing in an English Magazine "Woman's Illustrated". We suppose that paper goes into a large number of homes in Protestant England, and that it has an interest in religion is shown by brief devotional articles which are supplied by the well-known mission preacher of the Church of England, Canon Bryan Green, Rector of Birmingham. It is likely that many readers of "Woman's Illustrated" will peruse Mr. Oursler's work with the assumption that all he says can be found in the New Testament. His subject is "St. Peter". He tells us what St. Peter looked like—"He was a big man, with a head round as a globe, and with the prominent jaws of a fighter." The evidence for this portrayal is not the record of the "Acts of the Apostles"—reference is made to an early third century bronze medallion showing Peter with this kind of head. How far it is likely to be an authentic portrait (200 years after Peter's death) we leave to our readers to decide. As to St. Peter's height: well, we know St. Paul was small, or are justified in concluding that he was from his own statement of the unimpressiveness of his bodily presence, so by contrast no doubt St. Peter has to be big! The Prince of the Apostles must surely have been a commanding figure.

However, Mr. Oursler did not intend to cast St. Peter altogether in heroic mould, so he describes him in passing as "the flat-footed fisherman" maybe he was: we don't know and therefore we wouldn't say so. But perhaps "flat-footed" means something different in the United States. Anyway the Evangelists throw no light on the matter (in our sense of the phrase).

At the time Our Lord called Peter, Mr. Oursler says "Peter had a house, a home, a family: a mother-in-law; he had been married". Why not say "He had a wife" or "He was married"? The phrase Mr. Oursler uses may imply that Peter had lost his wife, and was a widower. It is not thought fitting in some quarters, we believe, to draw attention to the fact that the first Pope (like many others) was a married man. Mr. Oursler may not have intended to imply this, but the phrase is odd.

Peter's mundane occupation is described—"a fisherman, casting drift-nets to snare in the coolness of night the herring, the pilchard, the mackerel". We are not familiar with the science of ichthyology (study of fishes) and so cannot say if these common salt-water fishes are the usual catch in the lake of Galilee. The genus "Clupea" to which herrings and pilchards belong is not listed in the Encyclopædic Britannica among the fishes in the lake of Galilee.

* * *

As to Peter's special status among the apostles—"Peter could not disguise from himself the special place Jesus had invariably given him". But what evidence of special leadership and primacy does the New Testament reveal? Paul who "withstood Peter to the face", and was "no whit behind the chiefest of the apostles" can scarcely have known of Peter's standing. Peter in one of his epistles calls himself "a fellow-elder" with those whom he addresses.—(See "Woman's Illustrated" 21st Nov. '53).

The Day of Pentecost.

The account of this event is captioned by the words "And Peter said to them, 'Do penance and be baptised . . . and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost'". It is a pity that the words of Peter were allowed to appear in this improper form in an English Magazine. Peter did not say "Do penance", but "Repent". That is a very different thing: "Do penance" suggests something developed centuries after as a piece of church discipline. The Douay mistranslation ought not to oust the correct words of England's historic and trustworthy Authorised Version.

Writing of the crowd at Pentecost Mr. Oursler says "To them Peter was to preach the first sermon of the Church . . . All the great features of the Church of which he was now the earthly head were, through inspiration of the spirit taking shape in Peter's mind and heart—the Mass, Holy Communion, Confession, Ordination, the other sacraments and their attendant ceremonies all fusing into outward signs of inner grace."

The very innocent reader who is ignorant of the New Testament might accept this. We think it very wrong to circulate such baseless propaganda. What went on in Peter's mind is unknown to Mr. Oursler and to us: but it is St. Paul who guides us about Holy Communion (there is no such thing in the New Testament as "mass" apart from Communion). The other things particularised by Mr. Oursler make impressive reading, but only for those who know nothing of Christian origins. The only sacraments there are, i.e. Holy Baptism and Holy Communion were instituted as to matter and as to form by Our Lord, and no other. It is highly imaginative indeed to say that Peter planned "the attendant ceremonies". No Roman Catholic liturgical scholar would venture on such an assertion, and no student of Church history can regard Mr. Oursler as other than a partisan.

A writer who can tell us the colour of St. Peters' hair (tawny) must have had sources of information unknown to the world of historical scholarship—perhaps from such sources he learnt the things we regard as "wrongly dividing the word of truth"—(See "Woman's Illustrated" 25th Nov. 1953).

EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS

Summary of Calvin's Commentary.

Chapter 3, Verse 14:—"For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ . . ." "His prayers are mentioned to excite them to pray in the same manner; for the seed of the word is scattered in vain, unless the Lord render it fruitful by his blessing. Let pastors learn from Paul's example not only to admonish and exhort these people, but to entreat the Lord to bless their labours, that they may not be unfruitful."

"We are thus enabled to refute the slanders of Roman Catholics and Pelagians, who argue that if the grace of the Holy Spirit performs the whole work of enlightening our minds, and forming our hearts to obedience, all instruction will be superfluous. The only effect of the enlightening and renewing influences of the Holy Spirit is, to give to instruction its proper weight and efficacy that we may not be blind to the light of heaven, or deaf to the strains of truth."

Verse 16:—"That he would grant you to be strengthened with might by his spirit"—"Paul wishes that the Ephesians should be strengthened; And yet he had already bestowed on their piety no mean commendation. But believers have never advanced so far as not to need further growth. The highest perfection of the Godly in this life is an earnest desire to make progress. The strengthening is the work of the Spirit so that it does not proceed from man's own ability. The increase as well as the commencement of everything good in us comes from the Holy Spirit. That it is the gift of Divine Grace is evident from the expression used, 'that he would give to you'. This the Papists utterly deny. They maintain that the second grace is bestowed upon us, accordingly as we have individually deserved it, by making a proper use of the first grace. But let us unite with Paul in acknowledging that it is the gift of the grace of God, not only that we have begun to run well, but that we advance; not only that we have been born again, but that we grow from day to day."

Verse 17:—"That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith"—"The method by which so great a benefit is obtained is expressed. What a remarkable commendation is here bestowed on faith, that by means of it the Son of God becomes our own. By faith we possess and enjoy him as Saviour. This deserves our careful attention. Most people consider fellowship with Christ and believing in Him the same thing; but the fellowship we have with Christ is the consequence of faith. In a word, faith is not a distant view, but a warm embrace of Christ, by which he dwells in us, and we are filled with the divine Spirit."

"That ye may be rooted and grounded in love"—"The firmness and constancy of our love are pointed out by two metaphors. There are many persons not wholly destitute of love; but it is easily removed or shaken, because its roots are not deep. Paul desires it to be rooted and grounded, thoroughly fixed in our minds, so as to resemble a well-founded building or deep planted tree."

"May be able to comprehend"—"By those dimensions (height, breadth, length, depth) Paul means nothing else than the love of Christ, of which he speaks. The love of Christ contains within itself the whole wisdom, the complete perfection of all wisdom. The metaphor is borrowed from mathematicians, taking the parts as expressive of the whole. Almost all men are infected with the disease of desiring to obtain useless knowledge. It is of great importance that we should be told what is necessary for us to know, and what the Lord desires us to contemplate. The love of Christ is held out to us as the subject which ought to occupy our daily and nightly meditations. He who is in possession of this alone has enough. Beyond it there is nothing solid, nothing useful—though you survey the heaven and the earth and the sea you will never go beyond this without overstepping the lawful boundary of wisdom."

"Which surpasseth knowledge . . ."—"No man can approach God without being raised above himself and above the world." On this ground the sophists refuse to admit that we can know with certainty that we enjoy the grace of God; for they measure faith by the perception of the bodily senses. But Paul contends that this wisdom exceeds all knowledge. Let us remember that the certainty of faith is knowledge, but is acquired by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, not by the acuteness of our own intellect."

* * *

"That ye may be filled . . ."—"Paul now expresses what he meant by the various dimensions. He who has Christ has everything necessary for being made perfect in God; for this is the meaning of the phrase 'the fulness of God'."

EDITOR'S CHAIR.

"WHY I AM NOT A ROMAN CATHOLIC."

We may regard it as an encouraging sign that recently members of the Anglo-Catholic party in the Church of England have been protesting against the claims and some of the doctrines of the Roman Catholic faith. Too long and too often that party, or energetic members of it, have been fellow-travellers with Rome. Of course when men have been bewitched by "New-Catholic" ideas derived from the Middle Ages and the Council of Trent, they have very readily turned their backs on old Catholic Christianity which they always had. When it was sought "to recapture the Catholic heritage of the Church of England" much blundering went on as to what was "Catholic", and the standard was too often "Roman Catholic". Hence, some went in for "western" ideas, ceremonies, and doctrines. Others were attracted by Eastern Christianity which, whatever its practices in devotion, did not affirm any creed but the old Catholic creed of the early church. It would have nothing to do with modern (or Trent) dogmas.

Outside of these still stand those who are content with the Church of England's position in doctrine and observance. Being somewhat old-fashioned and conservative they are seldom heard above the noise of their more temperamental colleagues. Perhaps if the laity expressed a general opinion it would be that if the Church of England returned to its own true character as set out in the Book of Common Prayer, preface and contents, they would be well-satisfied.

Admittedly there have been some "anti-Romanists" among Anglo-Catholics. Bishop Charles Gore in his day published an answer to Roman claims. So did Dr. Littledale ("Plain Reasons"), and others. But we fear that a Protestant stand is not likely to commend itself to the majority.

Nevertheless we have before us a small book "Why I am not a Roman Catholic" by K. N. Ross, Vicar of All Saints' Church, Margaret St., London (Mowbray's 7/6). In 119 pages Mr. Ross gives his reasons for not being a Roman Catholic. In view of them he might fittingly have called his book "Why I am a Protestant".

Mr. Ross begins with a quotation from a statement of the present Archbishop of Canterbury—"We have no doctrine of our own, we only possess the Catholic doctrine of the Catholic Church enshrined in the Catholic creeds; and those creeds we hold without addition or diminution." These words state the simple truth of the official position of the Church of England, as in the Articles and Prayer Book. We have repeatedly pointed out that we produced no new doctrines at the Reformation: we only got rid of errors and accretions. The old doctrines, permitted, as a result, to shine clearly may have appeared new, but they were not. Changes of method and organisation may have been new in some degree or other, but the Reformers invented no new teachings, neither Luther, nor Cranmer nor Calvin. We have often told Roman Catholics that they believe all that we believe: that they have only to get rid of man-made doctrines, and not to learn anything new.

So with his quotation from the Archbishop of Canterbury Mr. Ross makes a good start. He observes that "the Roman Catholic Church bitterly attacks us, and devotes a good deal of energy to seeking to persuade Anglicans to transfer their allegiance". Hence he sets out to show why he is precluded from becoming a Roman Catholic. He goes further: he attempts to explain reasons "which should cause a Roman Catholic to consider seriously whether regard for truth does not require him to leave a branch of the Church which asserts unsubstantiated claims to a monopoly of the truth".

"There are many members of the Church of England who are very reluctant to wound Roman Catholic susceptibilities. But the time has come when regard for truth demands plain speaking, and 1950 has come as a rude shock to those who thought that a minimising interpretation of the Vatican decree of 1870 together with some reconsideration of the decision about Anglican Orders, might lead in the not distant future to reunion."

In these words of Mr. Ross we see a point of view which does him credit. We have no wish to wound Roman Catholic susceptibilities, and we think that fair statement of honest differences is not likely to do so. We would be sorry to hurt any from whom we differ. We note also in this passage another point of view we strongly dissent from, when we read that a minimising interpretation of 1870 decree of Papal Infallibility and a reconsideration of Pope Leo XIII's decision that Anglican Orders are null would have been enough for the reunion of England and Rome had it not been that in 1950 the dogma of the Assumption was declared to be a revealed truth.

How can reunion be considered unless Rome changes a great deal more, or the Church of England rescinds the Thirty-nine Articles? Can two churches unite when one calls the most solemn and characteristic observances of the other "blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits"? Can they unite as long as one calls the other heretical?

Re-union is only possible where there is first, reformation, and then recognition that the Rule of Faith is Holy Scripture. Papal Infallibility and Validity of Orders are not the whole area of disagreement. Reunion is not, and never was, as simple an issue as that.

What seems to us extraordinary is that a person who believes that The Blessed Virgin's body was taken up into heaven should object strongly to that belief becoming an article of faith. Mr. Ross writes—"It is not that the doctrine of the Assumption itself is fervently disbelieved; rather it is that even those who believe most firmly in the Assumption are outraged by the violence done to Scripture and history in the proclamation that it is part of the deposit of faith communicated to the Apostles and always believed implicitly or explicitly by the church from the earliest times."

It seems to us that if a man believes in the Assumption it is part of his Christian faith, so why should he object to its being declared so? It is far more satisfactory from an Anglican standpoint to set the belief aside as an opinion for which there is no evidence.

As to "those who believe most firmly . . .", "being outraged" etc., we ask "who are they?" and "where are they?". We should have thought that those who believe in the Assumption are Roman Catholics, and that they welcomed the dogma. Where they are in loyal communion with the Pope. If believers were "outraged", it is odd that we have never heard of any secessions from the Roman Catholic Church for this reason since 1950. The hope that there might be seceders proved a vain one.

Mr. Ross examines the reasons for going over to Rome. He finds answers usually given—"Roman Catholics know what they stand for"—he resents the implication that Protestants do not.

There is the attraction of the supernatural: we hear about Lourdes etc., and we see that the Roman Catholic Church believes in saints. He replies that "sanctity is no Roman Catholic monopoly". Saints with us are not publicised in the same way. Places of pilgrimage are places of prayer, but prayer can be offered anywhere, for God is everywhere.

The attraction of numbers will always influence certain people, and the Roman Catholic Church is very large. But minorities are not always wrong, and history shows that majorities can and do err. "People in general become Roman Catholics because the shoe pinches in their own church rather than by virtue of the inherent advantages of the Church of Rome . . . The Church of England has many defects, and her children admit them, perhaps too freely and complacently. But none of them belongs to her essence, they are all accidental, and it is open to one and all to work to set them right."

The doctrines examined by Mr. Ross are "The Assumption", "The Immaculate Conception and the Cultus of Our Lady", "The Infallibility and Universal Jurisdiction of the Pope", and "The Validity of Anglican Orders". There is a Chapter also on "Some other matters", a collection of criticism of Roman Catholic methods.

On The Assumption Mr. Ross states correctly "there is no trace of the dogma in the Bible". This is familiar ground to our readers. Such passages as are adduced are quite irrelevant. The first mention by an orthodox writer is in "on the glory of the martyrs", by St. Gregory of Tours, A.D. 592, i.e. 550 years or so after the supposed event! Mr. Ross points out that while there are traces of a feast of the Assumption in Palestine in A.D. 500, yet it is to be remembered that "Assumptio" did not at that period imply a bodily resurrection and assumption. The word was used of the deaths of other saints.

Our writer draws a conclusion from the fact of this belief being made a dogma in spite of the want of evidence in the Bible or early Christian writings—"There is now literally no safeguard to what future Popes may define."

On the dogma of "The Immaculate Conception", now on its hundredth year as an Article of the Roman Catholic faith, Mr. Ross traces the earlier history of the belief, and shows how it differed from later views. In the distant past it was the opinion that Our Lord's Mother was freed from original sin while still in her mother's womb. But largely through the influence of the mediæval schoolman Duns Scotus belief grew that she was immaculately conceived: not that she had been cleansed by grace from original sin, but that she had never been touched by it.

It is shown that this doctrine has no scriptural basis. It has been denied by leading theologians of the past: by St. Augustine, by St. Bernard, by St. Thomas Aquinas.

The "Catholic Dictionary" is quoted—"there are at least probable traces of its (the dogma's) existence in the Church from the earliest times". These "probable traces" amount to little more than the fact that some of the fathers call the Blessed Virgin "the second Eve", and since Eve was conceived immaculate, they must have believed Mary was too. "This is poor evidence indeed, and what did not suffice to convince St. Augustine and St. Thomas Aquinas may well fail to carry conviction with us."

When the opinion that the Blessed Virgin was immaculately conceived was put forward, as late as the twelfth century, it was rejected by the most competent theologians of the time. Nevertheless the opinion spread rapidly, which shows us that theology is often made by the popular will rather than by Scripture, or reliable ancient tradition, or church councils interpreting these. The Council of Trent hotly disputed the matter, but the most that could be ventured on was that the Pope urged the contending parties to make peace. The matter was left unsettled, and discussions of it were prohibited by Pope Gregory XV. (1621-1623).

Why so long a delay (till 1854) was thought desirable is not disclosed. If people believed in papal infallibility then it was a duty to accept the dogma. To wait until nearly everybody was prepared to acquiesce was democracy rather than the exercise of infallibility. Now after a century the dogma of the Immaculate Conception will be celebrated, and centenary observances will emphasise the theology of Mary as the modern development of the faith.

Mr. Ross well asks what is the purpose of multiplying the necessary articles of faith? "It is to be feared" he says, "that part of the reason is to be found in the superstitious hope that as a result of these definitions Our Lady will be induced to grant greater blessings to the Church and to the world than she would otherwise have granted".

The chapter on Infallibility covers ground familiar to our readers. Scripture passages relating to Peter are shown to be incapable of the weight of dogma raised upon them. The story of the False Decretals is told, and the alleged Donation of Constantine described. It is undoubted that these pious fictions, "the inventions of precedents", contributed much to the idea of the Papacy as a universal control. Papal supremacy was established, but supremacy is a legal or constitutional thing. By itself it is insufficient to safeguard the status of the Papacy. Hence the attitude of Infallibility became necessary, especially, as we noted recently, when the last remnants of the temporal power had come to an end.

Mr. Ross devotes much of his space to a useful restatement of the case against Infallibility. He wisely makes use of our great Irish scholar, Dr. George Salmon's Lectures on "The Infallibility of the Church". He says "There is something wrong with the whole idea of Infallibility. No one will challenge the importance of a right faith, but faith as a Christian virtue is faith in a Person rather than the acceptance of certain intellectual propositions".

On "Anglican Orders" similar treatment to that in the booklet "Infallible Fallacies", noticed last month, is accorded to the problem (if it is a problem). The discussion, is, we confess, wearisome, for the Anglican Churches are not really called upon to satisfy Rome's exacting, if dubious, standards of validity. If they satisfy the standards of the New Testament and Primitive Church they have done what they ought to do. The Church of Christ has no ministry within it competent to offer on the altar the same sacrifice as that of Calvary (in an unbloody manner). It has no power to offer a sacrifice for the living and the dead.

Anglican churches have the true ministry, not Rome's as defined by the catechism of the Council of Trent. There is also this fact to be kept in mind, that we have no evidence that the priesthood as defined by Trent can accomplish what it sets out to do.

* * *

Mr. Ross has further objection to the position taken up by Rome. He dislikes the Bull "Pascendi" which condemned modernism in Roman Catholic circles nearly fifty years ago. He dislikes the attitude to history, and the shrinking from frank discussion of many topics. He protests against the recent encyclical "Humani Generis" because it requires a literal acceptance of the first chapters of the book of Genesis.

He goes over the story of Dr. Simcox and his difficulties a few years ago, and resurrects a choice item (which appeared at the time in our columns)—The Most Rev. Dr. Sinnott R. C. Archbishop of Winnipeg in 1944 solicited subscriptions to a "Society for the Propagation of the Faith". He invited each mother of a serving soldier to enrol her son as a member, and said there was "a guarantee should he be killed, that he will go at once to his Maker". Mr. Ross recounts how this appeal was quoted in the London "New Statesman" of 8th July 1944. In the next issue there was a letter of protest from the Rev. J. C. Heenan saying that "If Critic (the pseudonym of the "New Statesman" writer who contributed the account of the Archbishop's appeal) believes that the Archbishop of Winnipeg or any other Catholic bishop could write such arrant nonsense, he manifests a terrifying credulity. Categorically and a priori I deny that the Archbishop has been guilty of the heresy of which he is accused." Three months after Fr. Heenan had to write "The impossible has happened. The Archbishop was correctly quoted." He added that he had learnt privately that the Archbishop had been in failing health for some time.

That was the way out—His Grace's mental faculties were failing. Yet to many a reader there was nothing improbable in the appeal for "the Society for the Propagation of the Faith". Mr. Ross says a propos of this "The Reformers may not have been so much mistaken after all".

The final chapter, "The Church and the Church of England" is a useful answer to the universal claims of Rome, whose fault is that "it requires a wholly disproportionate attention to external unity". The Church is thought of too much in juridical and too little in spiritual terms.

We can recommend the reading of this book. It seems to us to be accurate and its evidence well chosen. The subject is one to be insisted on—we need clear views and convincing ones on "Why we are not Roman Catholics".

WHY WE REJECT CERTAIN CEREMONIES.

(A broadcast in "The Case for Protestantism" Series by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond.)

The common idea about Protestants is as little correct as the common idea about most things or people. Some of my listeners will have been told that Protestantism is merely a negation. The Protestant is supposed to be like the famous Radical leader, Mr. Laboncheire, who once told a correspondent that he had trained himself to say No! And so people expect No! for an answer when they hear of a Protestant, and they are thus led to discount any objection in advance: "Oh! he is always smelling a rat, or seeing the thin edge of the wedge." That is quite sufficient and does duty for more solid argument. It is in vain that we try to tell people that a Protestant is a man who witnesses for something. In this world you can hardly be for anything without being against something else. I hope my hearers, at all events, will not be drawn aside by such foolish statements. I hope that you will all ask for reasons and when you get them examine them. There are several reasons why we reject certain ceremonies. We do not reject them all for the same reasons. Some are rejected because they are unnecessary. St. Augustine complained of this in his time. There is a great danger that religious affairs shall be removed from the ordinary business of life, and it is necessary that we should restore the balance. That is not a negative attitude—it is a serious call to all of us. It reminds us that there is danger, as old Bishop Butler put it long ago, of going over the idea of virtue in our mind. We want to get back to reality. We want to prevent the idea growing in our mind that religion is a particular form of drill with very little relation to the hum-drum of ordinary living.

That is not a negative attitude. We can support our contention by many pertinent illustrations drawn from the annals of the past. The Romans were a virile people, but they grew lazy with the increase of prosperity. As their power declined their shows increased. We have all heard the famous slogan: "Bread and circuses for the common people." The lesson has often been lost on succeeding peoples. The multiplication of ceremonies means the loss of spiritual vigour. At last the whole service with its multiplication of ceremonies became so unmeaning to the ordinary man that in despair he left the whole business to the priest. Religion became a matter of professional routine instead of a living power.

It is almost incredible in these days to read of the extent to which this divorce of religion and life had grown. The worthy burghers of Strasburg conducted their cases in Church while the priest celebrated Mass. He did his job, and they did theirs and both were satisfied. We do not want that to occur again and in order to prevent it we seek to bring the whole range of spiritual devotion within the compass of the directly intelligible. It is not enough that the service shall have a meaning. It must have a meaning to the simplest worshipper. We Protestants point out that most great things are simple. The world has been divided into people who make simple things complicated and those who make complicated things simple. We prefer the latter. The greatness of God consists partly in his approachableness. Though clouds and darkness are round Him, He dwells with him that is of a lowly and contrite spirit. We do not object to music. We object to the notion that there is anything very religious about ornate music. We do not object to meaningful gestures. We object to the multiplication of gestures. Even here we can make a good positive case. But much more than in following a desire for simplicity and directness we object to many ceremonies because they are contradictory to the great conceptions of the Old and New Testament. An ancient father of the Church put this thought very forcibly. He pointed out that there was a great resemblance between the religion of ancient Egypt and the religion of Israel. Both religions had a temple and in both temples there was a holy of holies. When you entered the Egyptian holy of holies you found reclining on a velvet cushion a crocodile or a cat. When you entered the holy of holies of Israel you found a sacred ark and reposing in it The Ten Commandments of God. That was the big difference. It was a moral difference. If we are to be true to this essential element in revealed religion, we must hold very closely to its direct teaching. There are avenues of departure that are peculiarly appealing to the natural heart of man. It is digression into these avenues that has most to be avoided. We hear, for example, a great deal to-day about the Sacramental principle in life and in worship. There is a sacramental principle in life. But it is going to an extreme to say: "all life is a sacrament." A sacrament is an outward sign of a great inner truth. But there is an inveterate tendency to bind up the inner with the outer. As Protestants we seek to guard against that error. We believe that sacraments can only be given to rational beings. We believe that their very essence consists in representing by means of outward signs a reality that can only be experienced in the spirit. Hence we discourage everything that draws attention to the outward sign in itself considered, and encourage everything that leads the worshipper on to the realm of spirit. Better we say with the old Franciscans, "vessels of wood and hearts of gold" than "vessels of gold and hearts of wood." Our attitude is not always understood. We want reverence, but we also want due proportion. We want the deepest, truest reverence for the unseen spiritual reality. Sometimes we think that in the trimmings that have surrounded the simple tokens of our Lord in Baptism and the Holy Communion the inner reality has been withdrawn from consideration. The Jews were rebuked for making void the commandments of God by their traditions. They thought more of washing hands than of the sacred reality which the washing of the hands signified. We are anxious to avoid that ancient error. Elaborateness is not the same thing as devotion, though it is often mistaken for it. Why is it that such obvious considerations, grounded in scripture, history and personal experience are never so much as considered when the Protestant attitude is discussed. Is it because the inherent reasonableness of the general Protestant position would thereby become at once apparent?

There is yet another reason why we reject certain ceremonies, and it is found in the history of their development. The present practices of the Christian Church did not all spring up in a night. They were the result of slow growth. In its long history the Church has adopted ceremonies and discarded them. The reasons are now, at least, often obscure. Tertullian tells us that honey and milk were given to the newly baptised. He also mentions a custom of taking a small portion of the consecrated bread before eating any other food in the morning. Ambrose also tells us that his brother, the sea-captain, had some consecrated bread of communion with him when at sea. Customs like these died out. If we were to adopt popular views we might suggest that some disgruntled Protestants existed in those far-off days. But it is enough to say "changing times, changing manners" applies to the Christian Church. We cannot wholly dissociate ceremonies from their history. Where mistakes are corrected the ceremonies associated with the mistakes are thrown aside. When the ceremonies are revived, too often the mistakes revive with them. Take a few of these. Jerome tells us that candles were lit in the East in his day when the Gospel was about to be read to illustrate the words of the Psalm: "Thy word O God is a lantern unto my feet." Lactantius, a short time before, ridiculed the heathen: "They kindle lights to God," he says, "as if He dwelt in darkness." But Pope Innocent III was the first bishop to order lights to be set upon the altar. A custom that arose in 1215 can hardly be apostolical. The change of meaning from Jerome's time led to the later order that the sacrament should be carried to the sick "with a light going before It." A candle is a simple thing, but candles on an altar have a special history. We feel justified in saying that having abandoned Transubstantiation, we have abandoned lighted candles as symbolical of "the brightness of the Eternal Light." We also feel justified in saying that where candles in this connection have come back the error which is associated with them has come back also. A rather amusing illustration of this can be found in a comparatively modern book where the writer says:—"The lights are, of course, not for use, but to symbolise the divine presence. We burn them on our altars, on the right side and on the left, before the oracle when, as the Bible says, there is 'no need' of them." (What Ritual has God Appointed?—Rev. J. S. Pollock.) Truly the Bible says we have no need of them, though in a wholly different sense, and so say we.

The Reservation of the Sacrament was condemned unanimously by all the Bishops of both the Convocations of Canterbury and York in the year 1898. The Archbishop of York wrote: "The opinion of the bishops was absolutely unanimous. It has, therefore, all the weight that it could have from the authorities of the Church" (Advent Pastoral, 1898). Protestants still adhere to that judgment. A sacrament to them is a sacred act performed rationally. It cannot be reserved. To imagine that a portion of bread, because it is consecrated, can be kept for use afterwards is to impair, in their judgment, the real value of this very sacred ordinance. It is when the Lord's people are gathered together to worship Him and solemnly set apart by united consent bread and wine for a sacred purpose there and then completed by taking and eating in remembrance of their Lord that the gift He offers becomes real to their souls. They point out that Baptism is not reserved, nor can it be. To practice reservation is, in their judgment, to countenance the opinion that in one Sacrament and in one only, "The author of all sanctity is present before us." They think it is not possible to hold this opinion and to be faithful to New Testament truth, hence they reject the practice and the ceremony of burning a light before the reserved sacrament as popular usage has it.

Protestants regard the practice of kneeling before images of saints and burning candles to the images as undesirable in public worship. They remember that when Peter came to Cornelius, Cornelius fell down on his knees before him. Peter took him by the hand, saying: "Arise and stand upon thy feet, for I also am a man." The type of worship Peter rejected when offered to him in person on earth could scarcely be acceptable to him when offered to his image, if he had any knowledge of it. The second commandment, or the latter portion of the first, according to another mode of reckoning, says: "Thou shalt not make... any graven image... thou shalt not bow down to them or worship them." That command is authoritative for Protestants and excludes the use of images in worship.

turn out well with God's help. I will pray for you."

First Mention.

Constable Fraser told Lord Chief Justice MacDermott, who was hearing the case, that it was the first time his wife had mentioned religion.

In reply to the letter, added Constable Fraser, he had said that it was a great shock to him, and that he would not consider the suggestion that he change his religion.

Another letter from his wife to him said: "It is not the type of letter to expect from you, who pretends to love your partner in life. If you had love in that stony heart of yours you would meet me half-way. Your whole love is with the child, and you have none for his mother. You can be sure that I will never return to you on your conditions. I have a right to live my own life according to God, and so I am prepared to paddle my own canoe."

"Could be Happier."

"Bob, you know it is Pat's death that is making me do all this... Do not blame anyone for telling me what to do for you know I would do whatever I like myself. You know we could be even happier than we were if you could only see the right way, but I will never force you to do something that you do not want to do."

A further letter from Mrs. Fraser said: "... If we have to part, I am going to enter a convent. You know I have always told you that if I had not married you I would have been a nun... If you could only see things the way I see them we would be very happy."

Constable Fraser said that later when he went to see his wife, she tried to talk the matter over to get him to go her way, and said that it was the only way she would go back to him. He refused, and took their son away with him next morning.

Down and Dromore Diocesan Conference— Dromore, Co. Down, 26/11/'52. An Outspoken Bishop.

The Bishop introduced the guest speaker, the Bishop of Meath, to the clergy. Dr. McCann, in a very practical address, laid stress on the desirability of the clergy giving all they had, however humble their gifts might be; of being simple in their preaching; and remembering what the people needed. A short discussion followed.

At 8 p.m. the Conference proper began, the Rector of Dromore welcoming all who had come and inviting the Bishop to take the chair.

The Chairman said he was glad to see such an excellent attendance. Introducing the subject of the Conference, "The Layman's Part in the Church's Life", he said that the future rested with the laity. They were to witness to their religion in their daily lives. The life of the laity in the shop, on the farm etc. during the week more than their attendance at Divine Service was going to bring people to God.

The Chairman then asked the Bishop of Meath to address the meeting. Dr. McCann gave a very forthright and inspiring address, pointing out that our Church was Protestant, Reformed, Apostolic, and Catholic. It was not a question of ritual but of foundation of belief which separated us from the R.C. Church. The Church for which the layman was to work was a Scriptural Protestant Church. The Reformers of our Church had aimed at a spring-cleaning in doctrine, faith and manners, and had appealed to Holy Scriptures and the practices of the early Christian Church. The three-fold Ministry of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, the Sacraments, the three Creeds, the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were all part of the Christian Deposit which had been preserved. There had been no such thing as the founding of a new Church. The Bishop proceeded to say how foolish it was to allow the grand old word "Catholic" to be filched from us. Catholicism was what was believed always, everywhere, and by all. Applying this doctrine to the Prayer Book we were a Catholic Church. A tremendous heritage had been passed down to us; and we should be loyal to our Church.

The Bishop of Meath introduced the second part of his address by posing the question: "How can we witness for God?" and gave a five-fold answer. First, the layman must dedicate himself day by day to God's service. His first contribution to his Church was to witness by his life to Christ. Secondly, the greatest work for God was done in the home. Thirdly, there was the duty of worship. The layman had a duty to witness to those who did not worship. Fourthly, they had a duty to the clergy. They must realise the financial burden of the clergy and their wives. Often help given was too little and too late. They should take the burden of money off the clergy, and give more encouragement to them. What the wives of the clergy did for their Church was beyond price. Lastly, the layman could play a part in the Church's life by taking on a job. Dr. McCann concluded his address by saying we needed to re-consecrate ourselves day by day.—"Church of Ireland Gazette", 4/12/'53.

Worker-Priests.

The French Cardinals (Feltin, Gerlier, and Liénart) have seen the Pope and presented to him their views on the position of the worker-priests in Paris. Most of the anxiety publically expressed, centres around "the participation of some worker-priests in the class struggle". Some priests in industry have been politically active, but not by any means a majority of them. It was surely conceivable from the start that these men would not have committed themselves to this life had their human sympathies not been deeply involved. But one aspect of "the apostolate to the workers." is said to threaten the vocation of the priest. A correspondent in Paris informs us that although it has never been publicly admitted, a point of particular anxiety is that a number of priests have married. Our correspondent says also that fear of "incipient Protestantism" has grown because of the response of some worker-priests to the condition of the workers in relation to the demands of the Church. There has grown among them the not surprising conviction that the alienated workers may be persuaded to return to the faith and the Mass but not (yet) to the Church. There is a hard core of resistance that permits a man to go to Mass in the priest's room on Monday but will not permit him to go to Mass in Church on Sunday—as the Church says he must. The sympathy of the priests with this point of view is being described as "incipient Protestantism". A similar sympathy in the minds of some Anglican priests close to our own industrial population is being described in the Church of England as "incipient Wesleyanism". Some of these priests are beginning to say they prefer incipient Wesleyanism to insipid Churchianity.

At the time of going to press, the three French cardinals have let it be known that they think the worker-priests may be allowed to continue in their labours.—"British Weekly", 12/11/'53.

Worker-Priests may continue if...

On Saturday the three French cardinals—Feltin of Paris, Gerlier of Lyons and Liénart of Lille—issued a statement containing the conditions laid down by the Vatican on which the Worker-priests of Paris may continue in their labours. The conditions are:

1. Worker-Priests should be carefully chosen by their bishop.
2. They should receive well-founded training.
3. They should work manually only for a short time, to enable them to fulfil their priestly functions.
4. They must not enter into any temporal obligations which would be likely to create for them trade union or other responsibilities, "which should be left to laymen".
5. They should not live in isolation but should be attached to a community of priests or to a parish.

The cardinals' statement stressed that the worker-priests' movement could not be retained "as it existed to-day" but that the Roman Catholic Church was "anxious to retain contact" between itself and the working class.—"British Weekly", 19/11/'53.

THE BIRTH OF A BIBLE SOCIETY IN THE STRAND

In December 1831 the Trinitarian Bible Society was born at Exeter Hall, Strand, and has continued for 122 years doing an important work in circulating pure versions of the Word of God. To-day the Society is as vigorous as ever, and is sending tens of thousands of Hebrew Scriptures to Israel, and large quantities of other languages to various parts of the world.

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

"Legal" Kidnapping.

In our Notes of July 10th we referred to the abduction of the two Finally orphans, baptized into the Roman Church without the knowledge of their Jewish aunt and guardian, and smuggled out of France into a Spanish Catholic Institution. On August 28th the Evangelical Confederation of Colombia authorized the following account of the "legal" kidnapping of Abraham and Obdulio Morales, aged 12 and 11 years. The family lived on their farm, but after the conversion of the parents to the Protestant Faith, attended a Protestant Church. Three years ago, a gang of eight Roman Catholics entered the farmhouse and shot the husband dead, shouting "This is for being a Protestant," after which they forced the mother and children to abandon the farm. The two children named above, attended the Sunday school of the Protestant church where their mother was a baptized member, but during the week they were scholars of the "Francisco Marulanda" Public School. The Principal and staff pestered the boys to attend Mass at the parish church, telling them they would go to hell unless they became Catholics. On July 7th when the boys failed to return home, the mother could learn nothing from the Principal of their whereabouts. When she saw the Principal the next day he replied: "Return to the Virgin and your children will be given back to you"; he had handed the boys over to a Jesuit priest. Not until August 2nd did she learn that they were in a Catholic orphanage. After much obstruction she was permitted to visit them in the presence of the Mother Superior, when, terrified and sobbing, they rushed to her lap. When she pleaded to take them home, she was told they had been sent to the orphanage by the Government and must remain there. On August 10th Obdulio escaped. He told his mother how the School Principal had urged the two brothers to run away from home and had taken them to the Jesuit Centre, whence Jesuit Father Guzman, had taken them to the orphanage, and that on July 16th they were compelled to attend Mass. The same afternoon, August 10th a police detective entered the house and carried the boy away by force. Two days later the mother petitioned the Judge of the Juvenile Court who accused her of apostasy and abused her for "turning Protestant", adding that he had authority to seize all Protestant children in the department of Caldas. The boys were retained in the orphanage. On August 13th the mother, with a Protestant friend, appealed to the Governor of the province. He answered that she had expelled the boys from home and they had gone to the Jesuit priest for help—such was the statement of the Jesuit and he believed him. The Bishop of the province stated that she was an apostate Catholic mother, and since the boys when babies, had been baptized into the Catholic church "she could not be allowed to violate their Roman Catholic consciences". The Judge of the Juvenile Court, after the evidence of the Jesuit and the Bishop, dictated an authorization for the confinement of Abraham and Obdulio Morales in the Catholic Orphanage of San José.

"Supernatural" Tears in Sicily—A Weeping Statuette.

Palermo (Sicily), December 13.

Cardinal Ruffini, Archbishop of Palermo, said recently following a meeting of Sicilian bishops to examine the reported "miracle of the weeping Madonna" at Syracuse, that "there can be no doubt of the reality of the tears". According to pilgrims, the tears were shed by a hollow terracotta statuette hung above the bed of a Sicilian Communist's pregnant wife. She said she saw it weep and felt the tears splash her forehead. The tears continued for four days from August 29 to September 1. Thousands of pilgrims claimed to have seen them, and hopelessly sick people claimed the statuette had miraculously cured them.

Countless church meetings at Rome and Palermo heard and sifted evidence. Then after the final meeting of the Sicilian bishops, Cardinal Ruffini announced that the Church recognised the "supernaturalness" of the tears. He said that chemical examination of the tears had proved them to be genuine. The bishops have decided to build a special sanctuary for the statuette.

The Archbishop's statement, however, does not mean that the "weeping Madonna" is recognised officially by the Roman Catholic Church. The bishops' report must be submitted to the Congregation of the Holy Office, which will investigate the Madonna if it thinks fit. The Congregation of Holy Rites has the final decision.—British United Press and Reuter.—“Manchester Guardian” 14/12/'53.

Weeping Image Claim—Report by Bishops.

From Our Own Correspondent

Rome, Sunday.

The convocation of Roman Catholic bishops in Sicily, meeting under the chairmanship of Mgr. Baranzini, Archbishop of Syracuse, recently pronounced the phenomena of the “Weeping Madonna of Syracuse” to be authentic.

A plaster image of the immaculate heart of the Virgin, bought in a local store by a peasant woman, is said to have wept tears continuously from August 29 to September 1.

The phenomena attracted immense crowds, and a large number of cures were claimed. A chemist declared that an analysis of the “tears” showed them to be human lachrymatory liquid. The bishops have called for the erection of a shrine to contain the image.—“Daily Telegraph”, 12/12/'53.

Bishop Donegan Asks Atom Plan Prayer.

The Right Rev. Horace W. B. Donegan, Episcopal Bishop of New York, asked all clergy to lead their congregations in prayer “that success may attend the efforts of the President and the United Nations that the power of atomic fission may be employed not for destruction but for the benevolent upbuilding of human welfare, and the cause of world peace”.

Bishop Donegan wrote to the clergy of the diocese:

“All Americans were inspired by President Eisenhower's prophetic utterance which has given us, in more realistic terms than anything heretofore, an understanding of the grave danger the world is in, by the tremendous increase in the accumulation of atomic weapons.

“The President is to be commended for taking a positive approach toward a beginning of international co-operation in this field. As to the particulars of the plan as proposed, or as it may be modified, it is too early to make an evaluation.”

Dr. Bonnell Hails Eisenhower Plan.

The Rev. Dr. John Sutherland Bonnell said, in his sermon at Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, Fifth Avenue and 55th St., that President Eisenhower could not have timed his appeal for diverting atomic energy to peaceful purposes better than to make it at the Christmas season.

“Humanity stands at the crossroads to-day”, he said. “God has set before us life and death, the blessing and the curse. We must make the choice. The way of the atom and hydrogen bombs is the way of death, whose end no man can foresee. But these dread forces can be harnessed so that they will become the servants of man rather than his executioner.”—“New York Herald Tribune”, 14/12/'53.

Mr. Blythe on the Constitution of Eire— “Provocative to Northern Loyalists.”

Mr. Ernest Blythe, who at one time was Vice-President of the Executive Council, said that this country's Constitution was provocative to Northern loyalists.

He stated that the present Constitution only increased the solidarity of those in favour of partition. It assumed “rights” in the North, and he would like to see changes made in it.

He blamed the Constitution for having led, indirectly, to the introduction in Northern Ireland of the Flags and Emblems' Bill, which comes up for a second reading in Stormont this week.

Mr. Blythe, who is a native of the North and a Protestant, was taking part in a debate with Senator J. G. Lennon on “The Strategy of the Struggle for National Reunion,” in the A.O.H. Hall, Armagh. The debate was heard by specially invited members of the Irish Anti-Partition League.

Mr. Blythe began by reiterating his support for the anti-partition movement. But he made a strong appeal to Northern Ireland Nationalists to abandon their policy of coercion, to respect the Union Jack, and to give up trying to push the Tricolour to the fore.

“A smear campaign by Nationalists does nothing but harm,” Mr. Blythe declared. “It is completely impossible to restrain the lunatic fringe in any movement, but certain exaggerated propaganda about ‘a police state’ and ‘gestapo,’ and things like that, and talk about persecution can do no good. It can only annoy people on the other side.”

Not National Flag.

Referring to the Flags and Emblems' Bill, which has been introduced by the Northern Ireland Government to protect the flying of the Union Jack, and prohibit the flying of other emblems and flags where likely to cause a breach of the peace, Mr. Blythe said: “I deplore the introduction of this Bill, but I think it was largely due to the confusion caused in the minds of Northern Nationalists by the terms of the Constitution of the Republic.

“Nationalist people in the North seem to me to have convinced themselves that the Tricolour is the National flag of all Ireland. It is not anything of the sort. It is the flag of Easter Week, and the flag of the heroes, and it is the flag of the Twenty-Six Counties, but it is not the flag of all Ireland. I think the people who force the Tricolour in the North are doing great harm in various ways, and they are certainly doing harm to the flag."

Call for Respect.

Mr. Blythe criticised those who would seek to tear down the Union Jack in the North. "To me, the Union Jack represents world-wide plunder and piracy," he stated, "but we must acknowledge the validity and the authority of the Six-County Government. This Government—although there might be a little gerrymandering—is a democratic Government, reflecting the feeling of about one-fifth of the Irish people. I think the Union Jack is entitled, in the Six Counties, to an outward respect.

"There should be a respect for the majority and I think the Tricolour—which has no status in the Six Counties—should not be pushed to the fore. It should not be dragged into scuffles and riots, and be made to seem to other people the flag of coercion and threat.

"Behave sensibly!" was his advice to Northern Nationalists. "Abandon the policy of coercion and give up trying to push the Tricolour to the fore, and it will soften the feelings of the Protestant majority."

Persuasion Needed.

Mr. Blythe declared that partition would never be removed without first getting rid of the "politico-religious dividing line." There was no possibility of ending partition by any form of coercion; there would have to be persuasion.

Referring to appeals to Americans of Irish descent to support the anti-partition movement, Mr. Blythe commented: "The vast majority of those people care little about Ireland, except when they are knocking back a few drinks on St. Patrick's Day. Partition can never be ended until 200,000 or 300,000 Protestants from the Six Counties are prepared to join us. To persuade them will be a big task, but we must definitely make up our minds to abandon the policy of coercion."

Another View.

Senator Lennon expressed disagreement with such a conciliatory policy. "Ireland's troubles," he asserted, "stem directly from invasion by the English and subsequent deliberate planting of Protestant settlers."

He reviewed the growth of Protestantism in Ireland and of "that secret society, the Orange Order." The Irish struggle, right from the outset, he alleged, was "a struggle by Catholics to defend their ancient faith against this neo-religion of the invaders."

Referring to Mr. Blythe's call for an end to coercive methods by anti-partitionists, he said: "The Irish people have the right to coerce the Protestants of the Six Counties, if such is the decision of the majority of the people. I have never advocated, and the Anti-Partition League have never advocated coercion, but I say we have the right to use it."

Senator Lennon stated that the Northern Nationalists were "an example to minorities throughout the world" for patience under intolerable conditions. It came ill from a person of Mr. Blythe's standing to sneer at Irish-Americans. Irish people in America were willing to give aid to the anti-partition movement at all times.

Call to Government.

Criticising the Government of the Republic, Senator Lennon said it was regrettable that the vast majority of politicians in the South were not prepared to make sacrifices to bring about an end to partition.

He dismissed Mr. Blythe's suggestions that the Northern Government be accorded recognition as a proper authority, that there should be acceptance of "the assumption of power by Great Britain," or that there should be tacit recognition of the symbols or such authority, as "too much for a Six County Nationalist to stomach."

He called on the Government of the Republic to end the tendency of allowing the Northern Nationalists to be isolated. He asked that centres of industry be established along the Border to give employment to Northern people, and that a Minister for the Reunification of Ireland be appointed—"Irish Times", 8/2/'54.

Title of "Worker-Priests" Abolished—Declaration by French Bishops.

The title "worker-priest" is to be abandoned in favour of the expression "priests of the working men's mission" (Prêtres de la Mission Ouvrière instead of Prêtres-Ouvriers) according to an official and carefully worded statement issued recently by the secretariat of the French episcopate.

This statement first of all confirms the original decision that the needs of the French working-class could not be fully covered by the parish priests even with the help of the laymen of the two organisations, Jeunesse Ouvrière Chrétienne and Action Catholique Ouvrière. Priests are still, therefore, to be appointed to carry on a sacerdotal apostolate in the working-class world in conjunction with parish clergy and lay militants. (The French vocabulary allows the bishops in their statement to avoid the use of the word "class" whereas it is difficult to do so in English.)

Safeguards for Priests.

The statement goes on to say that it is for the Church alone to determine what forms of life are compatible with the priesthood. While recognising "the generosity and magnificent devotion of the priests whom they had sent into the working-class world, and whom they had permitted to work in factories," the bishops declare that this experiment cannot be continued in its present form. The Church wishes to safeguard the peculiar mission of the priest and to give to the working-class world priests who, in that world and for that world, will live the full life of a priest.

"Now the priest is consecrated to offer to God the adoration of the whole people, primarily by the celebration of Holy Mass and the public prayer of the breviary. He is also among men the dispenser of divine benefits the preaching of the word of God and the administration of the sacraments."

For this reason the Church asks the priests, sent into the working-class, not to take full-time jobs in future. To avoid any confusion in the future the change of title already mentioned has been decided upon. The bishops go on carefully to state that this decision does not arise from any contempt for manual labour, consecrated by the example of Jesus Christ. They note that in many monasteries monks devote several hours a day to manual work. The Church is asking the priests of the Working Men's Mission to devote only part of the day to manual labour so that they may fulfil all the obligations of prayer and of the apostolate that they have assumed by becoming priests.

The bishops ask the clergy and the faithful to pray for the priests who having gradually adopted a form of life and activity which cannot be maintained, will certainly suffer from these directives now given to them. In conformity with the declarations of the three cardinals the bishops, signatory of yesterday's declaration have made known the practical application of the new system which is to be adopted. "More than ever in this painful moment they need the prayers of all."

French Catholics' Concern.

The bishops once more stress that the change in the manner of living will be a painful one for the priests who, as the pioneers of their Church, had entered factories as workmen. Without any doubt a large section of the most active and zealous French Catholic opinion is still pained by the decision of the Vatican that this change should be made. This French Catholic opinion is the more troubled since the decision was originally taken without public discussion and entirely from above. French Catholics cannot help being citizens of a Republic in which the obligation of public discussion and explanation has been pushed almost further than anywhere else in the world. This, no doubt, is part of the trial of the "worker priests" who are no longer to bear that name.

"Le Monde," in commenting on the bishops' statement, points out that since they are no longer to accept full-time jobs the priests of this mission can no longer exercise their activity within factories, since part-time workers would not normally be accepted and any special arrangement for the priests' benefit would be resented by the other employees in the factory and destroy the whole purpose for which the priests originally entered the factories—that they should share to the full the life of industrial workmen.

"Le Monde" notes that the bishops not only forbid priests to accept full-time jobs, but also "all temporal commitments." This, "Le Monde" presumes, means that the priests of the mission can no longer join the working-class and above all must not participate in any political demonstration. It notes that the priests of the mission are, therefore, subjected to restrictions which are more severe than on those who happened to be deputies (there are several in the French National Assembly)—"Manchester Guardian," 26/1/54.

The names of 73 worker-priests from most parts of France are affixed to a declaration of protest against the decision about their mission taken by the bishops under instructions from the Pope himself.

All the names seem to be those of secular priests and not of members of religious orders—that is, of men forming the part of the clergy whose position in the worker-priest experiment was most novel, since they were detached from parish duties and episcopal supervision without being under any other form of discipline except that of the Mission of France or the Mission of Paris.

The declaration reached most newspapers recently in roneoed copies. Whether in all cases an actual signature has been given is therefore not certain. In any case "Le Monde" states that some of the signatories do not intend to break with the Church and will try to persuade their colleagues not to do so.

Class Struggle.

The principal passages of the protest are:—

"At the moment when millions of workers in France and abroad are on the march towards unity for the defence of their bread, their liberties, and peace, and while the employers and the Government are accentuating exploitation and repression to halt at all costs the progress of the working class and to safeguard their privileges, the religious authorities are imposing on the worker-priests conditions that involve abandonment of their life as workers and renunciation of the struggle that they have been conducting in solidarity with their comrades.

"This decision is based on religious motives. Yet we do not think that our life as workers has ever prevented us from remaining faithful to our faith and to our priesthood. But it must not be forgotten that the existence and activity of the worker-priests have caused dismay in social quarters accustomed to use

PRIESTHOOD OF THE CLERGY—WHAT?

By Canon Lindsay

(St. Bartholomew's, Stranmillis, Belfast)

If some people who regard themselves wiser than St. Paul, had their way, they would put the word "priests" in the epistles where the word "pastors" occurs as though the "perfecting of the saints," "the work of the ministry" and the "edifying of the body of Christ" could not possibly be accomplished without them and this would seem to be the attitude of the Church of Rome which in her hierarchical capacity has canonized more dead or departed saints than any other branch of professing Christians.

Now I know why the Epistles addressed to ordinands in St. Paul's day are called "Pastoral Epistles" and not "Priestly"; in fact, the sacerdotal conception of the priesthood has been responsible for the teaching of more error in the Christian Church than any other doctrine I know of. It is responsible for the mass, for Transubstantiation, and, in large measure, for souls supposed to be delivered out of purgatory. It is responsible for that form of ecclesiastical pomp which has characterised the Eucharistic congresses held in this and other professedly Christian countries—a pomp which robs Christianity of its sublime magnetic and eternal simplicities—a pomp which, mothlike, leads the easilygulled by the glamour of the spectacular and by a sentiment estranged from the demands of a sanctified and God-given common sense.

And no one knew this better than those who were brought up under its influence but who, on reading their Bibles for the first time, emancipated themselves from its shackles and went to the stake as the martyred ambassadors of freedom, justice and truth. It is no wonder that men like Archbishop Whately, Bishop Lightfoot and the reformers favoured the retention of "Presbyter" in our Prayer Book rather than "sacerdotes" as adopted and retained by Rome.

Religion without Altars.

And why all this but because, as Whately points out, that though the Gospel religion was introduced by men, and among men, whether Jews or Gentiles who had never heard of or conceived such a thing as a religion without a sacrificing priest, without altars for sacrifice, without sacrifices themselves, without either a temple or at least some high place, grove or sacred spot answering to a temple in which the deity worshipped was supposed more especially to dwell though the apostles knew all this, yet they preached, for the first time to Jew and Gentile alike, a religion quite opposite in all those respects to all that had ever been heard of before—a religion without any sacrifice but that offered up by its Founder in His own person, without any sacrificing priest (Hierews and Sacerdos) except Him, the great and true high priest and, consequently no priest (in that sense) on earth, except so far as every one of the worshippers was required to present himself as a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God: and a religion without any temple except the collected congregation of the worshippers themselves. Let anyone contemplate the striking contrasts between the confined or local character of the Mosaic system and the character of boundless extension stamped on the Gospel of Christ. "In the place where God shall choose to set His name therein" writes Moses, "there shalt thou offer thy sacrifices." But a greater than Moses has since said: "The hour cometh when men shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem worship the father." "For where either two or three are gathered together in my name there am I in the midst of them." (St. John's Gospel, Chap. iv and St. Matthew's Gospel, Chap. xviii.) "In his temple (at Jerusalem) doth everyone speak of his glory—there will I Jehovah dwell, for I have a delight therein," writes the Psalmist (Ps. xxix). (to be continued.)

EDITOR'S CHAIR.

THE STORY OF JOHN BALE.

Some time ago, as readers will recall, we published a slightly abridged version of "The Vocation of John Bale to the Bishopric of Ossory" (available in book form from this office 1/3 post free). Owing to interest expressed in this Reformer we have much pleasure in complying with requests received and provide an account of a sturdy scholar and Protestant churchman which will, we hope, keep his memory alive.

Members of the Church of Ireland have retained a sense of admiration for the Reformers though nowadays such admiration is less fashionable than it used to be. Yet we admire them with less piety than our fathers did: for we value them as men and not as Protestant idols, and that is a good thing. We recognise their human limitations and difficulties, and try to see them in the social and intellectual world of the 16th century. When we succeed in this we have no inclination to say, with Hurrell Froude, that we hate them. We admit their iconoclasm, but respect their convictions, and acknowledge our debt. The more we reflect on the collapse of the church of the Middle Ages the more we realise its inevitability, and realise that reconstruction and reformation involve radical processes. France and Russia in more recent times give us parallels in secular reformations; Robespierre follows Mirabeau, Kerensky is succeeded by Lenin—Erasmus yields place to Cranmer, Luther, and Calvin.

John Bale was a radical reformer, yet an English Churchman; an upholder of the Prayer Book, and, if he had known the Confession of St. Patrick he might have quoted the words "appointed by God a bishop in Ireland" for his nomination to the See of Ossory by Edward VI does not deprive his call of the higher sanction.

Bale, like many Reformers and sympathisers with reform was a native of East Anglia: born in 1495 in Suffolk; and died in 1563 at Canterbury. In the sixty-eight years of his life he had strange vicissitudes. How is he remembered today? Generally by epithets, as "foulmouthed Bale" or "bilious Bale"; or by sneers, like that of James Gairdner, that he was not remarkable for his courage; or as the author of "The Vocacyon of John Bale to the Bishopric of Ossory", a book rarely read, even by students of Irish history.

But what about this comment on him?—Mr. T. Davies (in Proceedings, Oxford Bibliographical Society) "John Bale is almost the first real scholar in the history of English studies. His energies were remarkable, but he never committed the melancholy error of attempting more than he could reasonably hope to achieve. He was a lonely pioneer in the wilds of English literary history." Or, what of the fact that Queen Elizabeth planned that he should write a history of England based on the national archives? Or what of the fact that he wrote the first historical play in English, his "King John" which in modern times has been edited in Germany, and probably inspired William Shakespeare?

It is curious that eminent historians have rarely failed to write reproachfully of him, and our own historian Dr. Jourdan regrets his impetuosity and ill-considered haste to push reforms in Kilkenny.* Indeed Dr. Dudley Edwards† writes of Bale with more tolerance than most. I agree with Dr. Jourdan that Bale was over-hasty, but Bale was not merely a reformer, but a red-hot evangelist who wanted a conversion of his clergy, and knew the kind of lives they commonly led. He began by telling the clergy of Kilkenny to leave other men's wives and daughters alone and marry. With him moral conviction was never wanting, and he had seen a bit during his varied life in England and Germany.

"Foul-mouthed" is a possible description of our bishop, if we share the prudery of the 19th century. But Bale belonged to the age of Rabelais, and further, I draw attention to an explanation which is, I think important. I account for much of Bale's language upon the theory that he is applying the imagery of the Old Testament and of the Apocalypse to the papal bishops and clergy of his day. The Papal Church is "the Scarlet Woman", and its priests the sinful citizens of that city which is spiritually called Sodom. The reader of his exposition of Revelation "The Image of Both Churches" will see how very scriptural the language of Bale's severity is. He will also see in this same book many passages of striking beauty of language and spiritual perception—(Parker Society reprint).

* Phillips—Hist. Church of Ireland, (Vol. 2).

† R. D. Edwards—Church and State in Tudor Ireland, (R.C.).

Still, there is much in all Bale's writings, at least in the religious and dramatic ones, which we might wish were expressed more moderately. I confess that I enjoy his whole-hearted vituperation and extreme plainness of speech. As well as his beautiful flexible English. When he is at his best he is admirable.

Again, a man who has been pretty close to the stake and faggots more than once may be pardoned if he says what he thinks about his enemies. Also, after his conversion he must have felt a deep moral repugnance at the things he and his fellows and their predecessors allowed in the conventual life. St. Paul spoke of the things the Gentiles tolerated and practised before their enlightenment, and Bale follows him. Probably there is an element of overstatement, but that is pardonable and usual among radical reformers, who would effect little if they were but moderate in their denunciations; cf. his "Votaries", an exposure of the monastic state in his time.

Bale's life may be briefly told. He studied in a Carmelite College, joined the order, graduated at Cambridge (subsequently D.D. 1537) as a student of Jesus College where he knew Cranmer. He also studied abroad at Toulouse and Louvain. In these places he diligently collected information about the writers of the Carmelite Order, for whom he had a lasting admiration. Most of his Carmelite works have been lost, but his historical notes of English Carmelite writers are in his "Scriptures". The preface to the Carmelite Catalogue of 1533 praises the literary achievements of his order which was long the leading one in England. Indeed it is said that his conversion coincided with a conviction that his order had degenerated from its past greatness, and so he turned from Carmelite antiquities to national ones. By 1533 he was ready to support Henry VIII's reforms. The influence of Lord Thomas Westworth of Suffolk, one of the peers who signed the letter to the Pope approving of Henry's divorce from Catherine, helped to convert him, is also the impending fall of his Order, for the leadership of the mendicant friars had gone from the Carmelites to the Augustinians. Possibly Bale's later hostility to Geo. Browne, Archbishop of Dublin is partly to be explained by the fact that he had been Augustinian Provincial and therefore the supplanter of the Carmelite Provincial. Bale as a Carmelite prior might have been head of the friars!

Wentworth had a hand in persuading Bale to leave the Order, and also to marry. Bale never denied that the desire to get married made him set aside his vows. He was rightly convinced that such a vow only bound him while in the Order, and that in any case the dissolution of the Order would free him. But he held in later years that such vows had, in his experience, been productive of great evil, this he showed in his "Votaries" and in his "Apology of John Bale against a Rank Papist". The wife was a lady named Dorothy who was devoted to him through a long life.

Bale now made steady progress in his researches into English antiquities. He had been encouraged by John Leland to persevere, and like Leland he foresaw the results of the coming dissolution of monasteries, in the scattering of the great libraries. Both he and Leland travelled widely, Leland being commissioned by Henry VIII. Bale examined the archives of many Orders, but was refused by the Dominicans and Franciscans. This added to the hatred which as a Carmelite he naturally bore to those Orders. He published "Anglorum Heliades," reporting on Carmelite histories, and dedicated it to Leland. Leland soon became permanently incapacitated, and Bale carried on alone. He compiled many lists of old British writers, much of whose work is now lost. Bale's edition of Leland's report to Henry VIII tells, among other tragedies, of two monastic libraries being sold for 40/- and used as grocer's packing paper. Much was sold abroad for wrapping and binding. His Apology, for instance is partly bound in a page of fine missal (T.C.D. library F.). The complaints Bale makes are those of a genuine scholar. He does not regret the suppression of the monasteries, for his cry against their inmates is that they never tried to print their mss. or to catalogue them properly. He does lament that the people who acquired the monastic property were only England's "filthy bastards" rather than her true sons since they squandered her literary treasures. The materials of national history and letters meant far more to him than the wealth of abbeys. Indeed they alone were their true wealth.

When he ceased to be prior of the Carmelite house at Doncaster Bale became priest of the parish of Thomdon in Suffolk. There his now outspoken Protestantism led to imprisonment. Leland interceded and procured his release through Thos. Cromwell "in the name of good letters and charity".

He now became the playwright of the English reformation, and tells how Cromwell protected him against Lee, Archbishop of York, and Stokesley, Bishop of London "on account of his comedies". Some half-dozen or so of them survive. They are morality plays, mostly on N.T. themes, and are called "comedies" because of their happy endings. They show us a country priest's effort to dispel rural prejudices in the spirit of Henry's reformation. They ridicule the old popish practices, and portray the simple lessons of the gospel. He became leader of a travelling band of players called in Cromwell's account book "Bale and his fellows".

In his historical plays "King John" and "Thomas a' Becket" he sought to show that the papacy had been the enemy of England's welfare.

The fall of Cromwell caused the departure of Bale to Germany. He lived abroad eight years, and in exile wrote the "Image of Both Churches" which Davies describes as "the most important prophetic and polemic interpretation of scripture produced by the English reformation". He also wrote in defence of Wyclif, and wrote an account of Sir John Oldcastle (Parker Society reprint).

His exile brought him into contact with the European reformation, and he came to sympathise with Calvin, while respecting Luther who died during his stay in Germany. At Wesel he published his great "Summary of writers of Great Britain", a biographical history of English literature, which he added to in Latin editions.

On Edward's accession he returned to England, and became Rector of Bishopstoke, Hampshire. His friend there was Hugh Goodacre.

On 15th August 1551 Edward VI was at Southampton, and Bale went to see the King. Edward directed his council to appoint Bale to the See of Ossory, Goodacre being appointed about the same time to Armagh. In January 1552 he landed at Waterford, and went to Dublin where Cusack the Lord Chancellor arranged for the consecration on 2nd February by Archbishop Browne, assisted by Lancaster of Kildare and Magennis of Down. Bale refused to be consecrated by the Pontifical service, and forced Browne to use the Second Prayer Book, with "manchat" (or white table bread) for the Communion in place of the wafer.

At Kilkenny he used the Second Prayer Book and preached diligently. His plays were acted in the town with some acceptance, but the canons and vicars hated him. He heard that the priests had poisoned Goodacre, and was warned to be careful. On 25th July he found his clergy celebrating the death of Edward by drinking in the taverns. His diocese was full of armed men attacking the houses of the English; and at his see-house five of his staff were murdered. On 10th September a proclamation authorising the mass service was published in the name of Queen Mary, and Bale could stay in Ossory no longer. He went to Dublin, and sought to secure a passage to Scotland. He was abducted by a Flemish pirate, and landed in England at a Cornish port where he was arrested as a traitor but released. He sailed with the pirate for the Netherlands, and at length reached safety.

One of his first acts was to write the story of his "Vocacyon" to Ossory.

In 1554 he went to Zurich as guest of Henry Bullinger where he helped Flacius Illyricus and Gesner the philologist. Later at Frankfort he defended the Prayer Book against the exiled Puritans. He heard his English Communion Service of 1552 called a "Popish Mass" by these sectaries, and suffered other insults. He dealt with the Puritans faithfully, seeing in them the "mockers, liars, blasphemers, despisers" of the last days in the Apocalypse.

The accession of Elizabeth brought the unwearied old man to the last stage of his journey. He went home and the Queen made him a Canon of Canterbury. He was not equal to the task of resuming his bishopric; and Canterbury, with Parker the eager student of antiquities as his friend and archbishop, seemed a worthy resting-place where his studies of English history could go on. Efforts to recover his library from Ireland failed as most of the best of it had been stolen, but years later Parker did get some of it.

Bale died in 1563. In those last years he must have seemed an extraordinary figure to the younger divines. "The spacious days of great Elizabeth" cannot have had many men of as varied fortunes and interests. When, in the 18th century Bishop Tanner compiled his great work on English writers he made good use of Bale's pioneer labours. A hundred years later a Mr. Christmas published for the Parker Society a few of his works. Since then he has been remembered only as "foul-mouthed" Bale. That epithet has become his epitaph.

"THE CONVERSION OF IRELAND."

Thoughts on this topic form the substance of a short article in "The Furrow" Nov. 1953. "The Furrow" is a Roman Catholic monthly magazine published in Ireland, and the author of the article we refer to is a Dr. Scott, lecturer in Dental Anatomy in the Queen's University of Belfast.

Dr. Scott is a convert to Roman Catholicism so his views should be of interest to all Protestants, for all Protestants ought of course to follow Dr. Scott's example if they are to secure the full truth, peace of mind, and eternal salvation. That, at least, is what we are constantly told.

Dr. Scott classifies the non Roman Catholic people of Ireland into those who "hate" the Roman Catholic Church, those who are "indifferent", and those who are "interested". He thinks that "hatred", "persistent and well-organised intellectual hatred", is rare in Ireland. No doubt he is right, yet the very spirit of Protestantism must demand at one and the same time real goodwill towards Roman Catholics, and a firm opposition to the religious system they adhere to. Can any Protestant who reads the occasional pronouncements of the movement called "Maria Duce" feel content that his family and himself should live under the policy it advocates? Can any Protestant feel that the regime in Spain, if imitated here, would be to his interest? While it is true that Ireland has a generous and tolerant spirit there are clamorous minorities and surreptitious activities hostile to tolerance, and they might in the future prevail.

"Many Protestants" says Dr. Scott, "suffer from spasms of active dislike which may be roused by some distorted newspaper report on some Papal pronouncement; some childish memory out of Foxe's Book of Martyrs, or the novels of Charles Kingsley; some isolated item of Catholic doctrine; some foolish statement by a Catholic politician; or some story told by a Protestant missionary back from South America. Such spasms are understandable, and every honest Catholic must suffer such things in himself: to truly love the Church is to hate what is wrong in the Church."

These last words are noble, but how far is it recognised officially that there is wrong in the Church? The Roman Catholic hierarchies in South America do not disapprove, as far as we have heard, of repressive policies towards evangelical missions. Foxe's "Martyrs" tells of the torturing and burning of many Protestants for their faith: the Smithfield fires may have died down, but the "right" of the Church to exercise physical coercion where and when circumstances permit is not denied (see Marshall—"The Roman Catholic Church in the Modern State"). Kingsley if we remember aright, tells something of the Inquisition. It was a real institution; it did exist; and its victims were innumerable. Its Spanish form may have been more extreme than the forms it took elsewhere: there may have been several kinds of Inquisitions, but the general purpose, and the methods, resulted in suffering and death.

As for statements by Roman Catholic politicians—statements by ecclesiastics speaking coolly and with awareness of the meaning of words (an awareness politicians may lack), serve better to keep alive Protestant suspicions—we have lately noted how an ecclesiastic in Co. Kerry told us that when we think of an Irishman we think of a (Roman) Catholic. The Protestant Irishman in some quarters is denied a faith and a country.

Hatred is not a sentiment to be fostered or condoned, but the Irish Protestant must feel that a system of doctrine which has removed so far from scriptural and primitive christianity cannot have claims upon his heart or intellect.

Dr. Scott notes also that in Ireland as elsewhere, changing one's religion means betraying one's own people. That is a fact which is inescapable, and it operates in both directions. But it is to be admitted that there are higher claims upon us than those of family tradition. If mind and conscience lead us in a certain direction we are bound to follow. So while we must always regret defections we ought not to count them as mere treacheries. Of course the lapse or apostasy of a Protestant is the surrender of a loftier spiritual ideal, and that is a cause of profound regret. It may also be said that in very many cases the lapse is due to the want of any really serious convictions, intellectual and moral beforehand. It has been remarked that in Ireland a change of religion is almost always in anticipation of marriage to a Roman Catholic: apart from that motive, conversions are few indeed.

"Indifference" is the second of Dr. Scott's points, and here he writes as a man of perception and candour. He implies that the Roman Catholics are complacent and casual, doing little to arouse interest. "Ireland is giving herself over to suburbia, to the God of material security." He asks the question "what is there in (R) Catholic Ireland of light and warmth and the fulness of being, of thriving art, of dedicated knowledge, of glory, of zest, of high adventure, to turn our Protestant people to the fulness of a faith which resides only in unactivated dogma and the patient acceptance of things as they are on the part of our poor and our sick, and the quiet unknown work of parish priests and holy nuns?"

The fact is that in Ireland we are all, religious in our own way, and we know each other's prejudices, preferences etc. too well. Dr. Scott is not an Irishman, and he has the enthusiasm of a convert, so he must feel hampered at times by the qualities and temperaments of his associates.

The third point, "interest" considers the way by which interest can be awakened. Dr. Scott is quite right in saying here that "the best advertisement for (R) Catholicism is the (R) Catholic layman who shows by his life that his faith is no mere superstition, no collection of half-baked theological jargon, has no fear of human knowledge, is no exclusive collection of negative taboos". But such a layman, we fear, will strike his co-religionists as being a sort of Protestant!

Dr. Scott believes that the conversion of the Protestants is a task for which the right kind of layman is best fitted—"we aid the conversion of another, if we do so at all, by making contacts of mutual respect and understanding along which the flow of God's grace can run". That is very true, and such contacts may result in a two-way traffic—the would be converter may become a convert!

We thank Dr. Scott for that phrase "mutual respect and understanding"—conversions, or no conversions, Ireland needs these virtues badly.

A MODERN CRITIC OF SALMON'S "INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH."

"The Irish Theological Quarterly", published at St. Patrick's College Maynooth in its issue of January 1953 has a very interesting study of Dr. Salmon's book. The study was evoked by the new (abridged) edition of the "Infallibility" edited by Dr. Woodhouse, and its author is the Rev. Dr. G. Mitchell, one of the professors in Maynooth College.

As it is frequently said that Salmon has never been answered by Roman Catholic writers, (and sometimes it is said that he is unanswerable), we turned to Dr. Mitchell's article with the expectation that we would find a clear statement of the considered reply now deemed appropriate. The book has been available for seventy years and no rebuttal as far as we know has been published in separate form. At the turn of the century a series of articles in answer to Salmon appeared in "The Irish Ecclesiastical Record" (by a Maynooth professor, a Dr. Murphy). Last year the same magazine reprinted Dr. Murphy's criticisms, now some fifty years old.

Dr Mitchell begins by suggesting that Dr. Salmon's reputation for learning was exaggerated—perhaps so: but the exaggeration was not Dr. Salmon's, only that of his admirers. He says "there was at least one subject on which he was not particularly well-informed, viz. the teaching of the Church which he so confidently set out to disprove." We have here a problem of a very serious kind. Salmon and others tried to find out what the Roman Catholic Church teaches. They turned to Roman Catholic Sources, and at once faced the difficulty of Romans as well as Protestants, that Rome's teaching is hard to trace in many an important subject. A Roman Catholic theologian may believe that he is expounding correctly his church's teachings, and then find when he submits his writings to the censors that he is in error. That was the experience of Dr. Walter McDonald of Maynooth some thirty years ago. He wrote several books which never received the "Imprimatur". It was the experience of Antonio Rosmini a century ago, though he was one of the men Pope Pius IX planned to make a Cardinal.

There are also many books by important Roman Catholic divines which after being current for years have been withdrawn, or put on the Index. The authors, we assume, had no intention of falsifying or misrepresenting their church's doctrines, but seemingly they must have misunderstood. If there are pitfalls for the Roman Catholic divine, how difficult it is for the Protestant to grasp the orthodox Roman point-of-view.

The fact is that none of us is ever really satisfied with a portrayal of our church by a member of another communion. Even among Protestants the Presbyterian will scarcely be content with a Methodist view of Presbyterianism, nor a Church of Ireland man with the account of his church which a Baptist might write. The facts might all be correctly stated, but the atmosphere, the inner understanding will be the difficulty. Salmon, be it remembered, did not write for Roman Catholic readers. He wrote his lectures for the Church of Ireland Divinity Students in Dublin University. He explained to them the difficulties created in his mind by the claim of the Roman Catholic Church to Infallibility. If Roman Catholic writers themselves failed to give clear and unambiguous expositions then Salmon cannot be blamed for his inability to make better use of the material he derived from them. This seems to be the answer to the complaint Dr. Mitchell puts in the following terms—"I have often tried to imagine what changes he (Dr. Salmon) would be likely to make if he were writing at the present day. A clearer understanding and more accurate statement of some of the (Roman) Catholic doctrines he was controverting might reasonably be expected. Misrepresentation of the meaning of infallibility and of the claim to infallible authority that is made for the Pope, intelligible perhaps in the heated atmosphere of 1870, would surely have disappeared." The failure to understand what was meant by "Infallibility" was not confined to Dr. Salmon in 1870 or since. It was not confined to Protestants: it affected Roman Catholics in 1870, and its limits and significance are unsettled to this day.

A Papal utterance made in the light of the definition of Infallibility set out by the Vatican Council in 1870, may be to-day plain enough: but what are the methods by which we can know if a Papal utterance made before 1870 is "ex cathedra"? What is the precise distinction between "ex cathedra" and all other solemn Papal pronouncements?

Writing of 1870 Dr. Mitchell refers to "the ignorance and misunderstanding in the popular mind concerning the issues involved". The fault may have been due to the confusion as to what Infallibility meant. The confusion was not confined to the popular mind, but affected even theologians (as we imagine it still does). We have heard of "maximisers", i.e. those who wanted the most extreme claims made for Papal Infallibility, and of "minimisers", i.e. those who wanted the least ambitious definition; one which would restrict the dogma to narrow confines. Little wonder then that "the popular mind" was filled with misunderstanding, and little wonder that Dr. Salmon found it hard to learn precisely what the dogma taught.

If a clearer understanding of Papal Infallibility has been reached to-day, it has been reached, not by the Protestant controversialist, but by the Roman theologians themselves. Dr. Salmon cannot be blamed for failing to anticipate an interpretation of Infallibility which only gradually emerged over a period of seventy years or so.

Dr. Mitchell thinks that recent study of Church history and patristic writings must lead to some revision of Dr. Salmon's views. No doubt that is true, and Salmon had an open mind, for his latest book "The Human Element in the Gospels" is a revision of some views he had set out in the much earlier "Introduction to the New Testament" (Whether the later views are superior to the earlier ones does not concern us). But the question is, have recent studies in Church history etc. shown that the statements in Salmon are wrong, or that evidence is falsified, or quotations are garbled? We have no real reason to think that a wiser, more truthful, or more learned school of Anglican students has arisen since Salmon's day. There are Anglicans who differ from Salmon (largely because they belong to a different school of thought), but they do not differ because they are better scholars, endowed with better critical faculties. They differ because in some respects they are worse scholars, and less critical.

A reference to "the few positive positions he (Salmon) ventured to take up" seems to us to show that Dr. Mitchell has not grasped the purpose Dr. Salmon had, and the limitations it imposed on him. Salmon was not primarily concerned with positive positions in his lectures. He wanted to do something drastic: i.e. to show how little foundation there is for any theory of Church infallibility. His method has been called negative and destructive. He was well aware of that. If asked what alternative be offered in place of Infallibility he could answer "none". Infallibility was emphatically not one of the notes of the Church, and that is what he set out to demonstrate.

Dr. Mitchell may see in this an indication of "the essentially negative and unprogressive character of Protestant controversial literature", but how is it to be otherwise? If Pope Honorius was anathematised as a heretic how can that fact progress? If Decretals were forged, no passage of time can render them authentic. If Extreme Unction is not a sacrament ordained by Christ in the Gospel the centuries of claiming that it is, do not make it so.

If new answers to old arguments are not forthcoming, and if old ones are still used it is because they are the answers. As to Protestant Controversial work being negative—there must be firm "noes" to a lot of ill-founded assertions. New facts to transform the whole anti-Roman position have not been discovered. What we find in some circles is a growing tendency to accept Roman presuppositions, and to react against Protestant principles, but this is not evidence of profounder learning or greater wisdom.

Dr. Mitchell refers to Dr. Murphy's articles on Salmon's book (Irish Ecclesiastical Record 1901-02) and says that Dr. Murphy shows that the Infallibility attacked by Salmon was a fabric of his own imagination, and that he failed to understand or at least to state accurately the doctrines he was controverting, and that he had most shamefully misrepresented some of the authorities, both ancient and modern. These are very weighty charges and as we have not yet mastered Dr. Murphy's work we do not attempt to discuss them. We hope to study them in our pages in the near future.

A man who is mentally and spiritually conditioned by Church or Papal Infallibility will always be at a loss to know how one can believe anything unless it has the endorsement of an infallible authority. Hence Dr. Mitchell writes "It is hard to see how anything but a sense of bewilderment and utter indifference could await those who might have been convinced by his (Salmon's) arguments of the unsoundness of the Roman position." If the reference is to the students who attended Dr. Salmon's lectures, then the answer is that they were the very men who came fresh to the ministry of a church which had just suffered disestablishment, and put their faith, hope, vigour and spiritual energies most successfully into it. They laboured manfully in the Gospel at home, and upheld the missionary task abroad. The Irish Protestant clergy of the last quarter of the nineteenth century were second to none. They were not afflicted by bewilderment or utter indifference.

If the reference is to those Roman Catholics who were led by Salmon's arguments to deny Papal Infallibility and turn Protestant, then the answer is that the few we have heard of, and the one or two we knew personally were faithful evangelical Christians and good and loyal churchmen. The fact is that Infallibility is not a necessity. Men fared as well before they decided that the Pope is infallible as they have done since. The two infallible decisions most to the front today—the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, and her Assumption declared to be true what were for long enough popular religious beliefs. As exercises of the infallible prerogative these have added nothing to the faith of ordinary people. They have given that faith a confirmation it scarcely needed.

religion in the service of their interests and their class prejudices.

"If these measures are to be maintained they will trouble the consciences of Christians engaged in the struggle of the working-class at the moment when so many efforts are being made to withdraw them from the common fight and to cast discredit on their faith.

"The worker-priests claim for them and for all Christians the right to effective solidarity with the workers in their just fight.

"Militant working men and the working-class trust the worker-priests and have respected their priesthood. This respect and this confidence, while they continue to be shown towards us, forbid us to accept any compromise which would consist in claiming to remain members of the working-class without working normally and without accepting the commitments and the responsibilities of workers. In consequence we affirm that our decisions will be taken with complete respect for the workers situation (la condition ouvrière) and for the fight of the workers for their liberation."

Challenge to Bishops.

If "Le Monde's" interpretation of the attitude of at least some of the signatories is correct, this declaration would seem to be intended first of all to provoke a statement from the bishops expressing much more emphatic sympathy than the bishops are likely to do with a very radical Left-wing attitude to social conflicts. The French Church has indeed gone out of its way to support the right to strike and to condemn social injustices, and it can scarcely go further.

Secondly, the declaration is perhaps preparing the way for the refusal by some of its signatories of specialised missionary activity among the industrial workers, such as the bishops seem to have in mind in their letter now that it is no longer accompanied by a specialised status for the missionaries. In fact it must be doubted whether the signatories of the declaration have served their cause effectively. After the bishops' letter specifically stating that they were acting on detailed instructions from the Pope, this declaration can scarcely be interpreted otherwise than a revolt against the highest Catholic authority.

The declaration itself uses a vocabulary very different from that of the bishops in that the word "class," which the bishops never used, occurs frequently. The underlying assumption seems to be that the class war is an inevitable—and a just if not indeed a Holy war. That is exactly the onus of the case brought against the worker-priests by their most hostile critics, even though it has not been the case which the bishops appear to have accepted so far.

The conclusion of the worker-priests declaration seems to be that only a chaplain in the class war army can hope to have the ear of the French working man. That they have reached this conclusion is in itself very interesting. The bishops, however, can scarcely be expected to accept it. They have already issued their warning that the one discipline for which they are responsible and the first discipline for every priest is that of the Church.

What the 73 worker-priests seem to have done is to force to the fore the question that Cardinal Feltin has already said is so gravely preoccupying the Pope, namely the tendency of some French Catholics to adopt a "neo-protestant" attitude. It was apparent a year ago when large groups of French Catholics rejected the application of canon law to the case of the Finaly children. It is apparent in this declaration. Recent comments in the organs of French Catholicism most sympathetic to the worker-priests have, however, clearly been in favour of submission—even though evidently sorrowful and pained submission—"Manchester Guardian," 4/2/54.

THE BIRTH OF A BIBLE SOCIETY IN THE STRAND

In December 1831 the Trinitarian Bible Society was born at Exeter Hall, Strand, and has continued for 122 years doing an important work in circulating pure versions of the Word of God. To-day the Society is as vigorous as ever, and is sending tens of thousands of Hebrew Scriptures to Israel, and large quantities of other languages to various parts of the world.

Vatican Appeal to Worker-Priests—Sympathy and Firmness.

PARIS, FEBRUARY 8.

A broadcast appeal from the Vatican radio to the worker-priests—or, rather, "priests of the working-men's mission", to give them the new title that no-one as yet remembers to use—once again expresses the Church's warm sympathy with these men and clearly indicates the great importance which the Catholic authorities attach to securing their submission to the Pope's ruling.

The author of the appeal, Father Beslay, is closely associated with French missionary activities of various kinds. The text of his broadcast, as reported in the French press, is not perhaps entirely reliable; but its general tenor was that whereas the worker-priests did succeed in breaking down the barriers between themselves and their fellow-workers in the factories they were provoking new doubts among other Catholics, and that the Church had been bound to take this into account, though no less resolute than before to put an end to the divorce between itself and the French working class.

While the appeal ends with a call for complete submission, it seems to imply that to have signed the declaration of protest will not in itself be a bar (from the Church's point of view, at any rate) to further activity by the signatories in the field that they have chosen. The 73 signatories to the declaration comprise about four-fifths of the secular priests who have been working in the factories. According to the Vatican spokesman, only three of them have so far refused to submit.

—"Manchester Guardian", 9/2/54.

70% Submit.

No official figures are ready, but it is understood that about 70% of the worker-priests, including all those who were members of an Order (Jesuits, Dominicans and Franciscans) have accepted their instructions, withdrawn from their factories and given up any trade union or other responsibilities that they had accepted.

About 30 worker-priests have not yet done so. All of these, it will be noticed, are secular priests and are, therefore, particularly the responsibility

A MODERN CRITIC OF SALMON'S

The Rev. Professor G. Mitchell of Maynooth College in his article on the new edition of Salmon's book (Irish Theological Quarterly, January 1953) says "It is hard to understand how the claim that Salmon has never been answered could have been seriously entertained at any time much less revived at this late stage." But the fact surely is that Salmon's book was not "answered" for a long time after its appearance. Dr. Mitchell refers to an answer which appeared serially in the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record"—1901-02 by a Dr. Murphy, but that was many years after Salmon first published his lectures (1888). He regrets that Dr. Murphy's "answer" had little notice taken of it, and that it never received the recognition it deserved. We may ask "whose fault is that?" If Dr. Murphy's "answer" was convincing, not to say conclusive, his authorities and co-religionists ought to have boosted it. It is hardly satisfactory to say as Dr. Mitchell does, that the points made by Salmon have, in other connections been replied to "over and over again." The book Dr. Salmon published is a challenge, and an equally available reply ought to have been issued, for even if the average Roman Catholic knew how to refute Salmon (which we beg to doubt), has not Rome, by virtue of her claims, a duty to enlighten Protestants so that they may relinquish their errors? How many Protestants in Ireland and Great Britain are likely to be convinced of Dr. Salmon's futility and wrongheadedness by being told that the proofs are in a serial in the "Ecclesiastical Record" of 1901?

Again, if Salmon's "infallibility" is such a defective and unscholarly work, and quite out-of-date, and so no longer important, why have the managers of the "Irish Ecclesiastical Record" reprinted in 1953 Dr. Murphy's articles? Further, as the "Ecclesiastical Record" does not circulate among Protestants, and not even among the Roman Catholic laity (though it is a most interesting and instructive magazine), but almost exclusively, we imagine, among priests and religious, it is hard to see why they need to be armed against the obsolete Dr. Salmon, even in his new condensed edition.

Strange to say, several priests we have known who forsook the Roman obedience found Dr. Salmon's book an eye and mind-opener.

At this point we must state that since writing our previous article on Dr. Mitchell's criticisms we notice in the booksellers' lists a book on "Infallibility" by Dom Butler, O.S.B. This is intended to be an answer to Dr. Salmon. It is by the eminent Benedictine scholar who, a year or two ago, criticised the new edition of Salmon in "The Times Literary Supplement." We are looking forward to studying it with keen enjoyment.

It was easy to speak belittlingly of Salmon in the cloistered circles, and to ignore him in the seminaries. It was, we think, an error on the part of Irish and British Roman Catholics to publish nothing in reply in Salmon's lifetime (or at least to wait till the last year of his life when he was too old and infirm to do much), for Salmon's position quite apart from the merits of his work, gave his book real importance. It was the standing of the author—Provost of Trinity College, Dublin and head of the University of Dublin, and the lectures had been given by him as Regius Professor of Divinity in the foremost Anglican Divinity School of that day.

There was a duty upon Roman Catholic scholars to enlighten the non-Roman Catholic world as to the true significance of "Infallibility"—to explain its meaning, to interpret its significance, to resolve its difficulties, to overcome objections, whether historical or theological. If it is correct, as Dr. Mitchell says, that "Dr. Murphy clearly established that Dr. Salmon's attack on infallibility was directed against a fabric of his own imagination, and that there was on his part a constant failure to understand or at least to state accurately the doctrines he was controverting," we are inclined to think that Dr. Salmon found it hard to discover just what Rome and the Vatican Council meant by the decree of infallibility. We referred to this before, and we repeat it. Evidence of this uncertainty seems to be available in the fact that there is no settled decision as to what pronouncements of Popes are infallible. We know that the Marian dogmas of 1854 and 1950 (Immaculate Conception and Assumption) are reckoned infallible, but no one can tell us what previous decisions of Popes are.

A more serious challenge, as previously noted, to Dr. Salmon is that "he most shamefully misrepresented some of his authorities, both ancient and modern. If Dr. Murphy had done nothing more than show up the unscrupulous way in which the name and authority of Cardinal Newman and some of the fathers of the Church are made use of... he could have done enough to discredit Dr. Salmon as a reliable theologian."

This is a severe accusation, but must wait till we have occasion to study Dr. Murphy's work. On the face of it it seems unlikely that Dr. Salmon would have been so foolish as to distort Newman or the Fathers, for he could have been so easily detected, and he was no fool. We recall that in a certain place he quotes Newman and then in a footnote quotes another statement of Newman more or less denying the first. Salmon observes that it is not up to him to reconcile these inconsistencies or contradictions, but only to record them. We may suppose that in many instances the Fathers were not all of the one opinion, and disagreed at times with each other, and, at times with themselves. Salmon knew the Fathers pretty well, and knew Rome's way of using them and of introducing spurious passages into them (one may refer to the employment of corrupted passages of the Fathers by St. Alphonsus Liguori—the saint used the texts current in his day and accepted them as genuine). We are therefore inclined to think that if Salmon had in his active years seen Murphy's criticisms he would have had effective answers.

Dr. Mitchell does not give us any instance of Dr. Salmon's misrepresentations of the Fathers or of Cardinal Newman. He goes on to condemn Dr. Salmon for failure to distinguish authorised teaching from the opinions or unguarded statements of particular divines, though Dr. Salmon constantly warned his students to do so. "Practically on every page these protestations are belied by his practice." He complains that Salmon did not devote much study after the Vatican Council to its decrees. He finds no evidence of acquaintance with the best theological thought of the post-council period.

A small question intrudes itself into the mind—what is the criterion of "the best" in this connection? Is that the best theology which makes the most of the decree of infallibility (maximising) or is that the best which gives the most moderate interpretation (minimising)? Dr. Mitchell suggests that Dr. Salmon had not studied Franzelin's "De Divina Traditione," but did not Dr. Salmon warn his hearers to distinguish authorised teaching from that of particular divines, and is not Franzelin a particular divine?

"The best" is so often what appeals to our individual tastes, prejudices, mental habits, that we need an objective standard.

We are inclined to agree, however, with Dr. Mitchell that some full note should have been taken, in preface or elsewhere, of later Roman Catholic explanations of Infallibility, so that we might have had in the new edition the material brought up-to-date. That is not to say that we accept his view that Salmon gives "a false picture."

The second part of Dr. Mitchell's criticism begins by objecting to Dr. Salmon's view that the whole Roman Catholic controversy turns on the Infallibility of the Church. We have heard Dr. Salmon criticised by Protestant divines on the same ground. The late Rev. John Warren (author of "Ireland and her Fairy Godmother," "The Biretta Blight," "The Review of Ritualism," "Religion and the Emotions"), who was a very serious and learned scholar, told us that he could not agree with Salmon. He held that the vital difficulties were those which affected the ordinary man in his ordinary observances and worship, and that as a consequence the conflicting views on justification were still the important grounds of difference. Dr. Mitchell however tries to conclude that Dr. Salmon did not like an infallible guide, and had little use for a personal teaching authority of any kind. This is we think unfair to the man who pointed out that though the school-master is not infallible we may still find in him another and valuable sort of usefulness.

Protestants do not deny that Christ did Himself institute a personal teaching authority for the preservation and transmission of His teaching, but they may disagree with the Roman Catholic as to the meaning of the words "personal," and "transmission." They can see that "a personal teaching authority" is recognised without admitting that the immediate and logical step is to say that the authority must be infallible. That is the step we deny.

"The Concept of a teaching Church as traditional Christianity has understood it has no place in Dr. Salmon's system." We have no hesitation in saying that "the teaching church" as displayed over many centuries (by "traditional Christianity" we understand the mediæval system) must be judged by the Word of God which is the Rule of Faith. As Dr. Salmon believed in the supremacy of Holy Scripture and that it was the source of revealed truth, he must have noted much that developed in a direction opposed to Scripture. A Church which teaches as necessary to salvation much more than Scripture teaches was not likely to appeal to him, or to establish itself as the divine guide.

"Once it is accepted that the Church is a divine institution there is nothing really remarkable about its claim to infallibility." In these words Dr. Mitchell puts forward the popular and fallacious "argument" for infallibility. The divine origin of the Church is accepted by evangelical Christians because it is scripture teaching ("The Church which is His body"—St. Paul. "On this rock I will build my Church"—Our Lord Jesus Christ), but it is an unwarranted, if plausible, jump to pass from that to belief in infallibility: it is a further unwarranted step to jump from "the infallibility of the Church", to the infallibility of the Pope! If the Pope were merely the Church's mouthpiece this jump might be allowable, but he is not the mouthpiece of the Church but rather the mouthpiece of the spirit. At least that is how it appears to us since it is laid down that "infallible" utterances of the Pope are irreformable of themselves, and not because they are decisions endorsed by Councils of the Church.

What is needed is a true definition of the Church. If we accepted the Roman Catholic view then no doubt Dr. Mitchell would be right in thinking that little more is needed to argue its infallibility. The truth is, as Roman Catholics have often pointed out, we rarely attach the same meaning to the words we use in common. The words are familiar ones, but the ideas behind are different. "The divine institution" of the Church is one thing for the non-Roman Catholic, and another for the Roman Catholic.

Naturally the question of Tradition arise in all discussions of infallibility. Dr. Mitchell gives a correct account of the reason the Protestant has for refusing to put Scripture and Tradition on an equal footing—it is that “to their way of thinking, to do so amounts to an equiparation of human with divine authority”. This means simply putting divine and human authority on the same level.

To the best of our knowledge this exaltation of Tradition was not official Church teaching until the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century decided that Scripture and Tradition were equal sources of truth. Hence the Protestant thinkers were justified in writing of “the new Trent religion” (John Evelyn). It was a new development, and a radical departure from the older belief in the supremacy of Scripture. It was not Protestantism which made the radical change, but Rome.

Dr. Mitchell says that his Church believes that both Scripture and Tradition have God as author, and that Tradition is conserved in the infallible magisterium of the Church. We remark that the function of Tradition is not to augment Revelation or to supplement it, but merely to interpret it, and to supply method and usage in regard to secondary activities. It is not intended to serve the same purpose as God’s Word.

To-day, Tradition has failed to meet the needs of the Roman Catholic Church. Three years ago it was admitted that no ancient tradition was available to justify the dogma of the Bodily Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary into heaven. The infallible magisterium of the Church had not preserved such a belief from primitive times.

“Dr Salmon undoubtedly presents the case against Tradition with considerable cleverness.” Are not these words of Dr. Mitchell an admission that Dr. Salmon had something serious to say which cannot easily be gainsaid? We are often in the habit of calling a man in an argument “clever” when we dislike the point of view but don’t quite see how we are to meet it. His answer is to raise the question whether Our Lord intended that Scripture or a personal teaching authority should perpetuate His message till the end of time. Our answer is that this is a wrongly devised reply, for “the personal teaching authority” did in fact commit its tradition and message to writings, and the truths the apostles were to hand on became Holy Scripture. In fact, Scripture is the Tradition of the Lord and His apostles. What is otherwise called Tradition must therefore always be subordinate to Scripture. Scripture is primary, and Tradition secondary. The error of Trent was, after fifteen hundred years, to raise Tradition to the level of Scripture.

Tradition is understood exclusively in the sense of an historical proof that particular doctrines can de facto be traced to Christ and the apostles, that Dr. Salmon’s structures can be thought of as reaching their mark.” The point Dr. Mitchell makes here is that Tradition is never “Tradition” apart from the infallible teaching authority of the Church—“that only is Tradition which is handed on by the teaching authority itself”. It really looks to us as if Tradition is guaranteed by the infallible authority, and the infallible authority is guaranteed by Tradition. On what ground can the infallible teaching authority be made to rest, other than the will to believe that there must be such an authority?

Dr. Mitchell’s last section reviews Dr. Salmon’s account of the Vatican Council and its procedure. Dom Cuthbert Butler, O.S.B. published in 1930 a history of the Vatican Council and has perhaps corrected some mistakes as to numbers in Salmon’s account. It will never be agreed by all that the titular bishops and others were completely free to vote as they felt convinced. Butler thinks they were; Quirinus (Dollinger, etc.) thought not. We may leave a problem which is beyond us, but may refer to another study of the Council—J. B. Bury’s volume on the Nineteenth Century Papacy. This work by a great Irish historian was edited by another eminent Irish historian, Dr. R. H. Murray.

The closing words of Dr. Mitchell are to the effect that Salmon’s book in its new edition “will do little to promote the cause of Christian truth”: that must be a matter of opinion. “It will not help towards the mutual understanding which so many Protestants and Catholics ardently desire at the present time.” When so much else exists to hinder such understanding in Ireland and elsewhere the addition to it afforded by Salmon is small.

We see no reason to apologise as Irish Churchmen for Dr. Salmon, and no reason to regard his book obsolete, perverse, unhistorical or unChristian. It is a book of criticism. As such it will always deserve close attention. We think Dr. Mitchell might have written something in reply to the lectures in “The Infallibility of the Church” on 1. “The hesitations of the infallible guide” and 2. “The blunders of the infallible guide”.

EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

Summary of Calvin’s Commentary.

Chapter 4, verse 11:—St. Paul explains the distribution of gifts (of ministry) and illustrates at greater length that out of this variety (apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers) arises unity in the Church, as the various tones in music produce sweet melody. The meaning may be summed up thus "The external ministry of the Word is commended on account of the advantages which it yields. Certain men appointed to that office, are employed in preaching the gospel. This is the arrangement by which the Lord is pleased to govern his Church, and to maintain its existence, and ultimately to secure its highest perfection."

"When men are called by God, gifts are necessarily connected with offices. God does not confer on men the mere names of Apostles or Pastors, but also endows them with gifts, without which they cannot properly discharge their office."

"Some, Apostles," (verse 11)—"Those highly favoured persons whom Christ exalted to the highest honour. Such were the pastors, to whose number Paul was added. Their office was to spread the doctrine of the gospel throughout the world, to plant churches, and to erect the Kingdom of Christ. They had not churches of their own committed to them."

* * *

"Next, evangelists, closely allied in the nature of their office, but held an inferior rank. To this class belonged Timothy and others. The services in which the Lord employed them were auxiliary to those of the apostles."

* * *

"Prophets—By this some understand persons who possessed the gift of predicting future events, among whom was Agabus (Acts 11, 28). But, I would rather define the word to mean distinguished interpreters of prophecies, who, by a remarkable gift of revelation, applied them to the subjects which they had occasion to handle."

"Pastors and teachers—Paul speaks indiscriminately of pastors and teachers as one and the same class, and that the name teacher applies to all pastors. But the two offices should not be confounded. Teaching is the duty of all pastors; but to maintain sound doctrine requires a talent for interpreting Scripture, and a man may be a teacher who is not qualified to preach."

"Pastors are those who have charge of a particular flock; though I have no objection to their receiving the name of teachers if it be understood that there is a distinct class of teachers, who preside both in the education of pastors and in the instruction of the whole Church. It may sometimes happen that the same person is both a pastor and teacher, but the duties to be performed are entirely different."

"It deserves attention that, of the five offices enumerated, not more than the last two are intended to be perpetual. Apostles, Evangelists and Prophets were bestowed in the Church for a limited time only. But without Pastors and Teachers there can be no government of the Church."

"Roman Catholics have some reason to complain that their primacy is insulted in this passage. The subject of discussion is the unity of the Church. Paul enquires into the means by which its continuance is secured, and the outward expressions by which it is promoted, and comes at length to the government of the Church. If he knew of a primacy which had a fixed residence was it not his duty, for the benefit of the whole Church, to exhibit one ministerial head placed over all the members, under whose government we are all collected into one body? We must either charge Paul with neglect in leaving out the most appropriate and powerful argument, or we must acknowledge that this primacy is at variance with the appointment of Christ."

"There is no passage of Scripture by which that hierarchy, regulated by one earthly head, is more completely overturned. Paul has been followed by Cyprian (Bishop of Carthage, N. Africa, A.D. 250) who gives a short and clear definition of what forms the only lawful monarchy in the Church. There is, he says, one bishopric, which unites the various parts into one whole. This bishopric he claims for Christ alone, leaving the administration of it to individuals, but in a united capacity, no one being permitted to exalt himself above others."

Verse 14:—"That we may be no more children tossed to and fro by every mind of doctrine, by the cunning of men"—"There will always be impostors who make insidious attacks on our faith. When new sects or wicked tenets spring up many persons become alarmed. But the attempts of Satan to darken the pure doctrine of Christ are at no time interrupted; and it is the will of God that these struggles should be the trial of our faith. When we are informed, on the other hand, that the best defence against every kind of error is to bring forward that doctrine which we have learnt from Christ and his Apostles, this surely is no ordinary consolation."

"We have embraced the law, the prophets, and the gospel. Let us therefore confidently expect that we shall reap the advantage which is here promised—that all the impostures of men will do us no harm. They will attack us, but they will not prevail. We are entitled to look for the dispensation of sound doctrine from the Church, for God has committed it to her charge."

PORTRAIT OF IRELAND. THE LENTEN PASTORALS.

The custom of issuing pastoral letters to be read at the beginning of Lent to their flocks is long established among Roman Catholic bishops, and is a salutary one when the object is to guide the faithful past moral and spiritual pitfalls. We find ourselves, as a rule, at one with the prelates in condemning the evils of all-night dancing, and in upholding the virtue of purity. We agree in all the sympathy expressed with those who are afflicted and downtrodden (Dr. Mageean, Down and Connor), and in urging the supreme social, moral, and spiritual importance of family life (Dr. O'Callaghan, Clogher). We wish, of course, that matters precious to Christians such as the study of God's Word, and the proper respect for the Lord's Day could be given greater prominence. We also long to see, in the rules of Lenten abstinence and fasting, restrictions placed upon the amount of strong drink to be consumed. We may be very stupid, but it does seem to us that abstinence from alcoholic beverages in Lent would be a far more commendable piece of self discipline or austerity than eating meat only once a day. A man who eats meat twice a day is scarcely likely to be the cause of so much human misery as the man who drinks ad lib. He may put on weight, but that may not deprave him to the same extent as alcohol will.

This year, 1954, being the Marian Year: the centenary of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary; it is natural that much attention should be directed to Marian devotions. The Cardinal Archbishop of Armagh, Dr. D'Alton, and the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin gave much space to these matters.

The Most Rev. Dr. D'Alton writes that "we should honour her (the Blessed Virgin) for the essential though subordinate part that she, as the second Eve, played in the salvation of the world". We recognise that the Blessed Virgin is the mother of Our Lord, and that in a figurative and picturesque sense she may be called "the second Eve", but we detect, as all who put Holy Scripture and its teaching first must, that the association of the Blessed Virgin with our redemption is a doctrine which may appear to be logical, but which really is not. It was not as the son of the Blessed Virgin, but as representative man, typifying the people of God, that the Saviour died on Calvary.

"With full confidence we can appeal to her" says the Cardinal. But that is just what we are unable to concur in; because we have no evidence that the dead who "die in the Lord" have any part with those who are still in the body. It is an attractive thought, to believe that the saints in the presence of God are aware of our needs, and hear us and intercede for us, but is there in fact any proof of it? The Bible gives no assistance. Its silence ought to be conclusive, especially as it reveals to us that there are beings, whom God permits to aid us, i.e. the angels, not the saints at rest.

We have no wish or reason to differ from the Cardinal in his emphasis on the benefits to be derived by all from the example of Our Lord's Mother. Is there a nobler ideal for Christian womanhood than the one enshrined in her words "Behold the handmaid of the Lord"? Yet this does not call for any assertion of Immaculate Conception. When St. Paul tells us that Our Lord Jesus Christ came "in the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. 8, 3) we can scarcely suppose that he had any idea of a supreme miracle having taken place at the Conception of the Blessed Virgin. The Christian need only be concerned with the supreme miracle of the Incarnation—"the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us" in fulfilment of the prophecy of Isaiah "Behold a Virgin shall conceive and bear a Son and shall call His name Immanuel".

The Blessed Virgin, "both because of her close association with her Divine Son in His redemptive mission and her own surpassing merits, is in a most favoured position to obtain from Him all the help we need during our period of exile upon earth"—with all respect to the Cardinal-Archbishop we again declare that the greatest veneration for Our Lord's Mother does not call for the opinion that she is the Co-redemptrix of the human race. She did not pay the price of sin, and the fact that her Son did establish for ever the uniqueness of a redemption which is entirely His. He, with the Father and the Holy Spirit will give us the help we need—God said to St. Paul “My grace is sufficient for thee”, and God’s grace is mediated through one mediator only “the Man Christ Jesus”.

We see from the pastoral of the Most Rev. Dr. Walsh, Archbishop of Tuam that the Roman Catholics of that Western province are to be called on “to assemble (at a meeting-place in each diocese) as an Act of Faith in the efficacy of Mary’s intercession, and to proclaim their determination to persevere in the daily recitation of the family Rosary”. If it could be proclaimed far and wide throughout Ireland that “If any man sin we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and He is the propitiation for our sins” (1 John 2, 1) and “This Man, because He continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood : wherefore He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them” (Hebr. 7. 24, 25), then we think that a new realisation of the glory of our Redeemer would dawn in Irish hearts : the love of God manifested in Him who is “the lover of our souls” would make Him personal and precious to us all in a fresh and decisive way. No longer would we seek other mediators when we realised that we are to ask “in His Name”.

We are glad to note that this pastoral speaks out plainly against business dishonesty, and the expenditure of too much of the family income on drink and gambling. The effects of the disregard of God’s Commandments are plain everywhere in our country, and we have not the excuse of the corrupting influences of great urban and industrial centres of population.

The Bishop of Limerick is more optimistic about our people than his colleague the Archbishop of Tuam. In Limerick we are complimented—“the people had great reason for gratitude to Almighty God on account of the high moral standards of the people of this country, the vast majority of whom led truly good and Christian lives”. We fear such compliments may lead to complacency and to the assumption that we are better than others. Are there such high moral standards in work and business, in trade and dealing, that we can congratulate ourselves? Perhaps “moral standards” in Ireland never mean anything but standards of sexual morality : if so, it is a rather restricted view of morality.

In the Northern Parts of the republic of Eire, in the diocese of Kilmore, the Most Rev. Dr. Quinn said, inter alia, that “the prospect opened up by modern views on the fifth commandment (Douay version of Exodus 20—‘Thou shalt not Kill’) was indeed alarming. The taking of human life was never justified by considerations which had no relation to the law of God.” The taking of human life, except by judicial process, or in war, is not considered to be justified by any considerations. That needs emphasis in a country in which murder for political reasons, or under the shadow of politics, has often been a mere incident without any sense of culpability. But the bishop is concerned with the killing of unborn children, due to loss of respect for pre-natal life. It seems to us that in Ireland under public health services this sort of thing will be carefully guarded against. Here, abortion is counted to be a very serious crime, and very little is heard of such offences.

Mercy-Killing is also referred to in this pastoral. We do not think the law in Ireland is likely to condone it, but it is right to have a public awareness of these grave moral problems.

The bishop of Kerry, Most Rev. Dr. Moynihan said that “the Canon Law of the Church forbade Sunday public trading, markets, public buying and selling, unless there was a contrary legitimate custom, or special indult in their favour”. He held that the opening of shops on Sunday mornings and early afternoons should be discouraged. It is obvious that the opening of cafes, restaurants, confectioners, and publicans’ shops is very well established in most countries on Sundays (in Northern Ireland publicans may not open on Sundays), and the claim is made that the sale of food and drink is different from other commodities. But we have noticed in the back streets of Dublin on Sundays that some drapers’ shops are open. We should regard this as a breach of the Canon Law the bishop refers to. But we regret that he did not say something more serious—that Sunday trading in general is a breach of the law of God. We often think that the Ten Commandments are not as popular in Ireland as they should be. But whether it is to be the Commandments or the Canon Law, we greatly wish that a deeper and more spiritual view of the Lord’s Day could be restored in our midst. We know that the force of popular opinion, and the prevailing influences are against it, but we still long for the day when the spiritual leaders of the majority will realise their duty in this matter. Dr. Moynihan has made a good beginning.

In the Roman Catholic diocese of Dublin the usual condemnation of Roman Catholics who attend what is described as “the Protestant University of 'Trinity College' without ecclesiastical sanction, is published. We understand that the number of Roman Catholic students in that Protestant University increases, and have been told that they are now the largest single denomination of undergraduates. If this is so then the granting of permission must go on apace. If hundreds of Roman Catholic students are in T.C.D. it cannot be a place dangerous to faith and morals. It seems to the outsider strange that it should be a mortal sin for parents and guardians to send young people to that college (or other Protestant institution); but that the mortal sin can be done away with, or not exist at all, if permission is given by the church authority. Yet the institutions remain the same and unchanged in the least degree throughout.

We notice one pastoral letter in which it was suggested that Protestants suffered from inhibitions where the Blessed Virgin was concerned. We do certainly draw back from exuberance of devotion, and are restrained in our attitude by the lack of foundation for modern Roman Catholic dogmas. But we have no inhibitions in going as far as the New Testament warrants us. A person writing to score a point by a "Tu quoque" might say that Roman Catholics have obsessions in regard to her.

* * *

One other letter seemed to suggest that Protestants were vague and uncertain in their beliefs about the Holy Trinity and the divinity of Our Lord. We can only say that a reference to the Book of Common Prayer, to the Westminster Confession and Shorter Catechism and to the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of Ireland will show that Presbyterians and Anglicans, the only substantial bodies of Protestants in Ireland, are impeccably orthodox. This holds for Methodists and Baptists too.

PRIESTHOOD OF THE CLERGY— WHAT?

By Canon Lindsay
New Books.

"Ye are the temple of the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in you," writes St. Paul (1 Cor. iii, 16). Now it is only by giving attentive reflection to this great contrast between the sacerdotal system as accepted and practised in the Old Testament and rejected in the New that we can arrive at a true interpretation of the anti-typical character of the priesthood of Christ and of its presentation to us by the New Testament writers in general. And here I would call your attention to the titles so suggestively given in the last 27 books of our Bible. "They are called the New Testament or Covenant." What makes these books new but the revelation of the NEW priesthood, the NEW sacrifice and the NEW religion of Jesus which entirely supercedes all that was temporary in the Old, the NEW passover in the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper: and surely the reformers could not have been wrong when, in sticking closely to Scripture, they cut out that same word sacerdotes from the ordinal and put in its place the word Presbuteros—the abbreviated form of which is the word "priest" which is in use throughout our Prayer Book to this very day—the word which St. Peter himself uses when he calls himself a fellow elder (1 Peter v 1). This is the reason why the reformers took away from our Ordination Service that portion where the minister was directed to offer sacrifices and that portion of the Communion Service in which the priest pretended to offer Christ's Body (see Anglo-Catholicism by Allison Weeks P. 12). Surely they could not have been wrong when, again, in their eagerness to keep close to the New Testament, they removed the stone altars which stood for an earthly sacrificial priesthood and put in their places the Holy Table which stands for the highest type of fellowship, viz., a holy companionship with Christ himself and with each other. Further—in the Latin of Article 31 when referring to those who had been formally ordained priest of Rome they used the term sacerdotem. In the Latin of Article xxxii when referring to those ordained in the Reformed Church they used the term "Presbyteris." They did this because they found that the one name which sacerdotalists applied to Christian minister is that which the New Testament denies them. Such actions on their part showed their eagerness to give Christ his rightful place in His priestly capacity, as Mediator, Intercessor and Advocate.

Sufficient Sacrifice.

Do we belittle the ministry by the rejection of the sacerdotal view? If we do, then we err in good company—the company of the very Apostles themselves who depended solely upon the priesthood of Christ, the very Christ who made there on the cross by His "one oblation of Himself once offered, a full perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation and satisfaction"—the Christian S.O.S.—"for the sins of the whole world and did institute and in His Holy Gospel command us to continue a perpetual memory of that His precious death unto His coming again." No! We do not belittle our ministry as long as we do not trespass on the exclusive pre-rogatives of the priesthood of Christ.

There was a sacerdotalist class on one occasion who assumed to themselves a priesthood contrary to that which typified the priesthood of Christ. But their priesthood was rejected and they themselves condemned. Moses said unto them: "Ye take too much upon yourselves ye sons of Levi and seek ye the priesthood also?" (Numbers xvi: 3, 7 and 10.)

And to guard against the Christian ministry of the Anglican Communion falling into the same sacerdotal error all our liturgiologists are careful and honest enough to explain as already stated that the word "priest" as used in our Prayer Book, is Presbuteros in its contracted form. The pity is, that the reformers did not keep—as Lightfoot and Whately would agree—to the more scriptural and uncontracted form Presbuteros, elder, presbeis, ambassador. This would have prevented a great deal of misunderstanding on the part of many who make but a cursory study of our Prayer Book. For instance, here is a Roman Catholic who takes you to our Ordinal Service. He quotes the words "Rev. Father in God, I present unto you these persons present to be admitted to the order of priesthood" and the Bishop replies: "Good people these are they whom we purpose (D.V.) to receive this day unto the Holy Office of priesthood." Then, after the Litany, Collect, Epistle, Gospel, Exhortation, Interrogations, Veni Creator Spiritus, and Prayer the Bishop says: "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands, whose sins thou dost retain they are retained." Now the R.C. reading all this assumes that the "priest" in our Prayer Book is the same as the "priest" in the Roman use. He asks: "How can you forgive in a priestly capacity if your word 'priest' differs from ours which has an exclusively sacerdotal meaning?"

Our reply is: "the word 'priest' in our Prayer Book has not the same meaning as yours. Our word priest is, as I repeat, the contracted form of the word presbuteros which means 'elder.' We forgive sins in a declarative sense, not as Christian hiereis, sacrificing priests, but rather as His Presbeis 'ambassadors.'" Thus we elevate the ministry to a higher position than the elevation boasted of in a more earthly priesthood. The late Canon Ryder, D.D. in his lectures in T.C.D. "On the priesthood of the laity" expressed our position well when he said: "The true title of the Christian minister is 'ambassador' and as such he pronounces the absolution. The term is not so much connected with the sacerdotal as with the pastoral and magisterial duties of this office. As his duty is to declare the conditions of God's grace, it is his duty also to proclaim the consequences of their acceptance. His office is representative and not vicarial; representation is necessary and consistent with the fact that the form of the ministry has been handed down from apostolic times. He is representative without being vicarial, he is the mouthpiece of a priestly order, his acts are acts of the congregation." PP. 227-8. "We have seen how the apostolic ideal was set forth and in 250 years forgotten."

Priesthoods Inflict Degradation.

Indeed, what Sir Edwin Arnold said of Buddhism in its infancy and purest state, might, with equal appropriateness, be said of Christianity and the extravagances which a self constituted priesthood has imposed upon it from its birth. Sir Edwin wrote in 1892: "The extravagances which disfigure the record and practice of Buddhism are to be referred to that inevitable degradation which priesthoods always inflict upon great ideas committed to their charge." (See the Light of Asia P. xii.)

Had similar extravagances not disfigured the earliest records of the Christian religion; had the ambassador conception of the Christian ministry prevailed and been strictly adhered to from the purest days of Christ until now, instead of the sacerdotal view adopted by the Romans and High Anglicans, what blunders and misunderstandings might have been avoided! There would be no such thing as a continual reproduction of a heathen or of a Jewish type of priesthood. Everyone would recognise and be content with the "priesthood of all believers" and with Christ as the central head. There would be no such thing as popery and with no popery there would be no such thing as Articles or the Westminster Confession, no such thing as the 39 Articles nor the Articles of the Council of Trent. In short, there would be no such thing as Romanism and no such thing as Protestantism in the sense in which we know these things to-day. All would be united as one great Christian Catholic body and Christ would be joyfully recognised as sovereign Lord of all. Again, we do not belittle our ministry when, in giving Christ his rightful place as our priest we, at the same time, give full recognition to the royal priesthood of all believers both clerical and lay combined.

Living Stones.

St. Peter was a firm believer in this when he wrote in 1 Peter Chap. ii: 2, 3, 4, 5: "As new born babies desire the sincere milk of the world that ye may grow thereby. If so be, ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious to whom coming as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men but chosen of God and precious, ye also as living stones are built up a spiritual house an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ... Ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a people for God's own possession." That is the charter of our common priesthood, and no one man or section of men has any right to arrogate to himself or to themselves that which is declared to be the common property of all.

Our prayer then is: "Grant that the ministers and stewards of Thy mysteries may likewise so prepare and make ready Thy way by turning the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just"—not by turning the elements of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, nor by turning to the east, west, north or south, for infinity cannot be confined within the limits of space. Rather is the emphasis laid on turning the hearts of the disobedient and this we must do as Christ's ambassadors. This is what Paul means when he writes in II Cor. v: 20, 21: "Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead be reconciled to God, for He hath made him to be sin for us who knew no sin that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. That is our commission, that is our task and we must seek to execute it as ministers and stewards."

The word for "ministers" there is most suggestive; it means a rower in the galleys. You can picture each member of these galleys centring his gaze on the eye of the captain, awaiting his orders and all pulling together to achieve the one grand objective. Similarly, with the word for "stewards:" it, too, is most suggestive: the steward is the one entrusted and commissioned to dispense only what is in his master's house and as his master would wish he dare not dispense anything else: to do so would be a breach of trust incurring the master's displeasure, wrath and condemnation. St. Paul himself and the local ministers and stewards felt this most keenly when writing his Epistle to Gal. Chap. i: 8, he says: "But though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach any other gospel unto you than that you have received let him be accursed" and, keeping this still in mind, in his address to the elders of Ephesus he says: "I take you to record this day that I am free from the blood of all men. I have kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, for I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." (Acts xx: 20, 27). "Ah yes, Paul," I can imagine someone saying: "But you have kept back from us the sacerdotes, the idea of a sacrificial priesthood in the Christian ministry, you have kept back from us the need for a repetition of the mass." "Yes," I can imagine Paul replying: "I have kept these things back from you because Christ, having fulfilled the law in his official and representative capacity as our great high priest, and having made one complete sacrifice on calvary once and for all has left no room for any other mass or any other sacrificial priesthood save the royal priesthood of all believers who offer up the spiritual sacrifices of their bodies, souls and spirits, their prayer, praises and thanksgivings to Almighty God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Faithful and True Pastors.

This was the gospel of the Christian church in its purest days and given to us by its purest preachers. It is the gospel which demands our faithfulness, loyalty and love. Well may we keep it in mind and well may we pray for its continuance in the language of the Collect for St. Matthias' day. "O Almighty God who into the place of the traitor Judas didst choose thy faithful servant Matthias to be of the number of the twelve apostles. Grant that Thy church, being always preserved from false apostles may be ordered and guided by faithful and true pastors, through Jesus our Lord"—"faithful and true pastors" not "priests" be it noted.

We do honour to our ministry by being faithful to our trust and faithful according to its original and truest concepts. And we magnify our office as "ministers and stewards" of the Gospel of the Kingdom carrying out the duties attached to each and as Christ's ambassadors. In our ambassadorial capacity our testimony must be identically the same as that claimed for the ministry by St. Paul who describes himself in Ephesians vi: 20 as an "ambassador in bonds" and who as I have already reminded you carries this conception of the ministry further when writing his 2nd Epistle to the Cor. Chap. v: 20, 21, he says: "Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead. Be ye reconciled to God for He hath made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him."

This is the reason why Paul tells us "Old things have passed away and all things have become new (II Cor. v: 17) and we are to purge out the old leaven "that we may become a new leaven" for "Christ our passover," having been sacrificed for us, has made all the difference and has wrought that complete transformation which had been foreshadowed in type, in Psalm, in history and in prophecy. For "He has opened up to us a new and living way" and "neither is there salvation in any other. For there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." I know that, in reply to the chief contention of this paper it may be said that all that the Anglo-Catholics contend for is a ministerial priesthood by which they mean a ministry in the sacrament of Holy Communion, joining with Christ in presenting what He has already presented within the veil. But even all this is contrary to the teaching of the New Testament. Christ is quite capable of making a complete presentation within the veil Himself. He doesn't need our help there. "For by one presentation He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (Hebrews x: 14). And, besides, as Dr. Ryder continues: "To plead or present a sacrifice ceremonially is really a distinct thing from sacrificing. Those who do but plead or present the sacrifice of another are not entitled to speak or be spoken of as though the act of sacrifice were their own" and Moberly agrees with this when he writes: "The words pleading or presenting in this connection must not be understood as describing anything corresponding to specific acts done or words spoken by Christ in His glory. His glorified presence is an eternal presentation. He pleads by that presentation which He himself is, as the hymn reads:

"Five bleeding wounds He bears,
Received on Calvary,
They pour effectual prayers,
They strongly plead for me,
Forgive him oh forgive they cry,
Nor let the ransomed sinner die."

Drifting Away.

What then, is to be our attitude to all this? Surely it is best expressed in the words of Hebrews Chap. ii: 1: "Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard lest haply we drift away from them."

The adoption of the sacerdotal system of priesthood by the Romans and Anglo-Catholics has proved, I believe, the necessity for such a warning against such drifting. That drift has been, as we saw at first, gradual until to-day it has become a regular rushing away from the simple truths of the Gospel down the ravine of a precipitate apostasy.

Such a drift reminds us of the notice at a given point leading to the Niagara Falls which reads: "Past Redemption Point" beyond which everything spells disaster and destruction. Alas! Alas! I have reason to lament such a thing happening to a fine handsome youth of St. Bartholomew's, Stranmillis, who paid no attention whatever to the notice "Past Redemption Point." Entering his narrow canoe on the Niagara he allowed it to drift on and on till he became obsessed with the pleasure and ease of drifting that he forgot the warning against such a peril and before long he discovered his mistake. He tried to row back against the stream but it was hopeless. The current proved too strong and both he and his boat plunged over the Fall's steep precipice and were lost forever. He left behind him a broken-hearted mother and father and brother through drifting.

Alas! Alas! Since the days which witnessed the adoption of the ancient Catholic Creeds of Christendom, the apostles', the Nicene, the Creed of St. Athanasius and of St. Patrick. Since the adoption of the decisions of the first four general councils—the Council of Nice A.D. 325; the Council of Constantinople A.D. 381, the Council of Ephesus A.D. 431 and the Council of Chalcedon A.D. 451, the Church of Rome has been drifting away from the early truths of these creeds and councils till in the year 1564 she added a new creed known as that of Pope Pius IV, and since then she has drifted further still into error by proclaiming the three new dogmas known as The Immaculate Conception of the B.V.M., December 8th, 1854; the Infallibility of the Pope, 19th July, 1870 and now the Assumption of the B.V.M. on "All Saints Day," November, 1950. To expect her to come back to the early truths of the Christian Catholic faith is, I fear, to expect too much as she appears to have passed "Redemption Point."

MR. FULTON OURSLER ON BARNABAS AND PAUL.

In the issue of Feb. 27th, 1954 of "Women's Illustrated" we find an instalment of Mr.

Oursler's "The Greatest Love Ever Known" in which the early Christian convert Barnabas (who sponsored Saul of Tarsus when he was converted—see the "Acts of the Apostles") figures. We are not told a great deal about him in the Bible, though the little St. Luke writes in "Acts" is full of spiritual and practical significance. "He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith." These words suggest that Barnabas was an Israelite: and of course he was, for he was a Levite. He was a generous contributor to the common fund of the infant Church in Jerusalem, and had family connections among the first Christians there.

Barnabas was born among the Jews of the Dispersion, so he may have been fittingly called a "Hellenist", i.e. a Jew whose normal language was Greek rather than Aramaic, and who was fairly at home in Greek ways of living. How far it is justifiable to endow these "Hellenistic" Jews with the culture of ancient Greece is doubtful indeed. St. Paul himself was brought up in the Dispersion, and was a citizen of an important Greek city (Tarsus), yet, we rarely find St. Paul spoken of as a "Hellenistic" Jew. We have even seen a contrast of Paul and Barnabas in which Paul is described as a rabbinically trained Pharisee, and Barnabas as a Jew of largely Greek culture and feeling. How do we know that Paul was not a man of Greek culture and feeling (at least subordinate to his Jewish faith) and that Barnabas had not had a rabbinical training? The fact is that we are too short of reliable information to be assertive in either direction.

Mr. Oursler however, can manufacture bricks without straw (and with very little clay), for he says that Barnabas "was an Hellenist, educated in the spirit and culture of Greek philosophers, artists, and dramatists. He could quote Aristotle and Plato, and was no stranger to the mysteries of old philosophical disputations." All this may be true, but our point is that it is mainly guessing. Guessing is a mistake when we are handling the teaching of Holy Scripture.

We have said before, and repeat, that nowadays when the Bible is little read it is a source of grave danger, if secondhand knowledge of the contents of God's Word is all people have. If they take for granted that what they read in popular religious articles is to be found in the Bible they may soon fill up with delusions and lose all critical sense. Truth needs to be respectfully handled. Propaganda is subtly introduced by mixing it with truth, and so error may be assimilated unknowingly.

What we want is not more books based on the Bible, but more encouragement to read the Bible with reasonable aids to an understanding of the historical background and Jewish customs. We think that narratives like the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles are much more interesting and even exciting than any human compositions intended to enlarge or interpret or bedeck the sacred story.

This year, 1954, is seeing a good deal of activity in celebrating the 150th anniversary of the institution of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Whether we are interested in that particular society or in some other, we ought all to welcome the renewed emphasis in Holy Scripture, and ought to increase our own study of it. Too long great numbers of professing Christians have been content with fragmentary acquaintance with the Word: too long the impression has existed in certain minds that critical studies have shown that the Bible is less trustworthy than our fathers thought. There is only one remedy for this sort of thing, and it is to be teachable, and to let the Bible speak for itself, and teach us its lessons. We believe that the Holy Spirit speaking in and, through the Word will bring us not only light, but truth and peace.

of the bishops. It was the status of these secular priests in their novel position in the factories which all raised most questions. Once emancipated from the parish system they escaped the control of the bishops without having behind them the tradition and discipline of the great Orders.

It is also interesting to note that in the Department of the Nord, the biggest industrial area outside Greater Paris, but one in which working-class Catholicism had always maintained a lively flame, all the worker-priests have made their submissions. It is not here that the most difficult problems are likely to have arisen, but in those more thoroughly de-Christianised zones in parts of the Paris area, for instance, and in some of the industrial centres further south, such as Limoges, where worker-priests had won their hearing by a much more complete acceptance of a class war point of view than was necessary in the North.

Door Not Slammed.

It is here that they were most completely pioneers in the new society that had been thrown up on the basis of working-class loyalties, and here no doubt that they feel most acutely that they are being asked to break bonds of loyal comradeship which they had freely accepted.

There is still no sign of a door having being slammed, but the bishops cannot wait for ever before taking their decisions with regard to these men.—(Manchester Guardian Service.)—"Irish Times", 11/2/54.

THE BIRTH OF A BIBLE SOCIETY IN THE STRAND

In December 1831 the Trinitarian Bible Society was born at Exeter Hall, Strand, and has continued for 122 years doing an important work in circulating pure versions of the Word of God. To-day the Society is as vigorous as ever, and is sending tens of thousands of Hebrew Scriptures to Israel, and large quantities of other languages to various parts of the world.

Judge Rules Religion Clause in Will is Void —Interferes with Parents' Right.

Mr. Justice Dixon gave his reserved judgment in the High Court, Dublin, recently in a case in which he was asked to say whether a condition relating to the upbringing of three grandchildren in the Roman Catholic faith, attached to a £6,000 trust in their favour, was contrary to public policy.

The condition was attached by John Joseph Blake, landowner, late of Ballyglunin Park, Co. Galway.

Mr. Justice Dixon held that the condition in the will that the three children should be brought up in the R.C. faith was void, since it was an attempt to interfere with the parents absolute right to bring up their children in any faith they chose.

But because the condition was void the gifts attaching to it were also void and, accordingly, the £6,000 must go into the residuary estate.

It was stated the children were baptised in the Church of Ireland, and brought up in the Protestant Faith.

Coronation Film Show Cancelled.

A Coronation film show for to-night, in the Protestant Hall, Cavan, has been cancelled by the promoters, after 600 tickets were sold for the two intended presentations during the evening.

The Irish Times understands that two people called on the Bishop of Kilmore, the Right Rev. F. J. Mitchell, last Sunday, and suggested that, in the interests of the happy relations that prevail in Cavan between all sections of the community, it would be advisable if the Coronation film was not shown.

Dr. Mitchell was not aware that any such film was to be shown, as the presentation was not by the Church of Ireland, and the hall is intended for the use of all Protestant denominations in the county. He told some of the promoters of the suggestion made to him, and they decided to cancel the show.

The proceeds were to have gone to the 6th Oriel Troop of the Boy Scouts and to the Adelaide Hospital, Dublin.—“Irish Times”, 19/1/54.

The Protestant Faith—Should be Exercised More, Says Minister.

Speaking at a meeting of Cromac Unionist Association in Belfast recently, the Minister of Home Affairs (Mr. George B. Hanna) said that he thought that, sometimes, Protestants in Northern Ireland made “an awful lot of fuss” about their religious liberty but did not exercise it very much.

After remarking that one of the reasons if not the main reason, for Northern Ireland remaining outside a united Ireland was the importance of religious liberty, Mr. Hanna spoke of their right to practise their Protestant faith. He said: “Do you not think we should practise it a little bit more?”

“I honestly feel that, sometimes, we proclaim our faith an awful lot. I think, sometimes, there are a good many people who attend an Orange service before the Twelfth of July and do not attend another until before the ‘Twelfth’ the next year.

“I do not think that is playing the game. It does not help those who have given up their lives to teach us from the pulpit, and it is not showing our children the right example.”

Mr. J. Humphries, vice chairman of the Cromac Association, presided.—“Belfast News Letter”, 18/2/54.

“The Christian,” 22/1/54.

A few weeks ago, an important number of Evangelical leaders from France and French-speaking Belgium and Switzerland, met for a conference at the Nogen Bible Institute, near Paris. Most of their reports were very hopeful. Everywhere colporteurs and evangelists are finding souls thirsting after the Gospel. In many districts a great change has taken place within the Roman Church. Not long ago Romanists used to refuse the Bible with disdain, whereas now they frequently ask for it, and many priests are advising parishioners to read it. Since Reformation days there has never been such an interest in the Word of God in that church. The number of monks and priests leaving their monasteries and pulpits increases, and the Vatican seems to watch the situation carefully and even anxiously.

Evangelical Activity.

The evangelical forces in France seek to be equal to this opportunity. Gospel tracts, books and posters are issued in large quantities; several missions are endeavouring to impart new vigour to their efforts; evangelistic campaigns in halls and tents have encouraging results. The picture must not be painted with too bright colours, but there seems to be, in many regions of France (Paris is perhaps a little behind the rest), a new interest in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, clearly and faithfully preached.

We rejoice that a number of American friends have seen the need, and the opportunity, and have come from the New World, to our rescue, but we would like to see our old friends from the British Isles, who know us better, and belong like ourselves to the Old World, come over and help us in this important hour of our history.

May all those who love our country pray for her recovery through the preaching of the Word of Life—Christ, the hope of the world, and of France.

Crisis Over Worker-Priests—Abrupt Changes in Dominican Order.

The crisis through which the Catholic Church in France is passing has received a new illustration by a number of abrupt changes in the French Province of the Dominican Order. The Master-General of the Order, Father Emmanuele Suarez, came specially from Rome to announce these changes at a chapter recently held.

The Provincials of Paris, Lyons, and Toulouse—Fathers Avril, Belleaux, and Nicolas—are all to be replaced, the former by Father Ducatillon. Provincials of the Dominican Order are all normally elected, and it is difficult to appreciate, from information available, how far the normal conduct of the Order has been interrupted. Furthermore, four Dominicans particularly well known by their articles and their lectures—Fathers Congar, Feret, Chenu, and Boisselot—are to leave the Paris area, in other words are to interrupt their activities as publicists. All of them are stated to have accepted the changes obediently.

These decisions are certainly connected with the question of the worker-priests. It is first of all to be noted that whereas the Jesuit Order withdrew its dozen members who were among the worker-priests even before the bishops issued their letter, and that the bishops have now given their detailed instructions, there has been no published news as to the manner in which the Dominicans were enforcing the Vatican's decision in this matter.

Of the four Dominican publicists, Father

Congar has been one of the principal contributors to "Témoignage-Chrétien", a Catholic Left-wing weekly. Its readers can have no doubt that he is among those who keenly regret the Vatican's decision, though certainly no word of his could be construed as justifying an attitude of defiance—which he himself has not adopted.

Father Feret held the chair in the Institut Catholique of Paris.

Father Chenu, who is a distinguished medievalist and theologian, recently discussed in the Dominican monthly review "La Vie Intellectuelle" the vexed question whether the functions of the priesthood were compatible with full-time employment, in a factory. He argued that the full exercise of the priesthood was certainly incompatible with such employment, but that it was also incompatible with missionary activity among those outside the Church.

Need of Submission.

Father Boisselot has hitherto been director of the Dominican publishing house Editions du Cerf and editor of the fortnightly "Actualité Religieuse dans le Monde". In an article published recently this review commented on the diversity of functions with which the priesthood had been found compatible—deputies, bankers, teachers, scholars, and even officers. It went on:

"That was why the hierarchy had believed that yet another adaptation was necessary (i.e. that some priests should become industrial workers). If to-day the hierarchy considers that this experiment cannot continue in its present form, the hierarchy is sole judge. Far be it from us to cavil. We simply seek the light, but even if various obscurities are to remain we know and proclaim that when the Church speaks we must submit.

"The spirit of faith is necessary with regard to her as it was necessary with regard to Christ Himself, whose body alone was visible. Of course, in the Church there is another factor: since there is imperfection, there is sin. The case is essentially the same, however. We must adhere with all our hearts to the mystery of the Church."

The article concludes with the words of Father Sertillanges: "If we are devoted to the Church we must be capable not only of suffering for her—that is a matter of course—but also of suffering through her."

No Disciplinary Action.

On this occasion it is pointed out in Catholic quarters here that the new Provincial for Paris is not a man who would have been quoted as representative of a current opposed to that of the men who are leaving their posts. It is also denied in these quarters that the action taken is disciplinary. That it may well not be. But there can be no doubt of the gravity of a situation in which so many changes have been found necessary, and such distinguished spokesmen of French Catholicism are to be silenced for the time being.

To put it at the lowest, these men believed in a method which the Vatican has now rejected, and this belief itself implied an assessment of the social and intellectual situation in France which the Vatican has also rejected.—“Manchester Guardian”, 12/2/54.

Prestige of French Hierarchy at Stake?

In spite of the cautious language used by the Church authorities and their insistence that the recent drastic changes in the Dominican Order are not disciplinary, French opinion has certainly concluded that the Vatican has delivered a severe rebuke to all those French Catholics, from the highest to the lowest, who have resisted its wishes in the past six months. The “Aurore”, a paper addressed largely to the unconscious bourgeois class-warrior, is apparently quite satisfied. It declares:

“These monks, excellent men in many ways, will come to see in the quiet of their cells the danger of a form of evangelisation which could only harden the class war. They will renounce their unconscious support for Marxism. The Vatican is counting on their example to induce most of the 73 worker-priests to imitate them.”

This is not, however, the note of Sirius, the pen-name used by the editor of the “Monde” when he writes on his own responsibility. According to him, the Master-General of the Dominican Order took his sweeping action to forestall far stronger measures by the Holy Office against the French Provinces of the Order. Sirius sees a precedent in the sudden arrival at Lyons two years ago of an emissary of the General of the Jesuits in order to remove from their posts and send elsewhere several members of that Order who were teaching in the seminary at the Institut Catholique there—to the considerable discomfort of the Archbishop, Cardinal Gerlier, who was not consulted, although the Institut Catholique is placed under his authority.

Bishops' Embarrassment.

Sirius notes first of all Rome's distrust of the initiative of some of the Frenchmen most concerned with the Church's apostolate, a distrust constantly fed by denunciations coming from other Frenchmen. Last autumn the French bishops had been pained by the instructions with regard to the worker-priests transmitted under the seal of secrecy by the Papal Nuncio, so that the French hierarchy should take the entire responsibility for carrying them out.

Although the bishops admitted that there had been faults and errors committed by the worker-priests, it had certainly been to save the institution that the three cardinals set out for Rome without any hint of any essential incompatibility between the function of priest and the status of industrial worker, which one of them was to proclaim as an obvious truth on his return. The cardinals were evidently defeated at Rome, and their delay in carrying out their instructions also evidently increased the Vatican's distrust. This distrust was further stimulated by the Dominicans, who had not, like the Jesuits, withdrawn their members from the factories even before the bishops finally took action.

The second point noted by Sirius is that among the Dominicans there have been no such protests or “revolts” as among the worker-priests. They have accepted immediately and without reserve the sanctions against them. Any protest on their part, observes Sirius, could only justify, a posteriori, those sanctions. He goes on:

“It is for the bishops, the successors of the Apostles, to determine within the Church what is essential discipline and what is abuse of bureaucratic power; what is required for the protection of the faith and what is a dangerous return to the most dubious methods of the Inquisition through panic fear of communism. If they fail in this, those responsible for French policy, whether Catholics or not, cannot indefinitely ignore the possible consequences for the whole country of such a situation, especially if it is to grow worse. New difficulties and new sufferings are on the way, it would seem, which might easily have been spared France and the Church.”

Political Problem.

One aspect of the political problem that seems likely to arise is that the fairly wide ground for co-operation between Catholics and unbelievers, which made the atmosphere of the Fourth Republic notably different from that of the Third, will be lost again. Another is the likelihood of a considerable fall in the prestige of the French hierarchy, in that it has quite evidently been ordered by the Vatican to adopt an attitude on a major problem in which it does not believe, and which at the same time it naturally enforces in accordance with the principles of the universal Church to preach submission.

The bishops have indeed been placed in a most difficult position since there have been no official statements from Rome of the objection to the worker-priests. Cardinal Liénart's pronouncement of the incompatibility of functions has been taken as a substitute for this and has not stood up well to criticism. When a Vatican spokesman did address the worker-priests over the radio the other day, it was to say something very different—namely, that though they had made themselves understood to their fellow-workers the worker-priests had caused scandal in other quarters by their imprudences.

This same thought was put rather differently by a worker-priest in Nice who had been employed in a gang of navvies. He told a reporter of the "France-Soir" that people accustomed to an overheated room always complained of a draught if a window was opened. The priest in question refused to say what would be his decision on March 1 when all worker-priests should have disentangled themselves from their temporal obligations.

"Reactionary Period."

Another priest, who had worked as a riveter in a Toulouse aircraft factory, said in a statement to the same paper:

"We are accused of having used Marxist language (in the protest of the 73). That is wrong. We use the words the worker understands most easily whatever his party. The Church does not understand the workers' language because it does not understand the workers. The language of the Church is different from that of the workers. We thought that the Christian faith was possible in the working class. By forbidding us, the Church has proved that she thinks this faith impossible. She is so far removed from the workers' world that her lack of understanding of the workers' life is complete.

"The Church obeys, consciously or not, political motives. At the Liberation she allowed the worker-priests because we were in a 'progressive period'. Now we are in a reactionary period, it disavows us and reverses. I think the majority of the worker-priests will remain with the working class. The Church fails to realise that it is a moral responsibility for us to abandon the working class. If we did, we would betray the confidence of our working comrades who have faith in us.

"We do not wish to cause a disservice to the Church, for we are priests; but we do not wish to betray the workers whose joys and sorrows we share. In becoming worker-priests we wanted to take our share of responsibility."

"Source of Scandal."

In fact many of the worker-priests are likely to have some difficulty in freeing themselves by March 1 from the labour contracts into which they have entered, since many of these run for several months.

Meanwhile the state of French Catholic opinion seems to be well summed up by "Témoignage-Chrétien" (to which Father Congar, one of the Dominicans sent away from Paris to a monastery in the provinces, used to contribute) in the following words:

"For thousands of men the decisions taken by the hierarchy with regard to the worker-priests are a source of scandal. On the other hand, during the last few days there has been pained alarm among many believers as a result of the declaration signed by the 73 worker-priest."

Lecture to University College Dublin Society —Plea for Tolerance by Roman Catholic M.P.

Not merely should Roman Catholics permit those outside the Catholic Church to worship God their own way, but they should positively encourage them to do so, said Mr. Christopher Hollis, M.P., in an address on "Toleration" to a meeting of the Magnificat Society in U.C.D. last night.

There were, he said, large numbers of people outside the Church who were good and who were sincere in their worship of God through their religions.

"I think", he said, "that we should accept the good faith of those people who could not accept the full Papal claims. If we do, we are compelled to accept that they receive the grace of God in doing what they honestly think they should do."

The question of such people had to be considered in discussing the question of tolerance, and it was the duty of Catholics to see that not only were they free to worship God in their own way but they should be encouraged "to do a world of good in their own way".

Mr. Hollis said that Catholicism was more widespread throughout the world than ever before in its history. But unlike the early days of the Church, Catholics did not find themselves in a

EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS. Summary of Calvin's Commentary.

Chapter 4, verse 15:—"Speaking the truth in love, may grow up into Him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ"—The truth of God ought to have such a firm hold of us that all the contrivances and attacks of Satan shall not draw us from our course; and yet, as we have not hitherto attained full and complete strength, we must make progress until death.

He points out the design of this progress, that Christ may be the head, and that in Him alone we may grow in stature. Again we see that no man is excepted; all are enjoined to be subject, and to take their own places in the body.

Is not the whole symmetry of the church destroyed when one man acting in opposition to the head refuses to be reckoned one of the members? Roman Catholics deny this, and allege that the Pope is nothing more than a ministerial head, but this is inconsistent with that order which Paul here recommends. In a word, a healthful condition of the church requires that "Christ alone must increase; and all others must decrease" (John iii. 30).

Verse 16:—"From whom the whole body . . ." All our increase should tend to exalt more highly the glory of Christ. It is He who supplies all our wants, and without whose protection we cannot be safe. As the root conveys sap to the whole tree, so all the vigour which we possess must flow to us from Christ. There are three things here which deserve our attention: first, that all life or health flows from the head. Secondly, that by the distribution made, the limited share of each renders the communication between all the members absolutely necessary. Thirdly, that without mutual love the health of the body cannot be maintained. Each member has its own proper share "according to the effectual working in the measure of every part".

Lastly, he shows that by love the Church is edified. This means that no increase is advantageous which does not bear a just proportion to the whole body. If we wish to be considered members of Christ, let no man be anything for himself, but let us all be whatever we are for the benefit of each other. This is accomplished by love; and where it does not reign there is no edification; but an absolute scattering of the Church.

Verse 17:—"This I say therefore . . . that ye henceforth walk not . . . in vanity . . ." He exhorts them to renounce the vanity of unbelievers, arguing from its inconsistency with their present views. He calls upon them to demonstrate by their life that they had gained some advantage by becoming the disciples of Christ.

"Not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind"—The miserable and shocking condition of other nations is held out as the motive to a change of disposition.

The mind holds the highest rank in the human constitution, is the seat of reason, presides over the will, and restrains sinful desires; so that our theologians of the Sorbonne are in the habit of calling her the Queen. But Paul makes the mind to consist of nothing else than vanity. Men are blind in reasoning, even on the most important subjects.

Let men go now and be proud of freewill, whose guidance is here, marked by so deep disgrace.

The true principles held by the human mind resemble sparks; but these are choked by the depravity of our nature, before they have been applied to their proper use. All men know, for instance, that there is a God, and that it is our duty to worship Him; but such is the power of sin and ignorance that from this confused knowledge we pass all at once to an idol and worship it in the place of God.

Besides, Paul does not speak merely of the natural blindness which we brought with us from the womb, but refers also to a still grosser blindness by which God punishes former transgressions. The reason and understanding that men naturally possess make them in the sight of God without excuse; so long as they allow themselves to live according to their natural disposition they can only wander and fall in their purposes and actions. Hence it appears what estimation and value, false worship must have in the sight of God when it proceeds from the gulf of ignorance and vanity.

Verse 18:—"Being alienated from the life of God"—Our ordinary life is nothing more than an empty image of life, not only because it quickly passes, but also because, while we live, our souls, not keeping close to God, are dead. There are three kinds of life in this world: animal life, human life, and that supernatural life which believers alone obtain. All of them are from God, so that each may be called "the life of God".

But the regeneration of believers is here called, by way of eminence "the life of God" because then does God truly live in us, and we enjoy His life when He governs us by His Spirit. Of this life all men who are not new creatures in Christ are declared to be destitute. So long then as we remain in the flesh, that is, in ourselves, how wretched must be our condition. Before anything good can begin to proceed from us, we must first be renewed by the grace of Christ.

Verse 20:—"But ye have not so learned Christ"—He now contrasts a Christian life so as to show how inconsistent it is with the character of a godly man to defile himself with the abominations of the Gentiles who do not distinguish between right and wrong. Those on whom the truth of God shines ought to live in a different manner. That those to whom the vanity of the senses is a rule of life should yield themselves up to base lusts is not surprising; but the doctrine of Christ teaches us to renounce our natural dispositions. He whose life differs not from that of unbelievers has learned nothing of Christ.

Verse 22:—"That ye put off the old man" this means the natural disposition. "And be renewed . . ." The rule of a devout and holy life is to live in the Spirit of Christ. Be renewed not only with respect to the inferior appetites or desires, which are manifestly sinful, but be renewed also with respect to that part of the soul which is reckoned most noble and excellent. "Put on the new man"—this is nothing else than the formation anew of the image of God in us.

"The Sacrament of Penance."

Recent correspondence in the "Church of Ireland Gazette" concerning Confession and Absolution (wrongly described as "the Sacrament of Penance"), leads us to publish the following notes on (a) the correct Anglican (and Reformed) teaching, and (b) the Roman Catholic theory and practice. The subject is a huge one, but the issue can be brought down to a simple point—Does the Church of England (and Ireland) teach that there is a Sacrament of Penance, or does it (as reformed churches do, following the primitive model) teach us to confess to God, and if in spiritual difficulty or scruple to seek advice and if need be reassurance by a declaratory absolution?

Which is Catholic? The primitive and Non-Roman, or the Roman? The matter following may serve to indicate our answer.—

"The Episcopal Declaration on Auricular Confession—Given the unanimous consent of all the bishops in Convocation, and adopted in principle by the Lambeth Conference 1878."

"In the matter of Confession the Church of England holds fast those principles which are set forth in Holy Scripture, which were reaffirmed at the English Reformation.

"The Church of England, in the twenty-fifth Article, affirms that Penance is not to be counted for a Sacrament of the Gospel and as judged by her Formularies, knows no such words as 'Sacramental Confession'.

"Grounding her doctrine on Holy Scripture she distinctly declares the full and entire forgiveness of sins, through the blood of Jesus Christ, to all who bewail their own sinfulness, confess themselves to Almighty God with full purpose of Amendment of life, and turn with true faith unto Him.

"It is the desire of the Church that by this way and means all her children should find peace. In this spirit the forms of Confession and Absolution are set forth in her public services, yet for the relief of troubled consciences she has made special provision in two exceptional cases.

1. "In the case of those who cannot quiet their own consciences previously to receiving the Holy Communion, but require further comfort or counsel, the minister is directed to say, 'Let him come to me or to some other discreet and learned minister of God's Word, and open his grief, that by the ministry of God's Holy Word he may receive the benefit of Absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice'.

"Nevertheless it is to be noted that for such a case no form of Absolution has been prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, and, further, that the Rubric in the first Prayer Book of 1549 which sanctioned a particular form of Absolution, has been withdrawn from all subsequent editions of the said book.

2. "In the order for the Visitation of the sick it is directed that the sick man be moved to make a special confession of his sins, if he feel his conscience troubled with any weighty matter; but in such case Absolution is only to be given when the sick man shall humbly and heartily desire it.

"This special provision however, does not authorise the ministers of the Church to require from any who may resort to them to open their grief, a particular or detailed enumeration of all their sins, or to require private Confession previous to receiving the Holy Communion, or to enjoin, or even encourage any practice of habitual Confession to a priest, or to teach that such practice of habitual Confession, or the being subject to what has been termed the direction of a priest, is a condition of attaining to the highest spiritual life."

"Sacraments ordained of Christ be not only badges or tokens of Christian man's profession, but rather they be certain sure witnesses and effectual signs of grace and God's goodwill towards us, by the which he doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken but also strengthen and confirm our faith in Him.

"There are two Sacraments ordained of Christ Our Lord in the Gospel, that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord.

"Those five commonly called Sacraments, that is to say, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and extreme Unction are not to be counted for Sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures; but yet have not like nature of Sacraments with Baptism and the Lord's Supper, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

"The Sacraments were not ordained of Christ, to be gazed upon, or to be carried about, but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same they have a wholesome effect or operation: but they that receive them unworthily purchase to themselves damnation, as Saint Paul saith."

Of the five "commonly called Sacraments" (the true meaning of the phrase is shown by the Latin version of the Articles—"Quinque illa vulgo nominata Sacramenta"—they are ceremonies commonly called Sacraments, though they are really not Sacraments, for as the Church of England Catechism had already said, a Sacrament is "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace given unto us, ordained by Christ Himself, as a means whereby we receive the same, and a pledge to assure us thereof". In face of the words "ordained by Christ Himself" the subsequent Article 25 could not mean that the title "Sacrament" could rightly be conferred on the five ceremonies or institutions named.

Of course there is no condemnation of some of the five—they are "states of life allowed (i.e. approved) in the Scriptures"—such obviously are Matrimony and the Ministry ("Orders") and perhaps Confirmation is "a state of life" though its late mediæval developments had altered its character and original simplicity. Plainly some of the five must come under the designation "such as have grown of the corrupt following of the Apostles". The Latin is "a prava Apostolorum imitatione profluxerunt" i.e. from a crooked, (distorted, deformed, perverse) imitation of the Apostles have issued or flowed forth. These must be Penance and extreme Unction.

Both are plausibly associated with certain passages of Scripture—Unction has its authority in St. James's epistle, but there it is associated with the prayer of faith for the receiving of the sick, whereas extreme Unction is given when hope of recovery is slight, or nil, and is a preparation for death. Thus it is a ceremony which has issued from a distorted following of the apostle James and the practice of the Apostolic Church. There is no word of Our Lord instituting it.

Penance may supposedly rest upon the words of Our Lord—"Whosoever sins ye remit they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained" (John 20, 23). "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. 18, 18), but the binding and loosing of the Jewish law was different from the spirit and character of "Penance". Bernard (Commentary on St. John's Gospel) says of the words of Jesus in John 20 "The meaning of this passage in its context must be sought quite apart from the inferences that have been drawn from it in later ages." He adds "we start from the presupposition, common to Jews and Christians—that no one can forgive sin but God (Mark 2, 7). But God is always ready to forgive (1 John 1, 9); and the assurance of God's forgiveness can always be given confidently to repentant sinners. This assurance may be given by anyone; it needs no authority to give it, for it is a fundamental principle of the Gospel. But then, no one can give this assurance in an individual case without being certain that this individual sinner is, indeed, repentant in his heart. To be sure of this he who says "Thy sins are forgiven" must be able to read men's hearts. To Jesus, and to Him alone was the spirit given in its fulness, and so He alone could infallibly discern the secrets of the human heart (John 2, 25).

"Now a main theme of the Fourth Gospel is that Jesus promised that He would send, and did in fact impart the Spirit to the apostles. It was not confined to them, but was for every believing disciple. But it was more largely promised, and more explicitly bestowed on them than on anyone else. And it was in the power of this Spirit that they were authorised not only to proclaim but to say in individual cases 'Thy sins are forgiven' . . . In so far as the Spirit was theirs, so far was their judgment of men's hearts a true judgment."

"The passages in Matthew which are specially recalled by John 20, 23 are 16, 19, and 18, 18 (quoted above). "To bind" and "to loose" are Rabbinical expressions signifying "to prohibit" and "to permit", and the use of these verbs would suggest to Jews a form of ecclesiastical discipline. In Matt. 18, 18 the context shows that something of this sort is indicated. The words refer to the 'loosing' of sin, and may imply forgiveness as well as discipline."

So far Archbishop Bernard. In his notes we find nothing resembling a sacrament of penance, and in Our Lord's words we perceive none of the technical requirements of a Sacrament as the mediæval teachers conceived them.

McNeile (Commentary on St. Matthew's Gospel) says (in Matt. 16, 19 and 18, 18) "'Bind and loose' appear to represent Aramaic words which were technical terms for the verdict of a teacher of the Law who, on the strength of his expert knowledge of the oral tradition declared some action or thing 'bound', i.e. forbidden, or loosed, i.e. permitted . . . That the words describe an authority to absolve from sin, and to refuse to absolve, is improbable. It was natural that patristic writers should connect the saying with John 20, 23, but there is no necessary connexion."

Neither Dr. Bernard nor Dr. McNeile could be described as "evangelicals", but they were men of great New Testament scholarship and their views give no countenance to a warrant from Christ for a "Sacrament of Penance".

We don't deny that the Early Fathers of the Church allowed and approved of the use of confession, but not the obligatory system of compulsory auricular confession long after introduced (13th. century) and maintained by the Council of Trent. The Roman Catholic Church has developed the Confessional and Penance very elaborately, and the extension and detailed study of moral theology is a necessary adjunct.

Confession and penitence in the early Church were by no means the same as auricular Confession and penance at the present day.

Calvin and his associates did not continue the use of private Confession, but maintained the need for public Confession for notorious offences, not so much for the remission of sins, as for example, and to content the Church that it was not harbouring evil.

Luther and his followers did not require "open" Confession, though it was not thought useless if a man confessed occasionally to God in the presence of a pastor in order to receive encouragement and persuasion concerning the forgiveness of sins.

The Church of England provides for public general Confession of sins in the daily services. Private Confession as we see from the Bishops' and Lambeth declaration (above) is of strictly limited character, optional of course, and not necessarily accompanied by an absolution. The imposing of a penance is in no way provided for.

Hooker (Ecclesiastical Polity, book 6. 2) distinguishes between the reformed faith and Rome's teaching.

1. Rome implies more than we do in the name of repentance. We emphasise conversion of heart: they lay stress on external works.

2. We teach a repentance which has always been the same requirement. They teach a sacramental penance of their own.

3. We try to teach men how they may heal the ills of their souls. They make sins seem incurable unless the ministry of the priests is involved.

4. With us the remission of sins is ascribed to God following immediately on true repentance;

but that which we attribute to repentance they impute to the Sacrament of Penance, and having made repentance a Sacrament, and thinking of Sacraments as they do, they are found to make the ministry of priests and their absolution the cause of that which God worketh.

Penance is defined (see Protestant Dictionary 2nd edition p. 494) as "a more or less painful exercise, imposed by a priest on a penitent, making satisfaction to God for the sins he has confessed and for which he has received absolution".

"It was long before the word 'penance' came to bear this meaning. 'Poenitentiam Agere' originally meant 'to be penitent or sorry', but it came to be translated 'to do penance'. The difference was momentous, for thus external acts were substituted for the feelings of the heart."

"After the time of Pope Innocent III the theory was, and is, that the priest's absolution forgives the transgressor's sin, and delivers him from eternal punishment, but on the condition that the transgressor shall still make satisfaction to God by the endurance of some pain."

We believe that the saying of prayers is sometimes imposed as a penance—this appears to us to be an extraordinary notion of prayer. That what ought to be a communion of the soul with God can be regarded as a penance seems to us to treat prayer improperly, and without realisation of its true character.

The Council of Trent declared that Sacramental Confession is necessary to Salvation. In this it must have condemned the great host of early Christians who had no knowledge of Sacramental Confession, but only of Confession to God ("If we Confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness"), and obedience to the Apostle's direction "Confess your faults one to another" (Jas. 5. 6—not to priests but to ordinary fellow-Christians).

"No text of Scripture can be fairly quoted as commanding or even implying secret Confession of sin to a human priest" (Protestant Dictionary 2nd ed. 139).

"Absolution is employed in the sense of remission of sins. In this sense it is God only that absolves.

"It is employed in the sense of a release from the censures of the Church which had been imposed on an offender. There was no marked form by which this absolution was conveyed.

"It was only by slow degrees that the doctrine of Sacramental Confession as linked with absolution grew up in the Church. For 1,200 years there was no formula of absolution for sin (as distinct from Censure), but only prayer for forgiveness of the sinner.

"Imperceptibly the idea of the priest as representing the Congregation was exchanged for that of the priest representing God, and finally the formula of absolution was changed from a prayer for pardon to a conveyance of forgiveness" (Canon Fredk. Meyrick—P.D. 2nd ed. 3).

We may briefly indicate that perfect Contrition, even for Rome, renders absolution by a priest unnecessary. Failing that, attrition, or fear of sin's consequences, plus absolution after Confession and satisfaction, will secure forgiveness. So a man may be forgiven without real love of God in his heart.

* * *

The Sacrament of Penance is not Scriptural. If that is not enough to show the non-necessity, it may be added that the doctrines associated with it do not further a true change of heart, or genuine repentance. Periodic sacramental "cleansings" are not the same as progress in grace and spiritual fervour, and moral development, and stricter adherence to the precepts of the Gospel. It cannot be said too firmly that the right use of Confession and absolution where required is in the reformed Churches, as illustrated by the Church of England (above); while the wrong use is in the claim that it is a Sacrament, that the priest is a judge, and that the Gospel warrants a "tribunal of penance" other than the throne of grace.

WHAT IS IDOLATRY?

By Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A. Th.D.
One of the broadcasts in the "Case for Protestantism" series.

We need to be very careful in our definitions if we are to avoid useless recrimination. The word idolatry has a very unpleasant sound and we agree that it is a very unpleasant thing. Strictly it means the worship of an image or an appearance of any kind. It rapidly came to mean the worship of false gods because most of these gods were represented by images, or by sensible appearances such as the sun, holy wells, mountains and so on. The most direct form of idolatry is the worship of a false god. This was the form against which the early Christians struggled. We were all at one, therefore, in contending that worship addressed to Jupiter, or Venus, or Minerva, or even the little god Cupid, is nothing more than idolatry. It is the worship of an appearance for the great Reality. And it is idolatry whether an image is employed or not. We can all agree with the Catechism of the Council of Trent that the first commandment: "Thou shalt not have strange Gods before Me", was introduced "on account of the blindness of very many who of old professed to worship the true God, and yet adored a multitude of gods: of whom there were very many amongst the Hebrews themselves, who, as Elias reproached them with doing, halted 'between two sides' which the Samaritans did, who worship the God of Israel and the nations" (Pt. III ch. II Q.V.). We are all agreed upon that. No matter how much peoples of another religion may dislike the term, we call that idolatry.

Our Roman Catholic friends are often very indignant when the Mass is called idolatrous by Protestants. They should remember that they do not hesitate to call other people idolaters. Nor should they forget that the Bible does the same. Now Protestants are of the opinion that idolatry is a much more subtle thing than at first sight appears. They think it is a natural tendency of the human heart, because of our sinfulness, and that we need to guard against it very jealously. The German philosopher, Immanuel Kant, said that there were two sublime sayings which had never been surpassed. The Commandment which our Roman Catholic friends regard as part of the first commandment and which Protestants regard as the Second Commandment: "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image nor the likeness of anything in heaven above or in earth beneath; thou shalt not bow down to them or worship them." The other sublime saying is that of Isis: "No man hath lifted my veil." So a religion without imagery is a sublime religion in the judgment of Kant. Strangely enough, particularly when we see paintings of God the Father as a very old man in Roman Catholic works of art, we can table the Catechisms of The Council of Trent on our side here also. It tells us the Commandment is violated "If any one should attempt to form by any device a representation of the Divinity, as if He could be seen by corporal eyes, or could be expressed by painting or statuary . . . "where the Israelites who cried out before the molten calf: 'These are thy Gods, O Israel, that have brought thee out of the land of Egypt,' are called idolaters, because they changed their glory into the likeness of a calf that eateth grass. (Pt. III Ch. II QXVIII.) So there is a false worship of the true God as even the Catechism of The Council of Trent bears witness. The sad fact is that many Roman Catholics are unaware of the protest of their own teaching manuals and display representations of God as an old man with a white beard. It is something to know that they are called idolaters in an official text-book of their Church. We think the prohibition goes much further, but it is certain that many Roman Catholics offend in a manner that is directly condemned by the leaders in their Church. We have a conviction that the Roman Church is not particularly easy about the prohibition contained in the Second Commandment, or if it is preferred, the latter part of the First Commandment. Very many Roman Catholics are unaware of the existence of this portion of the Ten Commandments. As we have mentioned, it was clearly indicated in the Catechism of The Council of Trent which saw the light in 1566. But as early as 1588 in "The Reformed Office of The Blessed Virgin", published by the order of Pope Pius V it was omitted. It had been frequently omitted in the Middle Ages. The full text of the Commandment appears for the first time after the lapse of six or seven centuries, in the Church of England Catechism of 1552. This is surely significant. Dr. Doyle, the famous Irish Roman Catholic Bishop who had the hardihood to say that a Pope's exposition of Scripture left him uncertain whether to weep or to laugh, nevertheless mutilates this Commandment and renders it: "Thou shalt not make to thyself any idol or any figure to adore it." Since this last nodding acquaintance with the commandment in 1843, one hundred years ago, every Irish Roman Catholic Catechism omits it altogether. If there were not something incongruous between the practice of the Church and the Commandment which, by consent, is directed against idolatry, there would not appear to be any reason for this curious treatment of it. And there are some practices in the Roman Catholic Church that are difficult to explain in the light of this commandment. We are told that the cross of the Legate, when carried in procession, should have "Latria", or the highest form of worship directed to it.

On this matter a distinguished divine of the Church of England, Dr. William Sherlock, who supported the Stuart cause for a time, but afterwards supported William and Mary, and was Dean of St. Paul's London, in 1691, has some strong things to say. He writes: "Another instance is the brazen serpent, which Moses set up in the wilderness, which was neither a god, nor the image of a god, neither of the Lord Jehovah nor of any heathen god; and was not first set up to be worshipped, but only to be looked on by those who were stung with fiery serpents. And was preserved as a kind of holy relic, as a lasting memorial of that deliverance God wrought for them by it. But when the children of Israel burnt incense to it, though they could intend to worship no other God in it, but the Lord Jehovah, who gave it that miraculous power, and could worship it only as a memorative sign of God's mighty power, yet Hezekiah destroyed it, with the other instruments of idolatry. II Kings XVIII 4. And yet I think I could make a much better apology for the worship of the brazen serpent than of the cross. For that was a type of Christ crucified, a type of God's own appointment, a miraculous and wonder-working type, which I should think should as much deserve to be worshipped as the picture or image of the tree wheron our Saviour died. For if a memorative sign of Christ deserve such divine honour, let them give me a reason, if they can, why the type of a crucified Saviour ought not as much to be worshipped by the Jews in those days, as the figure of Christ's cross now (Gibson's Preservative, Vol. XI, p. 301).

Dr. Sherlock states the general argument very well. He writes: "God alone, who is a pure and infinite Spirit, is the sole object of our religious worship; and to worship God by an image is to reproach His Name, and to declare Him as low as matter: and to worship that which can be painted, is to worship a false object; for Christ as God, and so only He is the object of our worship, cannot be painted; and to worship any material image, though it be not made for the supreme God, is yet a reproach to the Divine nature, as it signifies that something which is divine, and a fit object of our adoration, may be represented by material images and pictures. (Ibid. P. 303.)

It is a strange thing that the same mode of worship which Hezekiah condemned when it was used towards the brazen serpent is freely employed by Roman Catholics and even Anglo Catholics to-day. "The Children of Israel did burn incense unto it." The good and righteous King called that ancient relic "Nehusthan", which means "a piece of brass". And is not that a correct name also for the image of a cross to which incense is burned to-day?

There is yet another particular to which we would advert that makes the objection to the Roman Catholic practice justifiable. Idolatry has often been defined as giving to a creature the honour due to the Creator. It is indignantly denied by the divines of the Roman Catholic Church that any such charge lies at its door. Much emphasis is laid on the distinction made between three forms of worship: dulia, hyper-dulia and latria. The last alone, we are told is given to God and therefore no charge of giving to the creature the worship due to the Creator can justly lie. Much might be said on this point and we will return to it in a subsequent broadcast. But we are now concerned to show that many infringements of the Divine prerogative can be discovered in the usages of Saint-worship as popularly practised.

First of all it is surely strange that the name given to the saints in the Roman Catholic system is the name given to inferior deities in heathen religions. If you turn up any Latin dictionary you will find that "Divus" is the name of that person who is divine, a god or a goddess. It is strange that the Vulgate name Sanctus should be abandoned for a term that was full of associations with the heathen deities. No apology is ever offered for this most unfortunate deviation from New Testament and early Christian practice. The change of name suggests a change of purpose. The saints are exalted by it to a position which they should not rightly occupy. But someone is sure to quote Shakespeare and ask, "What's in a name"?—and so we pass on to show that not only in name but, in fact, the honour due to the Creator has frequently been given to the creature. The Jesuit Raynaud assures us that two leading authorities in the Jesuit Order, namely Mendoza and Suarez, state: "That by reason of her maternity, the Virgin Mary might be worshipped with the worship with which God is worshipped—the adoration of latria" (Raynaud, Vol. II, p. 229). That is a direct attribution of divine honour even on the principles of worship that have been laid down by the Church of Rome. Nor does this direct assertion lack very many startling corroborations. Bernadine of Sienna was canonised by Pope Nicholas V in 1450. A canonised saint is a person whose writings are certified to contain nothing worthy of censure. He uses the most extravagant language. He says: "All things, even God, are servants of the empire of the Virgin." (Works, Vol. IV, Sermon V, C.VI, p. 118). Again "of the monarchy of the universe Christ never made any testamentary bequest, because that could never be done without prejudice to His mother. Moreover, He knew that a mother can annul the will of her son, if made to the prejudice of herself. (Ibid.) Another Bernadine, Bernadine De Bustis, has the temerity to write: "The Blessed Virgin is herself superior to God, and God Himself is her subject by reason of the humanity derived from her" (Mariale: par. IX, Sermon II, p. 605). So much more could be said on this point that it will be necessary to defer further consideration to another broadcast.

It only remains at present to give the Protestant view as to the best means of avoiding idolatry in every form. We believe that religious prayer, as distinct from asking a favour, should be addressed to God only, the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. There is no instance of any prayer of this kind being addressed to any creature, however exalted, in the whole of the Old or New Testament. Instead of making minute distinctions as to the measure of religious devotion that may be apportioned to different persons, we prefer to divide worship in its wide sense into two distinct parts. Civil worship due to creatures and religious worship due to God only. In that way there is a difference made not of degree but of kind, and one form cannot pass over into the other. So all danger of idolatry is removed. Nor do we favour the use of images in worship. The Second Commandment in our reckoning stands firm against the making of any image or bowing down or worshipping it. Many have departed from that custom and some are found in our own borders who fancy that they can escape the pitfalls of the past and use images, burning candles before them and censuring them. To us there is an imperative that we cannot disregard—God says: "Thou shalt not".

purely Catholic community. On the contrary, they were often small minorities—the light shining in the darkness—the voice crying in the wilderness.

Greatness of the Pope.

"We are entitled to say", he said, "that the greatness of the present Pope was the frankness with which he recognised the changed situation, and on the question of tolerance they had the answer of the Holy Father that tolerance was something that they should not give grudgingly to those who did not wholly agree with them, but that they should urge those who did not accept the Faith to practice the religion in which they honestly believed".

Right Rev. Monsignor A. H. Ryan, D.D., Ph.D., Belfast, said that there would always be a debate and differences of opinion about the policy of the Church in regard to false cults in any particular set of circumstances. There was no reason for surprise that the debate continued, provided that those on either side did not take their own opinion as the exclusively orthodox one.

One organisation which made that mistake was Maria Duce. Maria Duce was one organisation about which the late Very Rev. Dr. Denis Fahy, C.S.Sp., often spoke and lectured. It was with the uttermost reluctance and distaste that he said anything against those views.

Undignified Protests.

Referring to Maria Duce's campaign against Article 44 of the Constitution, Monsignor Ryan said that the Constitution had had the blessing of two successive Irish Cardinals and the practically unanimous blessing of the Irish Hierarchy and no explicit disapproval from successive representatives of the Holy See in Dublin.

That organisation had also staged some protests, not all of them dignified, against visitors from other countries.

"That", said Monsignor Ryan, "reinforced the opinion of some of our critics that the 'alleged tolerance' of the Catholic Church, which has been so remarkable in the 26 Counties since we regained our freedom, is only a piece of calculated opportunism and that if the country was united that would sound the knell of civil and religious liberty".

He hoped that his remarks would not be taken as criticism against their admirable zeal, but, he said, "speaking from the Belfast attitude, they have failed signally".

Monsignor Ryan added that there was a great deal more toleration and neighbourliness among all sections of the population in the Six Counties than one would guess from the general tone and temper of public controversies.

Niebuhr's "Confession."

Into the crossfire of controversy over Communism among the U.S. clergy jumped Protestant Theologian Reinhold Niebuhr. "It must be affirmed that there have never been many explicit Stalinists in the churches", Niebuhr writes in the Christian Century, "and to-day their number is . . . insignificant . . . Nevertheless, there are a few and we ought to admit it . . ."

Niebuhr condemns the "hysterical labors of the vigilantes" and believes that "the matter is beyond the competence or interest of a congressional investigation committee". But "while we deal with these issues among ourselves", he feels it should be admitted that there has been "a very considerable Marxist dogmatism in the 'liberal' wing of the Protestant churches". Niebuhr says that he and others used some Marxist doctrines as weapons against the smug, optimistic, individualistic form of Christianity the U.S. had inherited from the 19th century, and against certain economic injustices that happened under capitalism. But, he now acknowledges, "those of us who were critical of capitalism were . . . too uncritical of the Marxist alternative". This was true, says Niebuhr, even of those who "rejected the Communist version of Marxism" and sought "democratic Marxism". Niebuhr is "ready to confess to his complicity in these errors", but is still against "the ridiculous dogma of laissez faire".

Niebuhr attacks the frequent clerical fallacy that under socialism "motives of service" would supplant the "profit motive". That idea "invested a collectivist system with a moral sanction it did not deserve . . . The so-called 'profit motive' can hardly be eliminated under any system . . . Every parson who speaks grandly about supplanting [it] exemplifies it when he moves to a new charge because the old one did not give him . . . a salary adequate for his growing family."

The Pope's Responsibility.

Those who imagine that the Vatican has no responsibility for the persecuting policy of the Governments of Spain and Colombia would do well to ponder a Papal pronouncement reported in The Catholic News, organ of the Roman Catholic archdiocese of New York, of December 12th last. The journal reported an audience which Pius XII recently granted to a group of Italian jurists, in the course of which the Pope defined Vatican policy in regard to liberty of conscience and the toleration of "error". He said that a State may find it justifiable not "to impede error" if its suppression conflicts with "a higher and broader good". He suggested as a norm for States a regulation that "the exercise of their own beliefs and religious and ethical practices will be permitted to citizens of every member State in so far as these do not run contrary to the penal laws of the State in which these persons are found". The Catholic News goes on: "The Pope, recognizing the difficulty which may confront the Roman Catholics statesman in determining whether there is present in the concrete situation the higher and broader good which justifies him in not taking measures to suppress error, the Pope counsels him to ask for the judgment of the Church. And he refers to himself, the Roman Pontiff as the only one 'competent to speak in the last instance on such vital questions, which touch international life,' on behalf of the Church." Two things emerge clearly from that statement. First, the Papacy thinks it right for the civil power to suppress "error" (that is, of course, any religious beliefs and practices not in accord with Roman Catholicism) if it thinks it expedient to do so. Second, statesmen who are in doubt what course to pursue are expected to seek guidance from the Pope. Now we know where the ultimate responsibility lies for the persecution of Protestants in Roman Catholic lands. This information has reached us from the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States, which has issued a message strongly condemning the persecution of Protestants in Colombia.—"The Christian", 5/2/'54.

PASSING EVENTS.

Colombia, South America.

That the persecution of Protestants in Colombia will be continued on the most intensive scale is evident from a United Press dispatch from the capital, Bogata, which stated:

"The government has forbidden non-Roman Catholics in Colombia—specifically Protestant missionaries—to engage in any religious activity outside the precincts of their own churches.

"Interior Minister Lucio Pabon Nunez ordered provincial governors yesterday to protect the religious freedom of non-Roman Catholics 'provided their activities and worship take place in churches and chapels.

"Non-Roman Catholic foreigners living in Colombia enjoy complete freedom of conscience... Pabon's directive said, '(but) neither ministers, pastors, nor simple communicants may perform any religious activity or seek to propagate their faith outside premises reserved for worship.'"

Crim Record.

It will be recalled that the persecution of Protestants in Colombia has evoked severe criticism the world over. On Sept. 3rd last, the Colombian government announced that Protestant missionaries and pastors were to be expelled from 18 regions of the country having a combined area of three-fourths of the national territory, and within that area, no form of Evangelical Christianity should be permitted. The order meant the abandonment of thousands of Protestant Christians who are left without the services of pastors, as well as the closing of dozens of primary day schools and health centres.

Over 100 Protestant schools with 3,343 enrolled pupils were forbidden to open for the last Fall term and construction of two new Protestant Churches in the Magdalena Valley has been halted.

Call for Prayers.

It was not surprising that the Evangelical Confederation of Colombia then called upon their Christian brethren in all parts of the world to pray that the churches in Colombia may be delivered from "the unjust and cruel intentions of the civil government, that Colombian Christians may be strengthened in their time of trial, and that by their witness the Kingdom of Jesus Christ may increase and shine throughout the world."

In view of this latest edict, which suppresses the activities of the Protestant churches in all parts of Colombia, prayers on their behalf are more greatly needed and sought now than ever before.

Right to Knowledge and its Free Use.

A pictorial exhibit, which has "Man's Right to Knowledge and the Free use Thereof" as its theme, was opened in Trinity College, Dublin, in honour of the bi-centenary of the Columbia University of New York. The exhibit was presented by the authorities of the college in co-operation with the United States Information Service.

The 24 panels illustrate, with quotations from the world's leading thinkers from Confucius to Radhakrishnan, various aspects and developments of a basic theme quotation from St. John's Gospel, "And ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." They stress, among other things, the liberty of the Press, the importance of protecting man's right to dissent from the majority view and the responsibilities devolving upon those who possess knowledge to share it with those who need and desire it.

Opening the exhibition, the American Ambassador, Mr. W. H. Taft, said that, more than any other university in America, Columbia was a seat of learning for foreign students. "We do not yet attract and export as many trained people, relatively speaking in terms of size and student population, as you here in Ireland," he said, "but the United States has become a great disseminator abroad of knowledge".

Partial Right.

Throughout the whole of recorded history, said Mr. Taft, man had not the right to knowledge. And, that being so, it was most important that we did not take for granted the partial acquisition of that right now obtained in many Western countries, such as Ireland and the United States, whose Governments were selected by the deliberate choice, and sometimes by the thinking, choice, of individuals expressing themselves as a majority.

Referring to "mass communication employed as propaganda", Mr. Taft said: "Truth is hard to come by, and only the man with the liberal education has some little chance in the long run to distinguish information from misinformation."

Mr. Taft added: "The right of the Press to be free helps, but does not, alas, guarantee knowledge. Newspapers deliberately stress some matters and some points of view to the detriment of other matters and other points of view, and what purports to be news does not add up to knowledge in the best sense.

Universities' Role

"Even if newspapers desired to present news impartially they could not; and this is no criticism of newspapers. Universities come closest to knowledge and closest to preserving the right to its use. Without their presence—not only as our teacher—but as a force for objective truth and its preservation, we could not maintain what, in the moral and cultural and physical world, humanity has acquired to its betterment."

He thanked Trinity College for making possible the present exhibit and the Department of External Affairs for their help.

The Vice-Provost and Librarian, Dr. H. W. Parke, who presided, referred to an Irish link with Columbia University, recalling that Bishop Berkeley, during his visit to America in the early 18th century, gave advice to those who were planning the foundation of what is to-day Columbia University.

Among those present were the Lord Mayor, Alderman Bernard Butler, T.D.; the Right Rev. Mgr. E. J. Kissane, President of Maynooth College; Dr. Thomas McGreevy, director of the National Gallery; Lord Wicklow, and the Argentine Minister, Mr. R. Fernando de Olano, as well as members of the board and staff of Trinity College, Dublin—"Irish Times".

References to Censorship Withdrawn from Exhibition.

Although none of the visitors to the exhibit, "Man's Right to Knowledge and the Free Use Thereof", in Trinity College, Dublin, recently, realised it, three panels which had been exhibited in other countries were missing from the Irish showing. The panels related to censorship, the banning of books and the proscribing and removing of books from libraries.

The decision not to display the three panels was taken by Mr. Garland Routt, director of the U.S. Information Service, a short time before the exhibit was due to be opened, in order that no offence should be given to any authority in Ireland where censorship, such as the panels criticise, is, of course, in force.

The withdrawn panels were shown in other countries in a section titled, "Man's Right to the Free Use of Knowledge". The first was captioned with a quotation by Walter Lippmann—"No official born on this earth is wise enough or generous enough to separate good ideas from bad ideas, good beliefs from bad beliefs." In the original catalogue this comment was made: "One of the great threats to man's right to the free use of knowledge is the constantly recurring shadow of censorship established by governments. Officials sometimes think it needful to interfere with what people can read or write or see or hear or eat or drink. In every country constant vigilance is the price of the retention of freedom. Constant faith in the power of truth eventually to prevail and a conviction that all aspects and opinions must be freely presented and considered, are essential for a healthy society.

The illustration was a cartoon drawn by Rollin Kirby for the New York World "to drive home the human unattractiveness of the censor-type".

The second missing panel quoted A. Whitney Griswold, President of Yale University: "Books won't stay banned. They won't burn. Ideas won't go to jail. In the long run of history, the censor and the inquisitor have always lost. The only sure weapon against bad ideas is better ideas."

The illustration for the panel reproduced an altar piece by Alonso Berruguette (c. 1480-1561) for the cloisters of Santo Tomas in the Prado of Madrid the subject matter being a legendary event involving St. Dominic and the Albigenses.

The comment in the original catalogue was: "Man's right to the free use of knowledge has been infringed by the burning of books as well as by their banning from libraries and bookstores. President A. Whitney Griswold, of Yale University, has expressed his faith in the quotation set out above. In earlier centuries, God was appealed to, in the ordeal of fire, to corroborate man's decision as to which book deserved destruction and which preservation. In all periods of history, including the present, men have burned books in the belief that the authors of these books could be disgraced thereby, or that their ideas

DOUBTS ABOUT ST. JOAN OF ARC.

[The following appeared some years ago in "The Sentinel", Toronto. We wonder if any reader can tell us if the theory has been proved baseless or if it has been upheld by other evidence in the field of historical scholarship.—Ed.]

The position of Joan of Arc in the calendar of Saints of the Roman Catholic Church is a peculiar one. If what history states is true, the part played by that church is inglorious to say the least. It was ecclesiastical condemnation which drove her to the stake and, as George Bernard Shaw maintains, the Maid must take her place as one of the first Protestant martyrs in history. All this pomp and circumstance displayed by Rome in her honour may be regarded as the expression of the guilty conscience of Roman Catholicism in that connection.

Apart from all this, there are those who refuse to believe in the authenticity of the martyrdom of Joan of Arc, despite the evidence of history. And it does seem a little strange that though "The Maid of Orleans" was said to have been burnt in the early part of the 15th Century, her canonization by the Roman Church was a comparatively recent occurrence, taking place so late as 1920. Whether the delay was due to misgivings on the church's part regarding its contribution towards her death or doubt as to her actual martyrdom we do not know, but it will be of interest at present to examine the case, first presented by M. Octave Delepierre, denying the tradition that Joan of Arc was burnt at Rouen for sorcery. We are indebted to A. C. Santer, of Regina, for the following article from "The Leader", London, England, on the subject:

"No Saint, No Martyr."

Joan of Arc, we must remember, is a "Canonized Saint", who was supposed to have been burnt alive. But according to the following she is really no saint, no martyr:

Joan of Arc was not martyred by frenzied English soldiery at all! This astonishing fact is revealed through important discoveries that have been made.

A million history books all over the world, in a hundred different languages, tell how the maid perished amidst the blazing faggots in the Market Place of Rouen. Novels have been written round the same theme, and Bernard Shaw's famous play reaches its dramatic climax with the burning of Saint Joan.

But now these have been found to be wrong, and English honour has been vindicated. Saint Joan was never burned to death, but died peacefully in her bed.

The discoveries that have been made suggest that Saint Joan, far from perishing at the stake, was alive and happily married several years after the accepted date, May 30, 1431, of her execution at Rouen. Even the marriage contract has been found. The most startling of the evidence exists in the official registry of the City of Metz, in Lorraine, the scene of Joan's greatest glory.

These records show that in May, 1436, five years after her supposed execution, Joan the Maid arrived in the city, stating that she had come from France. The local magistrates, to make certain that she was really the Maid, sent for her two brothers, Pierre and Jean, who recognized her immediately.

Proved Identity.

Saint Joan further proved her identity, say the records, by certain signs and documents. There can be no doubt about the authenticity of her identity, for she was provided with a horse by one of the nobles of Metz, a hood by another, and with leggings by a third.

When asked what had befallen her since her capture, she is said to have replied "in parables" as, in fact, she always did—and to have declared that her power would not be restored to her until the feast of St. John the Baptist.

A few days later, accompanied by her brothers, she left Metz and went to Erlon in the Duchy of Luxembourg, where she was the guest of the Duchess of Luxembourg. It was here that she formed a romantic attachment with the Chevalier Robert d'Armoise, a member of one of the most famous families in Luxembourg.

After a visit to Germany she returned to Erlon and married the handsome Chevalier, by whom she had several children, and afterwards lived in or near Metz. It is in this particular marriage contract between "Robert d'Armoise, knight", and "Jeanne d'Arc, La Pucelle d'Orleans," which has been discovered.

Payments Made.

Further remarkable discoveries have been made in the archives of the city of Orleans, where Joan of Arc had, of course, her chief associations. They show a record in the City Treasurer's accounts for 1435 of 11 francs and 8 sous, paid to persons who had brought messages from "Joan the Maid", while under the date of 1436 there is another entry of 12 livres paid to Jean, brother of Joan the Maid, to go to see her.

The entries in the Orleans archives thus correspond with and confirm the one in the registry at Metz, which states that the magistrates of the latter city sent for Joan's brothers to identify her.

These entirely independent sources of information corroborate each other in an even more extraordinary fashion, for in the Treasurer's accounts of Orleans for the year 1439 there are entries of different sums for wines, banquets, and public rejoicings on the occasion of Robert d'Armoise and Jeanne his wife visiting the city. Even more significant, there is also a memorandum that the council, after lengthy consideration, presented Jeanne d'Armoise with the sum of 210 livres "for the good she had done the city during the siege".

"These discoveries are nothing less than sensational", the article concludes, "They absolutely disprove the world famous story of the burning of Joan of Arc".

A Formidable Case.

This is the case for the refutation of Joan of Arc's martyrdom, and it is a formidable one. In addition, it may be said, M. Delepierre has brought forward a host of other documents to corroborate the same fact and show that the tale of her burning was invented to throw odium on the English. For a long time a sermon was annually preached in France toward the beatification of "the Maid", who eventually was to become in 1920 the patron saint of that nation, and make Shakespeare a true prophet in the words:

"No longer on St. Denis will we cry,

But Joan la Pucelle shall be France's saint."

[It would be much to the point to have the report of paleœographic experts on the documentary records at Metz and Orleans as forgery was a common mediæval pastime.—Ed.]

THE STORY OF A PRIEST: A CURIOUS CAREER*

By J. B. S.

This is an Autobiography, and I think it curious because after twenty-five years of (as far as one can judge) enthusiastic monasticism, it ends in an entirely unexpected anticlimax. When the man who had been making and hearing confessions all his life—at any rate up to his middle years—came to die and was asked if he would have a priest to prepare him for his end, he exclaimed: "Good heavens No!" Such was the end of the spiritual Odyssey of John Tettermer.

Perhaps some of the antinomies in his life may be accounted for by his parentage. His father was a Pennsylvania Dutchman and a Presbyterian, his mother a Kerrywoman and a Roman Catholic. Some time after their marriage the father became a Roman Catholic with all the zeal of a proselyte and they brought up their children in the standard Kerry tradition. But it is hard to conceive of Tettermer senior as a successful Kerryman! The Kerry peasant's religion is a form of routine superimposed upon a character of natural and habitual kindness; so it is rather acquiescence than conviction. It knows nothing and cares nothing for theology of any kind. It accepts its religion as it accepts its farming or its housekeeping, as traditional. There must be no break with ancestral customs—in fact there is an Irish proverb greatly observed and honoured: "Don't break a custom and don't make a custom." One finds it rather difficult to fit a Pennsylvania Dutchman into this pattern. It is a Kerry heritage; Dutch Presbyterians may fall in with it, but their absorption in it must be rare and difficult and perhaps incomplete.

John was a good boy. His brother became a priest (secular), and his own ambition was to be a monk; and as he wanted to be a good monk, he chose the Passionist Order, because this Order had adhered to strict rules and avoided the laxity and frivolity of other Orders. Of course his little Irish mother was delighted. She would be! In due time he "joined up", and most of this book is made up of his encomiums on the monastic life and on the Passionist Order in particular. He gives his reader a very satisfactory account of the activities and ideals of a monk, and with much respect, and (if you are built that way) of admiration, for the monastic life at its best.

Here one may make one observation. The monk would seem at first sight to live a very hard and unnatural life. He can have no property, no friends no social contacts. He has but poor accommodation, and has to keep uncanny hours. Like Mungo Parke "He has no mother to bring him milk, no wife to grind his corn". His life is devoted to prayer and routine duties of various kinds, and to studies of a restricted kind. He reads Philosophy, Casuistry and Theology, but it seems that his conclusions from all this reading must conform to the pattern laid down for him. On the other hand, as compared with those poor who have not elected for poverty, but come by it in the common course of experience, he is not so badly off. He may have but an indifferent bed, but there are thousands who have no bed at all. He has no home of his own, but wherever he goes, his community have a home awaiting him. He can always count on a sound roof and regular meals provided for him with no worry or trouble to himself. He has no pocket-money of his own, he doesn't need it for all his expenses are paid. He has no nagging wife nor noisy children; no household cares, no worries of an economic kind. Rises in the cost of living (or the cost of dying for that matter) don't affect him at all. He has the use of farm and garden which are cultivated by free labour, so he has no fear of strikes or trade-unions or the general unsatisfactoriness of employees. In fact he is a fortunate Communist like the fowls of the air or the beasts of the forest! Yes; there is much to be said for the monastic life, when one compares it with the life of the ordinary citizen. And one gets accustomed to routine work, even to tedious prayers, futile confessions and petty penances. Only one wonders—at least we of the outside public may wonder—if this is what God created man for. If so, what if we all became monks and nuns? Then we would all be extremely pious and good, and this sinful world, this "old unquiet earth" would come to an end with our generation. Celibacy would destroy the human race as effectively if not as rapidly as the dreaded Hydrogen Bomb!

Tettermer was in America (in Kansas) teaching when he was ordered to Italy again in 1914 to become Consultor General of his Order, the next but one to the very highest office in it. He was offered a bishopric in the Balkans, and was told confidentially that he might be made a cardinal. He enjoyed the admiration and confidence, and even the affection of his brotherhood and of all concerned. And then—He was ordered to Switzerland for his health, and there things began to happen to him mentally. All his life so far he had been as he says, dealing only with the ideas of others; now he had time and opportunity to examine his own mind, and there he made the interesting discovery, that "the Church" had long been giving dogmatic answers on matters about which it knew nothing. The splendid "cocksureness" of Roman Catholics under infallible guidance has been boasted by certain controversialists in contrast with Protestant uncertainty and groping for the light. Now it was this very cocksureness which drove Tettermer out of the Church. We think of matters like the Immaculate Conception, Purgatory, the Limbus Infantum (where children are supposed to go when they die), the nature of Adam before the Fall and many such-like problems which it has not pleased God to reveal to us, but which the Church of Rome bravely answers as if she knew. Tettermer decided that she didn't know but hadn't the modesty to admit her ignorance. Especially (p. 249) he decided that neither Plato nor Aristotle nor Averroes nor the Pope nor anybody else knew "the ultimate nature of things", however they pretended to do so. It seems curious that this should strike him as a new discovery. I suppose that most thinking people even from their schooldays had decided that though we are aware of the manifestations of Life, of Electricity, of Light, Heat and so on, we do not know what these things are in themselves. And "so is everyone who is of the Spirit". The Church had all the answers, and he could no longer believe in a Church or anybody else who had all the answers. Yes, pretend as it will, it cannot solve the mystery of life nor deal with ultimate reality (p. 248). And so Father Ildefonso sloughed his monkish robes and became John Tettermer again. He quietly slipped out of his Order and out of his Church, went back to America to Hollywood, to matrimony and to family life. He "came to himself".

What is the explanation of John Tettermer? He himself did not know, and presumably nobody else can. There is no evidence that he objected to any of the usual teachings of the Roman Church. He does not seem to have been troubled by that sense of sin and the consequent frustration which drove men like S. Paul, Luther, Loyola and millions of others to seek for peace of soul where they could find it—and that was not in Hollywood! Converts normally leave their churches because of some doctrine to which they object, or some deficiency which their consciences cannot condone. Tettermer's difficulty was purely philosophical—but it was sufficient. Intellectually it was only Rome's boasted but ill-founded certitude that repelled him. Is this all the truth?

At the risk of exposing myself to the charge of futility or absurdity, I would venture to hazard an explanation for what it is worth. He says (p. 225) "We are persons of mystery even to ourselves and do not understand what goes on in our lives especially in our unconscious deeps. The impresses left upon our soul by heritage . . ." And so on. An illustration may help. I knew a man whose father had very fair and his mother very dark hair. He himself was fair-haired like his father. But at the age of about twenty, as a consequence of typhoid fever his hair all fell out, and when it grew again it was dark and remained so. Now I think something corresponding to this in the intellectual sphere, happened in the case of Tettermer. There were in his life two strands woven together, the Celtic and the Teutonic up to middle life the Celtic asserted itself. He was of the pietistic acquiescent all-obedient Kerry type like his mother. But tied up with this "too intermingled and complex to be clearly traceable for evaluation" (as he puts it) there was the assertive questioning independent Teutonic strain, and when he got away from his customary routine, and had opportunity and leisure to think his own thoughts without a monk or church ceremonies or the Devil at his elbow to stop him, this Teutonic strain asserted itself. Holland triumphed over Kerry and Protestant over Papalist. Reason asserted itself over emotion. He may be called a congenital convert. There had long been what he calls "subterranean influences at work" in his mentality, and though he does not seem to have been at any time aware of it, what he says about "heritage" leads one to think that he probably suspected it.

Whatever way one looks at it, his may truly be described as a curious career. We also think that his life was a portent of what Rome may have to face when people are gradually weaned from tradition and discipline and begin to think their own thoughts and to live their own lives. Then we may have fewer Fathers Ildefonso, and more John Tettermers.

THE GREAT EASTERN SCHISM.

We have already given a general account of the Schism of the Church in A.D. 1054. It was the result, as we saw, of soaring ambition in conflict with the spirit of pride and independence. Rome, leader of the West, wanted to dominate the churches of the East, and in particular the Church of Constantinople. Constantinople wanted to maintain its ecclesiastical status as the Church of the Empire's capital, and to crush the aspirations of the barbarian West. Old Rome versus new Rome; East versus West; culture versus barbarism; the ecumenical patriarch versus the universal pope; Greek versus Latin;—all tends to show that the conflict was inevitable. The Western Protestant is tempted to say "A plague on both your houses", and we will not blame him too severely if he yields to the temptation. Nevertheless we believe that for the anti-papalist the schism is a matter of great importance, for we can point out that the rejection of papal claims in the sixteenth century was no novelty: that in the eleventh century the Eastern churches rejected the usurped claims of the Bishop of Rome—that the mother-church of Christendom, the church of Jerusalem, was party to that rejection, and that the old Catholic faith was vindicated to the extent of asserting that the mediæval papacy was an encroachment on the right of Christians everywhere, and that it had no true foundations in history or scripture.

The excommunication of Patriarch Michael Cerularius—Cardinal Humbert's memorandum. "A brief and succinct remembrance of the things done by the commissaries of the holy Roman and Apostolic See in the royal city, and in what manner they anathematised Michael and his followers." By Humbert, bishop of Silva Candida, and Cardinal.

"In the eleventh year of Emperor Constantine Monomachus, on the day of the nativity of St. John Baptist there arrived the commissaries of Pope Leo IX. of the holy Roman See—Humbert, Cardinal Bishop of Silva Candida; Peter Archbishop of Amalfi; and Frederick Archdeacon and Chancellor. They came to the Studite monastery in the city of Constantinople. Nicetas a monk, also called Pectoratus, anathematised in the presence of the said emperor and his nobles, at the insistence of the Roman nuncios, a certain writing under his name which was aimed at the Apostolic See and the whole Latin Church, and was called "on Unleavened Bread, the Sabbath, the marriage of priests" moreover, he anathematised all who deny that the Roman Church is the first of all churches, and who presume to censure its always orthodox faith.

"Immediately after this, in the presence of all, and at the suggestion of the Roman nuncios the same orthodox emperor ordered the writing to be burnt, and so they departed.

"On the following day Nicetas left the city and visited the legates at the palace of the Springs. When he received from them a complete solution of his problem he again freely anathematised all words, deeds, or attempts against the first Apostolic See. He was received into communion by them and became their close friend.

"Moreover, the words and writings of these nuncios against the different calumnies of the Greeks, and especially against the writings of Michael, bishop of Constantinople, against Leo, bishop of Ochris, and against the monk, Nicetas, were ordered to be translated into Greek at the Emperor's command and safely kept in the city.

"Nevertheless, since Michael avoided the company of the legates or any talk with them, and persevered in his folly, the said legates on the 17 Kal. Augusti (16 July) went to the church of St. Sophia and lamented over his obstinacy; and as the clergy and people were ready for the Mass (it being the third hour on the Sabbath) they placed on the chief altar a letter of excommunication beneath the eyes of the clergy and people who were present. They soon went out thence to shake off the dust from their feet as a testimony against them, shouting out 'Let God behold and judge'.

"The churches of the Latins in Constantinople were ordered to observe this, and all were anathematised who henceforth should communicate at the hand of a Greek who censured the Roman sacrifice.

"Having received permission from the orthodox Emperor in the Kiss of peace, and imperial gifts for St. Peter and for themselves, they were making brisk preparations to return home on the 15 Kal. Augusti (18 July), but the very pressing prayers of Michael, then at last undertaking solemnly to debate with them (under pressure from the Emperor), led to their recall, 13 Kal. Augusti (20 July).

"On this day they hastened back and came to the palace of the Springs. When the said Michael, the heresiarch, learned that they had returned, he tried to gather a sort of council in St Sophia's Church on the next day, so that he might display the letter of excommunication, badly mangled in its translation (into Greek), and thus discredit them completely in the mind of the people. But the prudent Emperor, taking precautions, would not have a council, [Note—Michael himself gives a different account, he says the legates always declined a council, and were excommunicated by imperial order] unless he himself presided over it. But Michael opposed this by every means, so the Emperor ordered the nuncios to resume their journey at once. This they did. From that time on Michael was in a frenzy at the failure of his schemes, and stirred up against the Emperor the greatest disloyalty among the people since he had wished to co-operate with the nuncios. So the Emperor was compelled to hand over to Michael the interpreters of the Latins, Paul and his son Smaragdus, blinded and tonsured, and thus he settled that disturbance.

"However, the Emperor, after the nuncios had sent an exact copy of the excommunication, exhibited it to the citizens, and at length he proved and established that Michael had falsified the letter of the legates. The Emperor was so aroused that he deprived Michael's friends and kinsmen of their honours and got rid of them from the palace. Against Michael he kept his anger burning till now."

Humbert then appends to his "Commemoratio" what he describes as an exact copy of the letter of excommunication he laid on the altar of St. Sophia. (It will have been observed that the problem of translation of the Latin into Greek added to the difficulties. The fact that the bishop of Rome's legates knew no Greek, and the leaders and people in Constantinople knew no Latin shows how matters had changed. Once the popes were Greek by speech and race, and the Constantinopolitans knew Latin, but that day was over, and the gulf had been widening for centuries). It may be remarked that the document scarcely called for any falsification on Michael's part. It was bad enough as it stood. Even a humbler prelate than Michael would have taken umbrage. Michael who had just missed being Emperor before he turned Patriarch had plenty to complain of.

"Humbert, Cardinal bishop, and Peter, archbishop, and Frederick, chancellor, to all the sons of the Catholic Church. The Holy Roman See to which belongs, as head, the care of all the churches especially, has designated us as its commissaries to this royal city for the sake of ecclesiastical peace and service; so that as it is written, we might come down and see whether the clamour may be ended, which unceasingly comes up to our ears, or if it is not so, that Rome may know.

"We want the rulers, clergy, senate and people of Constantinople to know how much we are concerned whether we are to rejoice over great good, or if we shall be saddened by great evil. For as far as the pillars of empire, and the honoured counsellors are involved the state is most Christian and orthodox. But as far as Michael, improperly styled patriarch, and the promoters of his folly are involved, they are daily sowing too many tares of heresy in its midst. Because as Simoniacs sell the gifts of God; as Valesians they mutilate strangers and not only promote them to clerical status, but to the episcopate; as Arians they rebaptise those already baptised, especially Latins; as Donatists they claim that, except for the church of the Greeks the church of Christ with its sacrifice and baptism, has perished throughout the world; as Nicolaitans they permit fleshly marriages to the ministers of the altar; as the Severians they call the law of Moses evil; as Pneumatomachi or God-fighters they cut out of the Creed the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son; as Manichaeans they hold, among many other things, that what is fermented is alive; as Nazarenes they so pay heed to the carnal nicety of the Jews that they speak against baptising dying children who are less than eight days old, and prohibit women in childbirth to receive communion, or if they were heathen, to be baptised, and they cultivate hair and beard, and will not receive to communion those who shave their beards after the practice of the Church of Rome.

"Though our Lord Pope Leo wrote letters to Michael on account of these errors and other deeds urging him to his senses, he disregarded him.

"Moreover, though we, as the Pope's nuncios, were willing in a reasonable manner to put an end to the cause of these great evils, Michael refused to see us or to confer with us; and prohibited churches from having Masses, as for instance he had closed the churches of the Latins calling them "Azymites". He was oppressive everywhere by words and deeds, inasmuch as he anathematised the Apostolic See in its children; and in opposition to it he now describes himself as the oecumenical patriarch. As a result, we do not tolerate this unheard of calumny of the holy Apostolic See, and do not await the undermining of the catholic faith. So by the authority of the holy Trinity and of the Apostolic See whose delegation we exercise and of all the orthodox fathers, we thus write to Michael and his followers as our most reverend pope likewise threatened if they did not repent.

"May Michael, improperly called patriarch, and in religion solely through fear of men, and now disgraced by the worst crimes, and with him Leo, bishop of Ochris, and his chaplain, Michael Constantine, who trod underfoot the sacrifice of the Latins, and all their followers in the aforementioned errors be anathema, along with Simoniacs, Valesians, Arians, Donatists, Nicolaitans, Severians, Pneumatomachians, and Manichaeans and Nazarenes and with all heretics along with the devil and his angels,—unless they repent. Amen."

"Whoever contradicts the faith of the Apostolic See, let him not be taken for a Catholic Christian, but anathematised as a 'Prozymite and heretic. Let it be done; let it be done; let it be done'". (Translated from the Latin in Migne's Patrologia vol. 143.)

CHURCH OF ROME AN ITALIAN MISSION.

By CANON LINDSAY, F.R.G.S., F.T.S.C.

The preacher's text was from 1 Peter III., 15-16: "But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and reverence; having a good conscience; that whereas they speak evil of you as evil doers they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good manner of living in Christ." He said there were three good thoughts dominant in the text which should never be separated in the life of the Christian. The first was the duty of personal sanctification, i.e., Religion in the inner life—"Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts". The second was the duty of each individual exercising the right of private judgment—"Be ready always" (not merely on special occasion, but always) "to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you", i.e.—Religion in the intellectual life. The third was the duty of Christian consistency; "Having a good conscience that whereas they speak evil of you as of evil doers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good manner of living", i.e., Religion in the outward life:—Religion in the inner life; Religion in the intellectual life; Religion in the outer life.

"If we Protestants would keep these three duties in mind", continued the preacher, "we would be better understood by each other and we should be better understood by our fellow Roman catholic countrymen". It is with the second duty I am concerned this evening; namely, the duty of religion in the intellectual life; "Being always ready to give an answer to every man that asks us a reason of the hope that is in us." In principal, Father de Bruno in his "Catholic Belief"—a book which seems to be got up specially for the perversion of Protestants from their faith—admits this. He says that "To be in a position to judge fairly of any case a person must hear both sides". Very well, then, Father Kerr's side is best expressed in those sentiments of his which bemoan us as the "direful legacy" of the Scotch Plantations with an "alien civilisation", an "alien religion".

"The Direful Legacy."

Now, I don't want you to misunderstand Father Kerr. I darsay he does not want you to misunderstand himself. Father Kerr is not against "legacies" no more than we are ourselves! What Father Kerr specially mourns over is that the "direful legacy" of Protestantism "is with us still". He would like us to get out; and it would appear he is already preparing us for our general exodus—hence his use of the terms "direful legacy", and "alien religion". I have been looking up the word "direful" in Chamber's etymological dictionary, and he gives the meaning of it as "dreadful", "calamitous in a high degree". So you see, the Very Rev. Father is anything but complimentary to us! His terms are anything but the charitable terms of a Christian Catholic heart.

And wherein lies the "calamity" of "the Scotch Plantations"? Is it in our ship-building, or rope works, our tobacco factory, our linen and various other industries, etc., which give employment to Roman Catholics as well as to Protestants? Apparently not, but solely because we, as Protestants, stand for three things—first, the open Bible; second, freedom to think and act as individuals for ourselves under the personal guidance of the Holy Spirit; third, because we will not have a religion so "alien" to the teaching of the New Testament, so "alien" to Divine faith, and so "alien" to sanctified common sense as that presented to us by the Roman creed.

Astonishing as it may seem, we Protestants are too Irish to allow ourselves to be governed by an Italian, hence we never go "cap in hand" to the Vatican and ask him to make our archbishops and bishops, etc. We "select", we "choose", we "appoint", we "make" them ourselves!

Father Kerr looks upon the Protestant religion as "alien". Why? Is he aware that the whole of the Protestant religion is found in the Roman Catholic Bible, whereas not one of the doctrines rejected by Protestants can be proved from the same source?

What Dr. Walsh Said.

Even the late Dr. Walsh, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, is quoted in the "Freeman's Journal" of March 9, 1891, as having stated that "There is hardly a doctrine of the Protestant religion that they (Protestants) do not hold in common with Catholics; Protestants hold, for instance, the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity, the doctrine of the Incarnation, the doctrine of Baptism, the doctrine even of the 'Blessed Eucharist, the inspiration of the Scriptures and the precepts of the Decalogue. Almost all the doctrines of the Protestant religion are held by Catholics.

So Dr. Walsh said. And this is a grand admission of the positive aspect of the Protestant religion. Yet the Very Rev. Father Kerr, C.S.S.R., who is neither an archbishop nor a bishop, states in the presence of eleven other bishops that ours is an "alien religion"! While Father Furness, in his Catechism for children, says—"The Protestant religion was made, not by Jesus Christ, but 1,500 years afterwards by a wicked man called Luther, who confessed that he made the Protestant religion to please the devil and spite the Pope." Did Luther make the Roman Catholic Bible, where all our Protestant doctrines are found? Did he make the three ancient Catholic creeds—the Nicene, the Athanasian, the Apostles'—which contain the Protestant Faith? Did he make those doctrines which, with Roman Catholics, "we hold in common"? O, well did Lord Bacon say:—

"He that can not reason is a fool,

"He that will not reason is a bigot,

"He that dare not reason is a slave."

Well did our Lord say:—"Why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" (Luke xii., 57), and St. Paul:—"I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say" (1 Cor. x., 15). When I am asked, "Where was your religion before Luther, Henry the VIII., and Elizabeth?" I answer, in Irish fashion, by asking, "Where was your face before it was washed?" The answer is "Where it always was; where it is now, and that is where yours is not—in the sacred Word of God as contained in the Bible. As long as the essential facts of our common Protestantism are contained in the Bible and ancient creeds we have no right to be scornfully dubbed as "aliens" nor reproached as "direful legacy" especially when Roman Catholics themselves have tagged on to these ancient creeds the alien religion of the creed of Pope Pius the IV. in the year 1564.

"Traditions" Before Scripture.

The 1st Article of this "alien" creed puts "traditions" before the Scriptures. It says:—"I most steadfastly admit and embrace apostolic and ecclesiastical traditions"; etc. Yet this is what the Saviour Himself condemned the Pharisees for doing. He says; "Ye make the Commandments of God of non-effect by your traditions. In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men" (Matt. xv., 3, 6, 9). The 2nd Article of this "alien" creed limits the meaning and use of the Holy Scriptures. It says; "I also admit the Holy Scriptures according to that sense in which our Holy Mother the Church has held and does hold, to which it belongs, to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Scriptures. Neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the fathers." And yet she has given no "true sense and interpretation", and it is impossible to find the unanimous consent of the fathers on some of her most controversial texts.

Take St. Matt. xvi., 18—"Thou art Peter and upon this rock" . . . Even the French priest, Monsignor Lannoy, says: "44 of the fathers say it means one thing, 17 of them say it means another, and 16 another".

Look at the note on Revelation (or Apocalypse) xxii., 10: "As to the time when the chief predictions should come to pass we have no certainty—as appears by the different opinions both of the ancient fathers and late interpreters." Many think one thing, and others another (see Douay Testament). So, you see, her condition of interpretation makes the Bible absolutely useless as far as her chief basic texts are concerned. Article III. says—Christ instituted seven sacraments; when in actual fact the New Testament shows he only instituted two—"Baptism and the Lord's Supper" as such.

Article IV. deals with "original sin" and justification.

The Consecrated Elements.

Article V. states "that in the Mass there is offered to God a true, proper and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and dead, and that in the most Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist there are truly, really, and substantially the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ and that there is made a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood which conversion the Catholic Church calls Transubstantiation. I also confess that under either kind alone Christ is received whole and entire and a true sacrament." "The flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I speak unto you they are spirit and they are life." That is to say, they have a distinctly spiritual meaning and St. Paul calls the consecrated elements, "bread" and "the cup" three times after consecration which he could not have done had Transubstantiation taken place; and John xix. 30, where Christ on the Cross says, "It is finished".

Article VI. says there is a Purgatory in the after life. Hebrews i., 3, says, "Christ by Himself purged our sins", and the note in the Douay Bible agree with this, "making purgation", i.e., "having purged away our sins by His passion". Article VII. says, "The saints reigning with Christ are to be invocated", though Hebrews vii., 25; 1 John ii., 1, 2, and 1 Timothy ii., 5, 6, point to Christ as our ample Intercessor, Advocate, and Mediatrix, and He was never known to turn away a sinner who came to Him direct.

Article VIII. says "that images of Christ, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the saints are to be retained, honoured, and veneration given them". The second Commandment in the Decalogue, as given in the Douay Bible, Exodus xx., but not found in the Roman Catholic Catechism, would seem to point the other way.

Article IX. says, "Indulgences are most wholesome to Christian people". The opponents of Martin Luther and Wycliffe, no doubt thought them so, though St. Peter says, "we are bought with the precious blood of Christ", and when speaking to Simon Magus who thought to buy the gift of God with money he said, "Thy money perish with thee" (Acts viii., Douay Bible).

The Church in Jerusalem.

Article X. says "I acknowledge the Holy Catholic, Apostolic, Roman Church for the mother and mistress of all churches". But Acts, chaps. ii. and xv., show that the church in Jerusalem was the "Mother Church" and Paul distinctly says in Gal. iv., 26, "Jerusalem is the mother of us all." The Christian Church can't have had two mothers, an Italian and a Jewish. Besides, here the phrase "Roman Church" shows it is more "alien" than the "Scotch Plantations". Article XI. has more anathemas than blessings, while Article XII. closes the whole thing with a promise, a vow, and a prayer and, of course, not without "a swear" as the grand finale! Such is the nature of this "alien" creed of Pope Pius IV. binding on the conscience of Irish Roman Catholics. The difference between its teaching and that of the New Testament is that in the former the Pope and the church appear to have the supremacy, while in the latter the supremacy is solely Christ's—as Paul puts it, "That in all things He (Christ) might have the pre-eminence".—Col. i., 18.

And as Rome is "alien" in her creed she is also "alien" in her conduct. Read the "Thanksgivings for favours received" as published in the Roman Press. All the Saints thanked are foreigners such as St. Anthony of Padua, St. Therese, The Little Flower of Lisieux, St. Philomena, etc. You never see St. Patrick or St. Bridget, or St. Columba or any Irish Saint thanked.—(By author's permission. Also in "Ulster Protestant").

PINNACLES OF THE POPES.

By the late Very Rev. R. W. Inge, D.D.
(Reprinted from "The Evening Standard" by "The Vigilant," Melbourne.)

The Papacy is the one political institution which will probably survive even the British monarchy, which might conceivably be upset by a very self-willed or imprudent King. "Never" is a word which a wise man will never use; otherwise we might predict that a time will never come when there will be no Pope.

The choice of the Supreme Pontiff by the College of Cardinals is now as good a guarantee against a bad ruler as could be devised. But it has not always been so.

I have been reading "The Triple Crown," by Valerie Pirie. It is an account of the Papal Conclaves from the fifteenth century to the present day. The greater part of the book is an amazing story of shameless intrigue, corruption, perfidy and crime.

Some of the mediaeval Popes were blackguards of the deepest dye, sunk in debauchery, gluttony, avarice, and every other vice. The word "nepotism" preserves the memory of the practice of almost all of the Popes, to enrich the young men who were politely called their nephews. It was a recognised thing that a new Pope should at once make his nephew a Cardinal. Paul III bestowed the hat on several of his grandsons, the eldest of whom was fifteen.

The avarice of the Popes in the Middle Ages was insatiable. All ecclesiastical dignities were openly sold; taxes on disorderly houses brought in a steady revenue; and there was a tariff for the absolution of all crimes, to which Sixtus IV added a plenary indulgence to anyone who killed a Venetian. In the reign of Leo X the magnificent Medici Pontiff painted by Raphael, indulgences were staked for in gambling hells.

It has been argued that only a divine institution could have survived such scandals. But Dante was nearer the mark when he said that Constantine did the Church infinite harm, not by being converted, but by making the Popes rich. Before the end of the fourth century the streets of Rome ran with blood at the election of Pope Damasus, nicknamed "the ear-picker of ladies," and the Prefect of Rome said that he would himself turn Christian if they would make him Pope.

The romantic proceedings at the Conclave are well known—all doors locked and sealed, all outlets boarded up. Gregory X made a rule that if the Cardinals could not agree within three weeks, they were to be reduced to bread and water, but this was soon repealed. Scrutinies of the votes are taken twice a day, and the crowd outside watches for the smoke which rises from a certain chimney when the voting papers are burnt. Finally, one of the Sacred College appears on a balcony, and announces in Latin, "I give you good tidings of great joy. We have a Pope." the name follows.

The sovereigns of the chief Catholic countries had a right to veto one candidate. This right was last exercised by Francis Joseph of Austria, who forbade the election of Cardinal Rampolla. Pius IX was elected in a hurry to forestall the Austrian veto, which duly arrived just too late.

In 1458 Pius II needed one vote to make up his two-thirds majority. Cardinal Colonna, a supporter of the Archbishop of Rouen, who had just, as scrutineer, falsified the numbers, was preparing to change over when the Archbishop of Rouen and one of his friends flung themselves upon him and tried in vain to prevent him by main force from voting. The next moment, since Piccolomini was now Pope, they all fell on their faces before him in homage.

In 1513 many of the Cardinals, wishing to temporise until they knew which way the wind was blowing, began by voting for the most impossible outsider in the College. Unfortunately, thirteen of them selected the same nonentity, who was very nearly elected.

Some of the Cardinals had never been ordained. The astute minister of Pius IX, Cardinal Antonelli, was in this position, which, considering his private life, was perhaps just as well.

Did the people of Rome resent being under such unworthy rulers? Sometimes they did, but they did not always hate the worst of them. In 1522, by a strange oversight, the College chose a Puritan escetic, Adrian VI, who was quite wrongly suspected of being a miser. When he died the Romans put up a statue to his physician, and inscribed on it the words, "To the saviour of his country." But the cruel persecutor, Paul IV, was detested as he deserved, and the corpse of the horrible Borgia Pope was dishonoured. The warlike Julius II seems to have been rather popular.

My taste for vital statistics has led me to a curious inquiry. Between 1455 and 1600 there were twenty-four Popes, who reigned on an average six years each. It is true that some of them were elderly men, and that the habits of many of them were not conducive to longevity. One of them, Alexander VI, was poisoned, or rather poisoned himself accidentally? But did the others all die natural deaths? I think anyone familiar with the subject would say that it is impossible. Several Popes were almost certainly poisoned.

This may seem incredible, when we remember the sanctity attached to the Pope's person; but it is far from being so in reality. Poisoning in Renaissance Italy was a fine art. About 1600 a man confessed voluntarily that he had poisoned two Popes. The priest withheld absolution till he had consulted the Pope, Clement VIII. The Pope allowed him to be absolved, but thought it prudent to remove him from further temptation, so he was handed over to the inquisition.

Times are changed when we come to the gentle Pius VII, whom Napoleon bullied and insulted, and to the long and inglorious reign of Pius IX.

He was an ignorant man of blind, uncritical faith; no hoax was too gross for his acceptance. In his later years he posed as "the prisoner of the Vatican," and received welcome tributes of money, especially from South America. In reality he was not a prisoner at all.

His successor, Cardinal Pecci, who took the name of Leo XIII., restored to the Holy See all the respect which it had lost. He was a scholar, a statesman, and a man of high character. From his pontificate dates the increased influence of the Roman Catholic Church, which is especially noticeable in the Protestant countries, England, Holland, Germany and the United States.

The compromise which has at last been reached between the Vatican and the Italian Government leaves the precincts of the Vatican as a tiny independent State. The Holy Father owes allegiance to no man; his authority over his world-wide subjects is not complicated by any embroilment with secular politics.

Never before, since the conversion of Constantine, has his position, as a spiritual ruler, been so favourable as it is now. Even if Italy were engaged in an unjust war with another Catholic Power, he could maintain a dignified though embarrassed neutrality.

The Eternal City will never again be a world-capital, and the dream of a universal Church is as unsubstantial as that of a universal empire. But this unique institution still has a great future before it.

It knows that human nature does not change; and whenever hopes are disappointed, whenever popular catchwords such as democracy, socialism, humanism and progress lose their attractiveness and begin to sound hollow, many will take refuge under the shelter of a tradition which touches human nature at so many points.

"The Church", said Theodore Beza to a monarch of this day, "is an anvil which has worn out many hammers".

could be removed from circulation. Russia, Ireland, Germany and even the United States, with its two centuries of tradition in freedom, have witnessed the occurrences within recent decades. Two burnings took place in the United States during 1952; one was of books selected from a high school library, and the other (done with a blow torch) was a newly revised edition of the Holy Bible."

The third panel which was withdrawn from the exhibition featured a quotation of the American Library Association: "Books or other reading matter of sound factual authority should not be proscribed or removed from library shelves because of partisan or doctrinal disapproval."

Christian Heritage "Endangered by McCarthyism"—Strong Criticism by Church of Scotland.

A strong criticism of "McCarthyism" as a threat to Christian values is contained in the report of the Church of Scotland's Committee on Church and Nation, to be presented to the General Assembly when it resumed its meeting at Edinburgh.

The report refers to the threat to Christian values from those who exploited the fear of communism "for sinister political ends", and continues:

"The emergence of McCarthyism can no longer be regarded as a merely temporary phenomenon of national hysteria. Our Christian heritage of truth and freedom is endangered by a movement that is having evil repercussions throughout the world, and incidentally tremendous damage is being done to the alliance of free nations."

The Hydrogen Bomb.

On the question of the hydrogen bomb, the report states that it might be contended that no new moral or spiritual issue has emerged. The hope had even been expressed that the existence of this terrifying weapon might prove a deterrent to aggressive policies. If there was any reality in this hope it derived from the fact that potential enemies were more or less equally equipped with the powers of destruction. For this reason, in addition to its impracticability, the proposal formally to ban such weapons could only be misleading, and might have fatal consequences. The weak were a continual temptation to the strong.

The report urges that the use of atomic energy for peaceful ends should be developed with all possible speed. If wisely used, it might prevent the destruction of the complex civilisation upon which multitudes depended for their very existence, and which otherwise was inevitable within the not too distant future.

Contending that a condition for the survival of Britain, at least as a significant world Power, was the immediate development of atomic energy, the report points out that the British economy runs essentially on coal, which was going to be increasingly difficult to mine in adequate quantities.

Christians, the report goes on, must not allow themselves to adopt a merely backward-looking and hostile attitude to the problems created by advances in science and technology; and should be conscious that these advances must be balanced by other interests if they were not to prove destructive of civilisation. "By itself science, and even more, technology, can easily dehumanise men and produce a new barbarism, the more devilish because of the vast command of natural resources which it would have at its disposal."

Commercial Television.

The committee expresses its belief that the commercial television would change the "whole atmosphere and ethos" of broadcasting, as the chief motive would become the profit of the advertiser instead of the service of the public. The report urges:

1. That advertising charges should be kept at the lowest possible level in order to open television advertising to the greatest number of interests and firms, and to discourage extravagance in the provision of programmes.

2. That certain objectionable types of advertisements, such as of narcotic drugs, liquor, patent medicines, and all forms of gambling, should be excluded.

3. That there should be careful and precise allocation of time between advertising, cultural programmes, and religious services and talks.

THE BIRTH OF A BIBLE SOCIETY IN THE STRAND

In December 1831 the Trinitarian Bible Society was born at Exeter Hall, Strand, and has continued for 122 years doing an important work in circulating pure versions of the Word of God. To-day the Society is as vigorous as ever, and is sending tens of thousands of Hebrew Scriptures to Israel, and large quantities of other languages to various parts of the world.

Presbyterian Church in Ireland—Assembly Reference to "Martin Luther" Film.

The film "Martin Luther," which was the subject of some pointed remarks by the Very Rev. Principal J. E. Davey at the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, has found a distributor. The Rank organisation refused to handle the film. It was learned that British Lion have agreed to distribute this film about the life of the famous Protestant leader. A spokesman of the company said that he did not anticipate any difficulty in finding cinemas to take the film. He added that, according to present plans, it would be seen in the West End in the autumn before being generally released in the United Kingdom. In spite of some Roman Catholic protests in America, the film was a success there and took nearly £1,250,000 at the box office. It was banned in Quebec because the censors thought it might cause "undue antagonistic sentiments."—"Belfast Newsletter," 15/6/54.

Trinitarian Bible Society—Austrian Eagerness for the Scriptures.

The 123rd annual meeting of the Trinitarian Bible Society was held at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on May 25th, with the Rev. W. Dodgson Sykes, president of the Society, in the chair. It was reported that the income from all sources during the past year was, save for 1952, unequalled in any year of the Society's history. The outstanding demand for Bibles or portions of the Bible had been from Israel, to which country over 10 tons of the Scriptures had been sent. The Society's total distribution during the year had comprised almost two million copies of the books of the Bible—regarding the entire Bible as 66 separate books—which was 84,219 more than the previous year.

A remarkable address was given to the meeting by Pastor A. E. Pokorny, founder of the Austrian Bible Mission. He said that he had spent six years in a Roman Catholic monastery, and he never saw a Bible before 1933. At that time he went to spy upon certain missionaries to find out all about them, and there he saw a copy of the Bible for the first time. But it was in English, and he could not read it. He had heard about the Bible while he was in the monastery, but he had been told that it was so holy that ordinary mortals could not read it. He was determined out of curiosity to possess himself of a copy which he could read and he sought out a missionary who gave him a German translation, and, as he read, the Word of God was opened to him, and he became an agent for the distribution of Bibles in his country.

Religious Liberty.

Since 1945 in Austria there had been religious liberty, and now no law could prevent the Bible from being read or sold or distributed from door to door. Pastor Pokorny furnished many evidences of the desire of Austrians of all ranks of life for the Scriptures. Within one week, in response to a two-line advertisement, he received 120 letters and postcards asking for the Bible. In Austria also there were a quarter of a million displaced persons—refugees from anywhere between the Baltic and the Balkans—and the Bible was being taken to their camps and most willingly received.

Other inspiring addresses were given at the meeting by Pastor B. S. Brunning and the Rev. J. W. Rowlands.

Clerical Warning.

“Crockford's Clerical Directory” costs, alas, £5 10s. and not many readers, especially among the clergy will be able to enjoy the delights of its latest “Preface” unless, as it should be, it is reprinted as a tract. For four centuries the English have enjoyed the acerbities of theological disputation, and all the more when good, hard knocks are given to prelacy and ecclesiastical presumption. Crockford's anonymous prefaces are famous, but the latest (published in June by the Oxford University Press) is as good as any before it.

ROMAN BROADCAST.

Millions of listeners heard, last Sunday evening, 25th July, a Roman Catholic service broadcast on the Home Service of the BBC. The preacher was Fr. Gordon Albion. No personal criticism attaches to him: he followed a usual Roman line. He spoke with particular reference to the forthcoming œcumenical conference at Evanston, and sought to show why Rome, although “deeply interested,” must hold aloof from all such gatherings. In the very first sentence of his introduction to the service, Fr. Albion distinguished “Catholic” from “Anglican.” He continued throughout his sermon, to lump all non-Roman Christians together in one indiscriminate mass of heretical sects. On the one hand, he set the one and only Catholic Church of Rome: on the other, the “one hundred and sixty Christian denominations meeting at Evanston.” Again and again, he used the word Catholic as being, without question, synonymous with Roman. In one passage, he even went further. “The Catholic Church,” he said, “is acclaimed ‘the Mother and Mistress of Christendom’ even by those who do not give her allegiance. And she, in her turn, regards as her children all who are truly baptized in the faith of Christ, for there is but ‘one Church, one Faith, one Baptism.’ And, therefore, her affectionate and prayerful care extends to all those who have strayed from the unity of the fold and are now seeking, in ways however diverse, to restore that unity.” This comes impertinently close (like other recent Roman broadcasts) to the staking of some sort of claim by Rome over all Christians who are not of papal obedience.

Implicit Attack.

There was nothing new or startling to informed hearers in this preacher's statement of Roman claims. It was the familiar stuff of propaganda, prejudiced in the interpretation of the Scriptures, regretfully, but rigidly, intolerant of all Christians everywhere who dare to challenge the pretensions of the papacy, quietly contemptuous of any part of the Church except the preacher's own. But on the simple and uninstructed, such skilful propaganda may have considerable effect, unless it is promptly encountered and denied. If the BBC is to allow such sermons as this, it should take care to invite the Church of this land to make clear, quickly and beyond all misunderstanding, that it absolutely denies all these Roman assertions. We understand that the BBC warns preachers against making any “attack” on other Christians. On the other hand, it is willing to provide opportunities for “positive statements” of a particular Church's position. But what if such a positive statement necessarily does involve and imply an outrageous attack on the Church of the land? Rome's position postulates this. We, therefore, question most strongly the propriety of the BBC giving facilities for any such sermon as last Sunday's. Roman Catholics in England are a tolerated minority. They are rightly tolerated, but only so long as they themselves do not show intolerance. They do not constitute the Catholic Church of this country: nor would they even if the Church of England were dis-established. They have no right, and should be given no opportunity through the official agency of the BBC, to commit the effrontery of denying the whole status of Ecclesia Anglicana. This is to presume too far.

This Church and Realm.

We hope that vigorous representation will be made from the highest quarters to the authorities of the BBC against further publicity for such patronizing Roman propaganda. In particular, a reminder appears to be necessary that there is only one Church in England which has a responsibility to the whole nation, and it is not the Church of Rome. The Church of England established in this land has a completely distinctive and unique position in the realm of England. It is not, in any sense in the same position as the communion which owes allegiance to the Vatican, nor with the other various Nonconformist bodies. Neither the BBC nor anyone else should treat the Church as if it were so. The Church may, and should, preserve relations of charity and understanding with all other Christians. But she would be false to herself, to her own true Catholic nature and her historic function, if she allowed herself to be patronized by Rome or confused with Protestant Nonconformity.

This Church of England contains within herself all the authentic treasures which Rome possesses, and yet is free from Rome's gross errors of doctrine and government. There is every reason in the world why the Church should be supremely confident as it faces all other Christians bodies to the right hand or to the left. That confidence ought to be reflected clearly in the public utterances of the Church's leaders. They should be as ready and forward to-day as were their predecessors in past generations to maintain, against all comers, the unique position of the Church of this land.—“Church Times,” 30/7/54.

JEWISH MISSIONS TO-DAY.

The Lord Bishop of Rochester.

There is, indeed, this door of opportunity in Israel, and in other lands where the Jews live: and there is the great need of seizing the opportunity which God is giving us in these days. It is really God Who is encountering us, and He is encountering us with a challenge. The question is, what will be our response? Mr. Yorke has referred to the fact that in my diocese of Rochester we are celebrating the 27th Jubilee of the founding of the diocese. We thank God for thirteen and a half centuries of unbroken Christianity in West Kent, for, practically speaking, the Rochester diocese is as old as the Church of England. And Islam is about as old as the Church of England. When you look back, and remember that if the Church had been true to the worship, and doctrine and witness of that Early Church, about which we read in the New Testament, there never would have been any Islam at all: nor would the Jew, coming to Christian lands, have been hardened in his heart against Jesus the Messiah. Our impotence against Islam, as it seems, and our impotence against the hardness of Jewry, is something for which we have to prostrate ourselves in confession and penitence before God; for we have, indeed, failed.

Now the opportunity is being presented to us to-day. I believe, not only with regard to Islam—but more especially with regard to Jewry. In the May/June issue of “World Dominion,” there is a most interesting and penetrating article by a former missionary of the C.M.J.—Rev. H. L. Ellison. He speaks of the turning-point having now come in Christian Jewish relationships, and that God is working, through world affairs, to give us, and is giving us the opportunity. For centuries the relationship between Jew and Christian was vitiated by prejudice, hatred and persecution, then about 150 years ago the situation, mainly for two reasons, began to change. On the one hand, as a result of the gradual separation of Church and State, and the growth of religious toleration, Jews could meet Christians as fellow citizens. Jew and Gentile mixed in schools, in universities, and in other quarters, and they thus grew to know each other better. Then there was also that great re-awakening of Christianity which began 150 years ago, and is signalised by these three Jubilees which are being celebrated just about this time. The C.M.S. has celebrated their Jubilee: the British and Foreign Bible Society is celebrating its Jubilee this year, and we of the Church Missions to Jews are looking forward to celebrating ours in four years' time. And that awakening of missionary interest meant a new approach to the Jew, but it was an approach that was most difficult. For even when, as Christians, we were impelled to go and help the Jew in his need and poverty, it meant that the Christians approached those who hated them. When they helped them by means of their Hospitals, the Jews called it sheer bribery: that they were trying to proselytize them, and to persuade them to alter their faith. But now there has come a change again. Israel now possesses a country. Their nationhood does not depend solely on their religion. And they are meeting in their country peoples of other faiths, and this has inclined the Jew to look at the Scriptures objectively: and in that way he is beginning to have a new conception of Christ. Only this morning I received the quarterly “News Sheet” of the Christian Approach to the Jew, which quotes what the great Jew, Martin Buber, thinks of Christ: and I should say that Mr. Ellison would agree that it was an attitude held by many Jews to-day, possibly secretly, but which is more and more becoming the attitude to Christ especially on the part of young Israel. He says: “The New Testament has been the chief object of my study for nearly fifty years and I think I am a good reader who listens without prejudice to what is said. From my youth I have already regarded Jesus as my big Brother. The fact that Christianity looks upon Him as God and Saviour has always seemed to me a fact of the highest importance, which I must try to understand for my own sake as well as for His sake. I am more certain than ever that He deserves a great place in religious history of Israel and that this place cannot be described in any of the usual categories.” Therefore there has come a new feeling towards Christianity. Christianity is not now something which persecutes the Jews, and which regards them as the murderers of God, dispersed abroad, with no country, because of the Judgments of God upon them. Now it appeals to them with something of pride, that a Jew, the Lord Jesus Christ, has become the great Prophet and divine leader of the Western world.

If we now have that change of atmosphere, bringing this new hope to us, what are we going to do about it? Now I would say that there are two matters about which we ought to pray most earnestly. One is this. At the present time, I suppose in Israel there is only one Jew in four thousand who is baptized and witnessing openly to his faith in Christ. There are, doubtless, many other secret believers. In such cases as that we realise that we have a long way to go before we attain what we realise we must have, and that is an indigenous Christian Church of Israel. But how is that to come about? It will not be as a direct result of the work of English missionaries. It will only be achieved by Jewish "St. Pauls" and we have to be the "Stephens." It is the converts, the "St. Pauls" who will build that indigenous Church. There is, as we know, amazing power, and strength, and intellect in the Jewish race. If only we can bring about the conversion of one or two leading Jews, men of wide culture, of high intellectual ability, and, above all, men of burning faith, to go out and seek to win Israel for Christ.

The second thing for which we have to work and pray is that we may all realise that this work lies at our own door. We do not need to go to Israel, or to Tunis, to find the Jews: they are in our own parishes. What are we doing about them? We might find a St. Paul in this land, who could be sent out. I was so glad to read in the Report that during this year several requests had come into Headquarters, asking for information as to how to prepare certain Jews in different parishes for baptism, and reporting that there were more Jewish children than ever before in our Sunday Schools. I hope more and more that our Church Missions to Jews will become the Society prepared to give this information to our clergy and lay people in the parishes of our land. This work lies at our very doors and we need to pray for guidance as to how to approach the Jews who are already in our midst. In that way, if we can play our part, each one in seeking to win for Christ those of the Jewish race with whom we ourselves come into contact, and then by prayer and thought seeking to send forth to Israel and to other lands the very best missionaries that we can, then we shall indeed, be meeting this challenge which God is confronting us with to-day.

May I close by making one suggestion. Saturday is the Jewish Sabbath. Let us, as Christians, pray for the Jews on the Jewish Sabbath.—"Jewish Missionary News," Aug., 1954.

Chapter 5, verse 19:—"Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs"—The commentary on Ephesians does not offer an explanation of the distinction between these, but the commentary on Colossians does (on Col. 3. 16). There Calvin writes "Under these three terms Paul includes all kinds of songs: a psalm is that, in the singing of which some musical instrument besides the tongue is made use of: a hymn is properly a song of praise, whether it be sung simply with the voice or otherwise: while an ode contains not merely praises, but exhortations and other matters. He would have the songs of Christians to be spiritual, not made up of frivolities and worthless trifles."

Verse 20:—"Giving thanks always" He means that this is a pleasure which ought never to lose its relish; that this is an exercise of which we ought never to weary. He reminds believers that it will argue ungodly and disgraceful sloth if they shall not always give thanks—if their whole life shall not be spent in the study and exercise of praising God.

[The next passage, verses 21 to 27, treat of the interdependence of Christians "in the fear of God", and in particular of the relationship of husband and wife from the standpoint of Christian obligations and responsibilities. The measure of the true relationship is "husbands, love your wives as Christ loved the Church".]

In verse 26 the phrase "washing it (the Church) with the washing of water" is interpreted to mean that "a pledge of sanctification is held out to us by baptism". Here it is necessary to guard against unsound interpretation, lest the wicked superstition of men change a sacrament into an idol. When Paul says that we are washed, by baptism, his meaning is, that God employs it for declaring to us that we are washed and at the same time performs what it represents. If the truth, or exhibition of the truth were not connected with baptism, it would be improper to say that baptism is the washing of the soul. At the same time we must beware of ascribing to the sign or to the minister what belongs to God alone. We must not imagine that washing is performed by the minister, or that water cleanses the pollutions of the soul, which nothing but the blood of Christ can accomplish. In short, we must beware of giving any portion of our confidence to the element or to man; for the true and proper use of the sacrament is to lead us directly to Christ and to place all our dependence upon Him.

Others again suppose that too much importance is given to the sign, by saying that baptism is the washing of the soul. Under the influence of this fear they labour exceedingly to lessen the force of the eulogium which is here pronounced on baptism. But they are manifestly wrong: for in the first place the apostle does not say that it is the sign which washes, but declares it to be exclusively the work of God. It is God who washes, and the honour of performing it cannot lawfully be taken from its Author and given to the sign. But there is no absurdity in saying that God employs a sign as the outward means. Not that the power of God is limited by the sign, but this assistance is accommodated to the weakness of our capacity. Some are offended at this view, imagining that it takes from Holy Spirit a work, which is peculiarly His own, and which is everywhere ascribed to Him in Scripture. But they are mistaken; for God acts by the sign in such a manner, that its whole efficacy depends upon His Spirit. Nothing more is attributed to the sign than to be an inferior organ, utterly useless in itself, except so far as it derives its power from another source.

The grace of God is not confined to the sign so that God may not if He please bestow it without the aid of the sign. Many receive the sign who are not made partakers of grace: for the sign is common to all, good and bad alike: but the Spirit is bestowed on none but the Elect, and the sign has no efficacy without the Spirit.

Verse 26:—"By the Word"—This is not a superfluous addition; for if the word is taken away the whole power of the sacraments is gone. What else are sacraments but seals of the Word? This single consideration will drive away superstition. How comes it that superstitious men are confounded by signs, but because their minds are not directed to the Word which would lead them to God? Certainly when we look to anything else than to the word there is nothing sound, nothing pure: but one absurdity springs out of another, till at length the signs which were appointed by God for the salvation of men become profane, and degenerate into gross idolatry. The only difference between the sacraments of the godly and the contrivances of unbelievers is found in the Word.

By the Word is meant the promise which explains the value and use of the signs.

Verse 27:—"That He might present it to Himself"—He declares the design of baptism and of our being washed—that we may live in a holy and unblamable manner before God. We are washed by Christ, not that we may return to our pollution, but that we may retain through our life the purity which we have once received.

The word "present" implies that the Church ought to be holy in the eyes of the Lord; for Paul says "that He might present it to Himself" not that He might show it to others. Pelagians were wont to quote this passage in order to prove the perfection of righteousness in this life, but have been successfully answered by Augustine. Paul does not state what has been done, but for what purpose Christ has cleansed His Church. We do not deny that the holiness of the Church is already begun; but, so long as there is daily progress there cannot be perfection.

Verse 32:—"This is a great mystery" (the preceding verses have likened true marriage to the union between Christ and His Church, or, the union of Christ and His Church is likened to true marriage). No language can express this adequately. For my own part I am overwhelmed by the depth of this mystery, and am not ashamed to join Paul in acknowledging at once my ignorance and my admiration.

We cannot avoid admiring the acuteness of those who conclude from the word "mystery" that marriage is one of seven sacraments. They enumerate seven sacraments, while Christ has instituted no more than two; and to prove that matrimony is one of the seven they produce this passage. On what ground? Because the Vulgate has adopted the word "Sacramentum" as a translation of the word mystery. As if "Sacramentum" did not frequently, among Latin writers, denote "mystery", or as if "mystery" had not been the word employed by Paul in the same epistle when speaking of the calling of the Gentiles.

The present question is, has marriage been appointed as a sacred symbol of the grace of God, to declare and represent to us something spiritual, such as Baptism or the Lord's Supper? They have no ground for such assertion unless it be that they have been deceived by the doubtful signification of a Latin word, or rather by their ignorance of the Greek language. If the simple fact had been observed, that the word used by Paul is "mystery", no mistake would ever have occurred.

The correction is immediately added "I speak concerning Christ and the Church". He intended to give express warning that no man should understand him as speaking of marriage. The great mystery is, that Christ breathes into the Church his own life and power.

ORIGINS OF UNITARIAN IDEAS IN IRELAND.

Unitarianism has never had much influence or significance in Ireland, but it has been part of the issue whether churches should have credal statements or not. As a theology it has never had much appeal to the people of these islands, who readily recognise that if they are to profess Christianity it must be full-orbed and complete. It must be biblical, and expressive of the saving and renewing power of the Gospel.

The following notes contributed to this issue show that Unitarianism here arose in the slack and tepid half-century before the Evangelical Revival. That Revival, under way from 1750 or thereabouts, gave it a death-blow.

The historical enquiry need not go back beyond the close of the 17th century for I have detected no worthwhile trace of heterodoxy any earlier. The Revolution Settlement of 1690 or thereabouts was a settlement of more than political affairs. It introduced a new liberalism of thought, and the advent of William, Prince of Orange, to the throne of England, made England, Scotland and Ireland aware of the advances in religious opinion which marked the theological schools of Holland. Men were weary of the contentious earnestness of the Puritans and weary too of the Caroline theology. Deism had begun its campaign for reason against faith, and many sober men were reacting against credal rigidity, and were anxious to work out an easier Christian system. The pioneer in Ireland was Thomas Emlyn. His history is curious, a little surprising, more than a little sad.

Emlyn was born in 1663 in Lincolnshire and worshipped in early life under a divine who denied the doctrine of "the eternal generation of the Son". His influence, potentially heterodox, may have affected the young impressionable mind of his pupil.

At a dissenting Academy in Islington he had as a fellow-student the famous commentator Matthew Henry; would that he had followed him! He became an English Presbyterian ministerial candidate and was appointed Private Chaplain to a Presbyterian lady, the Countess of Donegal, in 1683, succeeding in that office a Dr. Boyse. She brought Emlyn to Belfast and in the relaxed religious atmosphere of that town he preached frequently in the Parish Church, the Vicar Claudius Gilbert, being glad to have him. The Bishop of Down, Dr. Hackett licensed him to preach, though a lay nonconformist: (the least of Hackett's faults).

Owing to the outbreak of the Jacobite war in 1688 the household in Belfast broke up, and Emlyn went back to England. He was a while in Liverpool, and the Rector of Liverpool seeing him standing at a hotel door in a black suit requested him to preach in the parish Church, which he did on several occasions so effectively that when the Rector died suddenly the parishioners wanted him to receive the living.

We need not regard this as a case of false pretences, for it was commonly expected that the fall of the Stuarts would bring in a new comprehension, and modify the Act of Uniformity so as to bind up the wounds inflicted on St. Bartholomew's Day 1662.

In 1690 Dr. Sherlock, a Church of England divine, published his "Vindication of the Doctrine of the Holy Trinity", the very title indicating the nature of the discussions taking place in learned circles. Sherlock's position was really Tritheistic, not Trinitarian, a defect from which the lectures on "The Trinity" of the present Divinity Professor at Oxford, Dr. Hodgson seem not to be entirely free. A re-action from this book brought Emlyn to a semi-arian position, that is, to the view advocated by the two great Church of England divines, Dr. Whiston translator of Josephus, and Dr. Saml. Clarke who led the fight for broadened terms of subscription in the Established Church.

In 1691 Emlyn was ordained as colleague to his friend Boyse who was now settled in Wood St. Presbyterian meeting in Dublin. He preached a tolerant ethical Christianity, and having confided his views to Boyse was by him delated to the Dublin presbytery, and by it deposed. He then published a "Humble Enquiry into the Scriptures account of Jesus Christ".

Presented to the Grand Jury of Dublin for blasphemy, on the plea of the Attorney General, Rochfort, he was granted bail, but afterwards convicted and sentenced to a year's imprisonment and £1,000 fine. The Solicitor General Broderick appealed to him to retract, as did Humphrey Jervis, foreman of the Jury and Lord Mayor, and Bishop Wetenhall, but he would not.

He was allowed to preach in jail, and at length the Lord Lieutenant reduced the fine to £70, and he was released in 1705.

Emlyn lived in England till 1741 and was an occasional communicant of the Church of England. His influence was felt in Belfast where a learned Presbyterian, Mr. Abernethy set up a Belfast society of ministers which laid the foundation of the anti-Westminster Confession and Subscription movement.

After twenty years of contention over subscription to the Westminster Confession among the Presbyterians the non-subscribers were segregated in the Presbytery of Antrim. They had no longer any part in the proceedings of the Synod of Ulster, but continued in ministerial communion with the rest of the church, which then gradually gave up imposing the Confession on ministers and licentiatees.

The history of subscription among Irish Presbyterians is not without interest. The early Scots settlers had as their formula of faith the Scots Confession of 1560, but did not enforce subscription to it. Of the ten original Presbyterian Congregations in Ireland, six are still non-subscribing.

After 1690 better organisation prevailed, and in 1692 the first General Synod of Ulster was set up. In 1698 licentiatees were expected to sign the Westminster Confession, and in 1705 a further effort was made to make it a condition of ordination, so that the so-called "New Light" might be quenched and the "Old Light" burn more brightly.

This subscription controversy was not peculiar to Irish Presbyterianism. Among English dissenters the growth of Arianism was suspected in some Presbyterian congregations in the Western counties and an appeal for investigation and settlement was sent to a group of ministers in London. This led to the famous Salters' Hall controversy. Some wanted the doctrine of the Holy Trinity affirmed as the essential bond of faith and communion; while others held that "human interpretations" of the Scripture (by which they meant the Creeds) should not be made a text of Christian fellowship. The meeting was perhaps less turbulent than the ancient General Councils; and when the house divided on the vote the liberals went to the gallery and the conservatives remained on the floor—the cry was "those against persecution come up", and "those for the Trinity stay below". The progressives had a majority of four, and thus the old Presbyterianism of England went on the slippery path of Unitarianism. Not till well into the 19th century did a new English Presbyterian Church arise having to-day about the same number of charges as the Unitarians, but far more numerous, and owing most to Scottish residents.

In like manner the subscription controversy raged in the Church of England under the leadership of the Court Chaplain Dr. Samuel Clarke, but deriving much strength from the very moderate principles of Dr. Benjamin Hoadly, who as Bishop of Bangor engaged in controversy with the non-juror Wm. Law. It had the support, until his deprivation, of Wm. Whiston the successor of Isaac Newton, and both a mathematician and student of Christian origins, a combination of interests reproduced lately in the distinguished former occupant of the See of Birmingham, Dr. Barnes.

Whiston was a Eusebian, or Semi-Arian, who recommended Samuel Clarke for preferment, perhaps because he learnt that Clarke had only once, and that by mistake, read the Athanasian Creed in Church!

Clarke was anti-metaphysical in thought and while devotionally as loyal to the Son of God as any, taught that honour paid to the Son and to the Holy Spirit tends to the honour of the Father by whose good pleasure we are redeemed and sanctified. Clarke treated the Early Fathers not as authorities but as illustrations, and claimed to base his faith solely on Scripture, which was of course the claim made by all non-subscribers, Irish and English, until the rise of 19th century biblical criticism.

Part of the policy of Clarke and his friends was to unite Dissenters with the Church on a liberal basis. He revised the Prayer Book in an Arianising direction and hoped that this, with modified subscription to the 39 Articles, would encourage men to do away with all obstacles to union.

Clarke's modified Trinitarianism brought him into conflict with the great Archdeacon of Middlesex, Dr. Daniel Waterland, the most distinguished defender of the orthodox position in the 18th century. Waterland wrote against what was called "Arian subscription to the Articles" by which the subscriber made his views on the Sixth Article control all the other 38 (Art. 6 declares that Holy Scripture is The Rule of Faith).

The Church of Ireland was not untouched by these controversies. The Church here felt the influences of Presbyterian non-subscription at home, and Anglican non-subscription overseas. Emlyn's trial roused interest in his opinions; and there were "liberal" bishops like Wetenhall of Kilmore and Hort of Tuam and Hoadly of Ferns and Rundle of Derry. Rundle had been thought too unorthodox for the See of Gloucester, and so was comforted by appointment to the best bishopric in Ireland. These men represented a liberal and rational strain in the Irish episcopate, and we may suppose that the clergy under them suffered little enquiry into their opinions.

A striking instance of this sort of liberal opinion among the Irish clergymen is provided by William Robertson who was born in a Presbyterian family in Dublin in 1705 and educated at Glasgow college. He studied divinity there under John Simson who taught nearly a generation of Presbyterian students who entered the ministry of the Irish Presbyterian Church, until suspicion that he was an Arian led to his well justified suspension.

Robertson fought against the Principal of Glasgow College in order to wrest from him the appointment of the Lord Rector whose election by right belonged to the students. For this temerity he was expelled, and being a friend of young members of the family of the Duke of Argyll he took his grievance to London and secured a Royal Commission to investigate the affairs of the College, with the result that he was restored to his degree and won the day. The Duke's brother introduced Robertson to Benjamin Hoadly who became Bishop of Bangor as we have noted in connection with the Clarkean movement. This bishop, whose brother became Archbishop of Armagh, introduced Robertson to Archbishop Wake of Canterbury and to Josiah Hort bishop of Ferns. He also met Peter, Lord King, who was Lord Chancellor. Hort had been a Presbyterian minister in the West of England where the controversies had arisen which led to the Salters' Hall Conference. He conformed to the Church of England in 1704 and was ordained in 1705. He came to Ireland as chaplain to Lord Lieutenant in 1709, and after holding two deaneries was made Bishop of Ferns in 1721 and Archbishop of Tuam in 1742.

In such liberal circles Robertson had no difficulty in conforming to the Established Church, and John Hoadly, later Lord Primate, who succeeded Hort in the See of Ferns brought him to Ireland, and ordained him. For some years he was rector of Rathvilly and curate of St. Luke's Dublin.

In 1759 he felt he could not remain in the Church and resigned. He wrote a book entitled "An attempt to explain the words 'Reason' and 'Substance'" and put forward a plan for a comprehensive established Church in which assent to the Bible only should be required. The Prayer Book was to be freed from all controverted points.

He left Ireland in 1767, and having spent a while as a schoolmaster joined Theophilus Lindsay as assistant in Essex St. Chapel, London in 1778. Lindsay had been a parochial clergyman for many years who became Arian and began the Essex Chapel as a non-Trinitarian place of worship. He hoped that a succession of clergymen of the same views would follow him. Lindsay always called Robertson "the father of Unitarian non-conformity" by which he meant that Robertson's resignation of his Irish living led him to resign his Yorkshire one.

We have mentioned a few "liberal" bishops in Ireland in the 18th century, but must give a little space to the most outspoken of them all, Robert Clayton who was in turn Bishop of Killala, Cork, and Clogher.

Clayton had been a Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin in 1714. On marriage he lived for a time in London where a female relation was intimate with Queen Caroline. This Queen was liberal in her religious views, a lax Lutheran, and a patron of the Irish deist John Toland. Through this relative Clayton came under the influence of the queen's chaplain Samuel Clarke, and on his return to Ireland devoted much of his energy to propagating Clarkean views. He was a keen defender of the Bible against the sceptics, and a pioneer of Biblical Archaeology. [In this connection it was appropriate that he should have been a Fellow of the same college as Edward Hincks, one of the greatest scholars in the Church in the 19th century.]

As a disciple of Clarke, Clayton wrote in 1757 "an Essay on Spirit". It is avowedly Arian, and its purpose was to attract to the Church of Ireland the liberal and non-subscribing Presbyterians. He was on friendly terms with many of them, and wrote in his essay that "all points of doctrine should be as plain, as few, as fundamental, as possible". Not till the Council of Nicara, he said, was subscription demanded to the doctrine of the Consubstantiality of the Son and the Father—"I apprehend", he wrote, "that the Church of Ireland doth not set up for Infallibility—I do not think she requireth any other kind of subscription that such as is necessary for peace and quietness." Assent, he held, should be to the use of the Book of Common Prayer, which was the original purpose of the Act of Uniformity, not to the truth of every statement therein. A study of the pre-Nicene Fathers would show, he thought, that the doctrine of Arius is either a truth, or at least, no damnable heresy! The Reformation, he felt, had not gone far enough, and he developed this by a reference to Chillingworth, who said that the doctrine of the Trinity is as certainly revealed in Matt. 28, 19 as the doctrine of the Eucharist is in Matt. 26, 26; but the Scriptures are as silent about the Consubstantiality of the one as about the Transubstantiation of the other—whence came these doctrines? From the papal chair!

This Essay, published in 1757 prevented Clayton receiving the Archbishopric of Tuam. Yet he persevered, and made a speech in the House of Lords urging that the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds should be deleted from the Prayer Book. He declared that the Nicene Fathers were not infallible; and that it is absolutely contradictory of the fundamental principle of the Reformation to have any doctrine established as a rule of faith which is founded upon Tradition and not plainly revealed in Scripture.

He declared further that the Athanasian Creed is too metaphysical for public services. This objection was accepted by the Church of Ireland more than a century after, when at the Revision (1878) the rubric directing the saying of this Creed was rescinded.

Clayton's chief opponent in the House of Lords was the Primate, George Stone.

When this storm died down Clayton published a criticism of a Deistic work by Lord Bolingbroke, and in it vigorously attacked the doctrine of the Trinity. This led to a decision on the part of his fellow bishops to have him deposed, but he died suddenly. Whatever we may think of Clayton's theology we can scarcely endorse the attack on him made by the Bishop Warburton. "The bishop of Clogher or some such heathenish name in Ireland has published a book. It is made up out of the rubbish of old heresies of a much ranker cast than common Arianism. This might be heresy in an English bishop, but in an Irish one it is only a blunder."

* * *

About the beginning of the 19th century a curate of Bangor, Co. Down, a Mr. Armstrong left his benefice, having turned Arian. In his retirement he entered into a correspondence with the notable ex-Roman Catholic priest Joseph Blanco White who at the time was tutor in the family of the Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. Whately. His influence led White to withdraw from the Church into Unitarianism. Armstrong later became a Unitarian minister in the West of England, and a disciple of the great American Unitarian, W. E. Channing.

As the century advanced the Presbyterians began to be anxious, under the evangelical influence of the Seceders who had come from Scotland, about the Arians in their midst, and led by Henry Cooke entered into a conflict to secure control of the Belfast College in which ministerial candidates were trained. A large influence in the College was exercised by the Arian minister of Dunmurry, Henry Montgomery, who was the natural, life-long rival of Cooke since the day they had been candidates for a call to the Church of Donegore, in which Cooke had been victorious.

Dr. Cooke devised a Code of Discipline which made subscription to the Confession of Faith compulsory. Politics were involved too, for Cooke was conservative and against Roman Catholic Emancipation, while Montgomery was liberal and for a time the bosom friend of O'Connell, or so O'Connell said. (See Montgomery's Reply to O'Connell—Crozier's Life of M.)

The history of the time is well-known: Cooke carried the day, and seventeen ministers who voted against the Code, withdrew from the Synod of Ulster to form the Remonstrant Synod of non-subscribers. Yet not all of them were Arian, but rather anti-Calvinistic.

The great speech-making contest between Cooke and Montgomery took place in Lurgan, then regarded as a stronghold of Arianism. Yet the Lurgan minister and elders subscribed. That was what Montgomery expected, for he said men might change their vote but not their convictions; and Arianism did not quite die out and non-subscribers continue in Congregations attached to the former Synod of Ulster.

The 1859 Revival no doubt re-evangelised many, and gave the majority of Presbyterians a fervour they have kept.

The Remonstrants of 1830 did not join forces with the non-subscribing Presbytery of Antrim but pursued an independent course. Freedom from creeds had disadvantages, and Presbyterianism by its very nature regards a Presbytery as a Church, so that it came about that the old Presbytery of Antrim, strictly non-subscribing, fell apart by the secession of a number of Congregations about the middle of the century. They formed the Northern Presbytery of Antrim, taking as their ground the affirmation "we put prominently forward a principle which Antrim presbytery deems unnecessary in the terms of their corporate union, that without faith in Christ and Revelation our ministry would be a mockery and our position a snare".

The Northern presbytery rejoined the old presbytery after some years, and about thirty or forty years ago Antrim and the Remonstrant Synod combined to found the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church. Its constitution declares the Scriptures to be the Rule of Christian faith. It speaks of Christ as Lord and Master, and thus remains true to the Irish history of non-subscription, that is, it avoids the drift to mere theism and rejects the outlook of much U.S.A. Unitarianism which attaches no special importance to the teaching of Jesus.

But surely non-Subscription is not enough. We need a positive conviction about Jesus Christ. Call Him "Lord and Master" if you will, but this need only mean that we defer to His opinions, and try to save ourselves. Call Him "Saviour", and that means sharing in a victory over sin and death which He alone could win. The Incarnation and Atonement are the vital beliefs of the Christian. They convert, they inspire, they sanctify. They have been and always will be the true incentives to Christian witness in this World of sin and ignorance.

REVIEW.

The Oxford Group.

("Inside Buchmanism" Geoffrey Williamson. Watts & Co., London 1954. 227 pp. 12/6).

This book is described by the author as "an independent enquiry into the Oxford Group Movement and Moral Re-Armament." It is timely, and interesting, for the general reader. For those who know something of modern religious movements and the effectiveness of personality the book may be a little disappointing. If so, the reason probably is that the author is on unfamiliar ground, and a little bewildered by religious phenomena. Yet we think he has done the job better than a theological writer would have done. He is an experienced journalist; but he has not missed the point as experienced journalists often do when they write about religious matters.

About twenty-five years ago we were all sitting up, and taking notice of the "Oxford Group," a new religious drive led by Dr. Frank Buchman, an American Lutheran who had been a missionary. We remember how it set out to change the lives of all sorts of people—to free them from fear, frustration and sin. Its method was largely "sharing" of experiences. This form of open and public confession was supposed to liberate the emotions and "cleanse the stuffed bosom of that perilous stuff that weighs upon the heart." It led to some painful exhibitions, or so we heard at the time.

Then on the positive side the movement urged upon all the duties of absolute honesty, absolute love, absolute purity, absolute unselfishness. Absolutes are very difficult of attainment, but the effort must be worth while, and no doubt great numbers of people benefited greatly, and thereafter led more useful, happier, and better lives.

The movement began with strong and positive claims to be Christian. Its later definition of itself as "A First Century Christian Fellowship" affirmed that; for "a first century fellowship" claimed to reproduce the spiritual faith, experience, and life of the twelve apostles and their followers.

Further, the movement was strong in individual "guidance." It was believed that God promptly gave directions in answer to individual enquiries, and raw young men and women could readily solve the spiritual problems of the ages. Perhaps we ought not to be too severe in criticism, for most spiritual ferments settle down, and if they hold fast to the Scriptures as their Rule of Faith do good work. But it seemed to us that there was a great lack of humility about the Group movement and a sad misunderstanding of the patient continuance in grace and well-doing which has marked God's people everywhere and always. Because they did not boast, Groupers felt called to teach them how to do it.

Again, it seemed to us, and this is also Mr. Williamson's impression, that the movement "dearly loved a lord:" that people of rank, wealth and title were publicised unduly if they adhered to the Groups. Someone quoted by Mr. Williamson described the whole thing as "the Salvation Army in evening dress."

With the outbreak of war in 1939 little was heard of the Oxford Groups. Dr. Buchman had returned to America, and was often remembered in Great Britain as the man "who thanked God for Hitler." It appears that this was an unfair use of his words, for the whole dictum was to the effect that he thanked God for Hitler having erected a barrier against Communism.

However the movement reappeared as M.R.A. (=moral re-armament). It acquired a vast hotel at Caux in Switzerland and uses it regularly for international assemblies. Wide varieties of people attend, and Mr. Williamson was commissioned to write about Moral Re-Armament for his newspaper, and was consequently invited to be present in 1949. He describes the stay he made at Caux and the impressions he received. But he tells that after his return to London he set about clarifying his impressions and then found several remarkable things—

In 1933 Archbishop Lang of Canterbury, and Bishop Ingram of London commissioned large numbers of Groupers as evangelists; holding that they were doing what the church exists to do; "changing human lives." In Europe and North America the activity of the movement in preaching Christ was extolled. In 1938 Dr. Buchman, speaking of the state of Europe, said "the crisis is fundamentally a moral one. The nations must re-arm morally. Moral recovery is essentially the forerunner of economic recovery." Thus the slogan "Moral Re-Armament," was launched.

In July 1946 the first World Assembly for Moral Re-Armament was held. Each year since one has been held, and Mr. Williamson says "the anti-Communist note is being sounded more strongly every year." He also says that since the second world war the Group campaigns have been of a political character. The movement is incorporated in England as "The Oxford Group Ltd." for "the advancement of the Christian religion," but it is incorporated in Switzerland as "The Foundation for Moral Re-Armament," and Mr. Williamson at Caux read an abundance of pamphlets on the movement which had no mention whatever of "the advancement of the Christian religion." M.R.A., he says, "is now held out as something acceptable for people of any race or creed."

"One gets the impression that, for all their sincerity, the Buchmanites are playing at evangelism and dabbling in world politics."

Still, in answer to this Mr. Williamson was told at Caux that religion is still the basis: that the teachings have never wavered, and that the essence is "God-control."

How is Caux financed? The hotel cost £80,000, and the furnishings and food are still those of a first-class hotel. The generosity of sympathisers, rich and poor, in Switzerland and elsewhere enables this luxurious setting of M.R.A. to prosper.

In England the movement is maintained by gifts and legacies, and its assets are held for the movement and its aims.

Mr. Williamson gives a valuable chapter to Dr. Buchman himself. M.R.A. etc., may now have outgrown the founder, but we may note his words at Visby, Sweden, in 1938 "I am tremendously interested in how to save a crumbling civilisation."

There have been rifts in the lute of Groupism.

The late U.S.A. national headquarters was for long at Calvary Episcopal Church, New York. The rector, the Rev. Samuel Shoemaker was one of Buchman's first adherents, and wrote some striking books, but now he has said "When the Oxford Group Movement was, on its own definition, a movement of vital personal religion, working within the churches to make the principles of the New Testament practical as a working force to-day, we fully identified ourselves with it. Certain policies and points of view, however, have arisen in the development of Moral Re-Armament, about which we have had increasing misgivings," so Calvary Church is no longer available for Group use as headquarters.

Mr. Williamson has written a worthwhile book on an important movement. He says "I have always believed in God," so he is not a priori antagonistic.

Even when one disagrees one must admire the gusto, the neatness of the thrust, and the hard common sense. It will be read with mixed feelings by diocesans and deans, though the lower clergy (unless they be High) may rejoice. The most impressive section is the warning to the Church of England in the dangers implicit in the proposed revised Canon Law on marriage and divorce. There have been few more searching examinations of the arguments behind the rigorist view to which the revised canons would bind the Church. It deserves close study. But, the interpretation of disputable texts apart, the writer is surely right in contending that persistence in the attempt to give this view the status of the law of the land "promises the probability of a serious clash between Church and State".

"The City of Vision had twelve gates and it is not wisdom to bar any of them with rigid regulations; the Church of England will be forsaking her genius and lose her distinctive value should she do so."

The lesson of Parliament and the revised Prayer Book in 1927 and 1928 must not be forgotten. Its rejections "were directed neither against religion nor against the Church, but against a particular type of religion and a particular conception of the Church. The one thing, more than any other capable of dispersing to a sufficient degree and for long enough to be effective the 'ataraxia' or insensibility of public opinion to ecclesiastical affairs is prelatial and clerical dictation, or what could with plausibility if not with truth be represented as such. To ignore this is to live in a fool's paradise, a pleasant abode, perhaps, but only so long as it is habitable; and it is one of which the Church has only a leasehold terminable by others without its consent."

These things may pain, but it is good that the warning should come from inside the Church.

Prayer Defeats Persecution.

The sufferings of our Evangelical brethren in Colombia, South America, have weighed heavily on the hearts of Protestants in Britain and the United States. Reference was made recently in our Notes to the Two Articles recommended for insertion in a Revised Constitution: the Articles were meant to make Protestant worship and education well-nigh impossible. On April 1st, Governor Castillo issued the following Articles: 1.—From this date Protestant pastors . . . are prohibited from celebrating religious services except in church buildings, from public distribution of literature favouring any religion distinct from the Catholic, and in general from any proselytism or public worship of their sect; 2.—This prohibition includes the obligation of Protestant Pastors not to open the doors of their chapels when they celebrate any religious service of their sect. The pressure from Protestant churches in Britain and America through diplomatic channels has now called a halt to Roman Catholic intolerance. A delegation of American Protestant Churchmen called at the Colombian Embassy in Washington on May 12th to plead that Latin American countries should guarantee the same religious freedom to Protestant minorities, as the United States grants to her Roman Catholic minority. Mr. Charles Taft, the spokesman, expressed concern over the Two Articles and the proposed revision of the Colombian Constitution; he said the changes would conflict with the Colombian and United States Treaty of 1846, also with the statement on religious freedom in the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. So great has been the power of Protestant influence from Britain and America that the Constitution Assembly has been postponed until later in the year. This is regarded by our Evangelical brethren in Colombia as "an answer to prayer". The Protestant schools, accommodating 600 scholars, which were closed, have now been re-opened. Two leading newspapers severely condemned their closure. One influential daily said: "To leave 600 children without schools is as serious an act as it is censurable. The establishment by Decree, of one religion over another, can be the source of undesirable conflicts and disturbances." The re-opening of the schools "is taken as a further answer to prayer". Our brethren still suffer, and the Evangelical Union of South America appeals to all Evangelicals everywhere to join in prayer on June 15th that "full freedom of religion" and education may soon be extended to persecuted Protestants.—"The Christian", 11/6/'54.

We excerpt the following from "The Irish Press", 12/7/'54.

"If the Orangemen were allowed to look with unprejudiced eyes at the Twenty-Six Counties they would see that Protestants enjoy equally with Catholics the rights of the citizen: freedom of worship and education, access to all posts in the public services. Foreigners coming to this country with open minds, find Protestants enjoying certain obvious social and economic advantages. That can surprise them if they have been led by anti-Irish propaganda to expect to see the religious minority the victims of discrimination. Anyone with a knowledge of our history knows that those advantages had their origin in days of Protestant ascendancy; but since the achievement of independence for the Twenty-Six Counties no one has even thought of attempting to alter those special circumstances. Penalisation and partiality do not exist."

[We pause at the words "access to all posts in the public services", for it will be within the memory of most of us that a Protestant was rejected as candidate for a public librarianship in Eire. It was deemed improper that a Protestant should manage a library most of whose readers are Roman Catholic. Other instances in public service are known.

Protestants "enjoy certain obvious social and economic advantages"—It is a pity that we were not told what these "advantages" are. This sort of talk is misleading, for it corresponds to no realities we hear of.

"No one has even thought of attempting to alter those special circumstances". If they no longer exist, how can they be altered?

It is to be remembered that the organisation "Maria Duce" exists in Eire, and one of its objectives is to deprive Protestants of the religious recognition accorded them in Art. 44 of the Constitution of Eire.

We do not hesitate to acknowledge the goodwill and fairness shown to the Protestant minority by successive governments in Eire. At the higher levels of public life what the "Press" says is true. At lower levels there is room for improvement at times. Perhaps in this imperfect world it is the same everywhere.]

PASSING EVENTS.

Colombian Constitution.

The Colombian Assembly is to meet this month to consider the reform of the Constitution. A preparatory Commission has been sitting some time to recommend changes in the Constitution, and two Articles which are proposed are vital to the existence of Protestantism. Article 18 deals with the preaching, teaching, worship and "proselytizing" activity of non-Catholics, which will be permitted inside churches and buildings set apart for worship, on condition that they are not contrary to Christian (Catholic) morality or the law. Article 19 recommends that public education shall be Romanist education. Private schools, exclusively for non-Catholics, will be permitted. If any Catholic pupils attend these private schools they must receive a Catholic education. These two Articles have much in common with the Concordat negotiated recently between Franco and the Papacy. They were recommended by eight votes to six for consideration by the Assembly in May. During discussion in the Commission it was said these Articles "could have effects in lands with which Colombia has treaties of friendship and where the Roman Church is a minority". A leading newspaper, El Tiempo, stated on April 1st "No Colombian ignores the repercussion which certain unfortunate acts of religious sectarianism, in cases of fanatical persecution of Evangelicals, have had in the United States and Great Britain". Another member of the Commission said the Protestants were considered worse enemies than Communists. Dr. Alzate, a leading Conservative politician, added that if the Articles "were applied to the Roman Catholic Church in countries where it is a minority, it would place that Church in grave difficulties". Let all Evangelicals who can, protest against the Articles 18 and 19 by communicating at once with The Evangelical Alliance, 30 Bedford Place, London, W.C.1.

Worker-Priests Issue.

Paris, February 23.

Three more worker-priests have added their signatures to the original letter of protest against the hierarchy's decision to wind up their mission, thus bringing the total number up to 78.

M. Mauriac explains in this morning's "Figaro" that in his article last week he was trying to envisage the problem in general terms and not really suggesting, as he seemed to do, that the negotiation of a new concordat was possible. The rest of his article is devoted mainly to stressing the tragic gravity of the decision to be taken by the worker-priests in the course of this week, at a time when the Church is deprived of the Pope's guidance owing to his illness. This M. Mauriac uses as an argument for a more conciliatory attitude on both sides. He concludes:

"Can so grave a blow, which would echo in the spiritual history of France and the world, be delivered at a moment when Peter is not at the tiller—as when the Lord himself was prostrate and asleep in the middle of the storm? Would it not be right to wait until he awakens and can speak himself to the wind and the sea? Then perhaps there might be a great calm."

M. Mauriac seems to express the hope that the decisive date of March 1 may be postponed until the whole question can be re-examined by the highest Catholic authority.

Limoges Priests Submit.

Paris, February 23.

Worker-priest at Limoges have agreed reluctantly to obey the Church and abandon their missions. They stated their intentions in a letter to their bishop. But, they added, their decision did not indicate their endorsement of the Vatican's decision to end the worker-priest movement in its present form—British United Press.

East German Lutheran Church Congress.

Leipzig, July 11

A five-day rally of the All-German Evangelical Church ended to-day with a last service in the centre of this East German city which is believed to be the biggest ever held in Germany. The police estimated the crowds as between 300,000 and 500,000, at least three times as big as Dr. Billy Graham's final rally in the Wembley Stadium.

The enormous congregation spread out in a semi-circle in front of a white cross more than 30ft. high. The singing of hymns and recital of the Lord's Prayer could be heard miles away. The people were led by a thousand brass instruments. A collection was taken by hundreds of white-hooded sisters of charity in white aprons. They carried it in a long procession to three large boxes in front of the cross.

Speakers at the rally have repeatedly played on the theme that the Christian Gospel comes ahead of political beliefs, Communist or other.

At a stormy meeting last night, the East German Culture Minister, Herr Johannes Becher, was (according to the West German newsagency) told by a middle-aged woman that in the East German plebscite on the European Army last month she was forced to falsify the count. The agency said she asked Herr Becher to make sure that "Christians are not again asked to go through such an ordeal of conscience".

The agency also reported that the East German Deputy Premier, Herr Otto Nuschke, said to-day that East Germans who expressed anti-Communist views "may be summoned to a questioning" but would not be punished. He said those who opposed the Government needed to be persuaded not punished.

A Swedish Bishop, Dr. John Cullberg, conveyed the greetings of the World Council of Churches and the Lutheran World Union to the rally. He said the German Evangelical Church had remained internally unshakable throughout a period of trial and suffering in recent decades. He assured them that whatever might come they were not alone.—Reuter.

Bonn, July 12.

The great Evangelical Church congress in Leipzig last week-end which ended with extraordinary scenes on Sunday night has left a deep impression in Western Germany reflected in the most stirring accounts of the devotion of the 350,000 persons which it is said were there.

There is part of one account from the chief Frankfurt paper's special correspondent. "The faithful have been marching through the Leipzig street and gathering in the open squares of the second largest city in the Soviet zone in order to proclaim the word of God at eleven different points, and to sing and praise congregationally. A special feature has been the mission for children. Boys and girls from 12 to 14 have been gathering in the racecourse to hear the word of God. "The purpose of the mission has been to raise this youth from the status of a mere object to that of Christian activity."

At the closing scenes on the Rosental Meadow, 300 church banners rimmed with black, red, and gold, gave solemnity to the scene and a cross was erected 20 metres high. Hymns and chorales were being sung everywhere including the tramway cars. All this fervent singing culminated with Luther's hymn "Now thank we all our God" to the accompaniment of a quarter hour of bell ringing from all the church towers of Leipzig. The congress President, Pastor von Thadden-Triglier, said in his concluding words:

"This has been the most impressive of all annual assemblies since the beginning of the German evangelical laity movement. This congress is surely going to remain written in German church history."

Among the concluding messages there was a fraternal greeting from the woman president of the 1952 Catholic Congress of Berlin, Frau Hedwig Klausener.

One of the most picturesque contributions to proceedings was a speech by the Pomeranian nobleman, Klaus von Bismarck-Villingst. On this theme: "Am I still an East German Junker or am I an exile who might manage in the bourgeois West to recreate an existence for his family?" This, one of the most controversial utterances heard by the congress, is described by West German journalists as containing barbed criticisms of a social-ethical character at the expense of East and West and also of the church as a property owner.

"I see no way of getting back to my Pomeranian property unless through fresh wars and terrors," said the former Prussian landlord. "In my view, history—of which God is the Lord and Master—has already changed the conditions of property in that land." He then appealed for "brotherly understanding" and for God's support to be granted to all those who after losing lands and possessions had chosen to make their lives henceforth as agricultural labourers.

There is little attempt yet to assess this extraordinary religious event in its significance for Germany's territorially and politically sundered condition. What is the meaning of an occasion at which the Speakers of the Parliaments of both the Germanys, so deeply differing in character and professed ideals, have been jointly present, and also the Deputy Premier of the Soviet zone, Otto Nuschke, speaking conciliatory words? All this will evidently need a good deal of digestion by thoughtful people.

Bonn, July 13.

The meaning of the Leipzig Evangelical Church congress is the great discussion of the day. The Speaker of the Federal Assembly, who met his East German counterpart there, rendered explanations at a press conference in Bonn to-day.

Dr. Ehlers was accompanied at this press conference by deputies from both the C.D.U. and the Social Democratic party who had been to Leipzig. He described the congress as the biggest all-German event since 1945. He said he had thought it right and natural upon the invitation of the president of the congress to take part in a luncheon attended by the Speaker of the East German Assembly, Herr Johannes Diechmann, and with the East German Vice-Premier, Herr Nuschke. He pointed out, on the other hand, that he had refused an invitation from the Leipzig City Council.

At the table, Dr. Ehlers went on, there had been no talk of German unity or about the means to its achievement, no dwelling upon the theme of "all Germans sitting together at one table". He denied reports that he had prayed jointly with Herr Diechmann; they had stood with bowed heads together, but it would have been no catastrophe if they had joined in prayer. Of course an important political significance could not be denied in this manifestation of unity in church matters.

"Basis For Co-operation."

The participation of West German politicians had diminished the apprehension of the East German population that they had in effect been written off by the West. If there had been propaganda intentions on the Soviet side, these had miscarried. In conclusion, Dr. Ehlers paid tribute to the efficiency and good behaviour of the People's Police at the congress, and said that the making available of the Soviet Pavilion for the proceedings had been "worthy of respect". Yet a certain reserve was not out of place.

One of the Socialist deputies, Herr Metzger, said that at Leipzig he had found Christian conceptions offering a good basis for co-operation. Differences were not so wide as was often believed. It was plain fact that at the congress Christian and Soviet symbols had stood side by side.

Another of those present was the Federal Minister of Cults, Dr. Tillmann. He said that the political significance of the congress lay precisely in the fact that it had no political significance. The Soviet zone authorities, he believed, had intended something very different from what had actually come to pass. At a Cabinet meeting to-day Dr. Tillmann and a colleague who had been to Leipzig gave assurances that no political discussions had been conducted in the course of the religious proceedings.

Holy Virginity.

On April 30th the Vatican made public an encyclical on priestly celibacy and religious chastity—with the title "Holy Virginity". The encyclical explains the Roman Catholic teaching of the superiority of celibacy and virginity over the married relationship. It is claimed that monks and nuns possess a higher degree of sanctity than the sanctity of marriage and the home. The present encyclical is a warning to the neo-modernist movements in Italy and France: all younger priests are warned against attending cinemas or reading novels, on the pretext that to do so enables them to understand what the modern world is thinking and doing. This present encyclical is clearly inspired by the Jesuit idea of celibacy—that not only must the monk and the nun forsake the world and retire into a monastery or nunnery, but the priest must also renounce every contact with the world as far as it is possible. This double standard of purity and piety as taught by the Roman Church is unscriptural. To teach that Christian marriage relegates man and wife to a lower state of piety and morality, is nowhere supported in the New Testament. Moreover, the regarding of the monastic as the perfect type of Christianity, and the marriage relation as the imperfect type, has been harmful down the ages. The monk and the priest are not more holy in the sight of God than the Protestant minister or the faithful factory worker. The nun is not on a higher level of piety than the Christian mother. We honour the men and women who remain unmarried that they may serve their Lord and Master, but such men and women do not claim for themselves a higher state of holiness. The final condemnation of this double Christian standard of piety is the history of monasticism. This judgment is not to deny the presence of saintly men and women in the monasteries and nunneries.

Every reader of James Boswell's "Life of Dr. Johnson" knows that Johnson was a devout and practising member of the Church of England: it is generally known too that there is a little volume of prayers and meditations composed by Johnson which reveals his sincerity, humility, and unaffected devotion. It is not difficult to form an impression of his spiritual outlook.

One feature of Johnson's later years was recurrent fear of death. This is in no way remarkable if we recognise, first of all, that there is a judgment; and secondly, that Johnson was temperamentally of a melancholic disposition. The great man was conscious of his sins; and a sense of unworthiness (the result of taking the Christian faith seriously) always occupied his thoughts. We might say that his faith ought to have given him a more confident attitude to judgment, and relieved him of any uneasiness. But he believed that God is holy and just. He could not compromise in that, and he was not as familiar as we are with the assurance that Jesus Christ is the Lamb of God who took away the sins of the world. Perhaps he ought to have enjoyed more solace from his religion. But it is not given to everyone to be free from doubts and uncertainties.

Nevertheless we have dependable information that Johnson had much religious comfort given him from many sources, and that his death was calm, trusting, and gentle. Lord Macaulay (who had close contact with the Johnson circle through Hannah More) wrote—"His temper became unusually patient and gentle: he ceased to think with terror of death and of which lies beyond death, and he spoke much of the mercy of God and of the propitiation of Christ. In this serene frame of mind he died."

This reference to Lord Macaulay we owe to a most interesting and enlightening article which appeared in the "Evangelical Quarterly" (vol. 16, Jan. 1944)—"The religion of Dr. Johnson" by W. T. Cairns, D.D. Dr. Cairns also accepts a story of the influence on Johnson of letters from an evangelical clergyman named Winstanley, and of conversations with a Mr. Latrobe. These brought Johnson to "the renunciation of self, and a simple reliance on Jesus as His Saviour."

In his prayer composed for the last time he received the Sacrament of Holy Communion (a week before he died) he asked God "to forgive and accept my late conversion." This, of course, is expressive of regret that in earlier life he had not displayed the faith and repentance he had always known he ought to have. This prayer (quoted by Dr. Cairns) shows a sound evangelical faith in no way inconsistent with the loyal adherence to the Church of England which always marked his life.

* * *

Dr. Cairns rightly emphasises the robust and wholesome Christian influence Johnson exercised upon worldly and often rakish contemporaries. In a dissolute society he was a courageous exponent of Christian morality.

* * *

Boswell in the "Life" gives some particulars he gleaned about the last days of Johnson. He records that Johnson was solicitous about the spiritual state of others and urged them to reflect on the truths of the Gospel. He spoke of "the necessity of faith in the sacrifice of Jesus as necessary beyond all good works whatever, for the salvation of mankind."

Aware of these matters and holding Johnson in high esteem, we were surprised to read in a recent biography of James Boswell (D.B. Wyndham Lewis—"A short life of James Boswell, 2nd ed., 1952—first ed. with title "The Hooded Hawk" 1946) a very curious account of Johnson's death.

Mr. Wyndham Lewis writes of Johnson's dread of death and judgment. He says "Some of his friends gave him what comfort and encouragement they could: nobody seems to have reminded him from the lives of the saints of the joy with which so many of the servants of God welcome their summons from this world. Johnson's friends did their best but no one who loves the Doctor can help deploring the meagreness of the assurances they gave him. A Challoner by his bed-side could have saved him many a bout of misery."

Now here we have just a piece of Roman Catholic pleading forced into a book which is not about Johnson at all, but about his biographer. Johnson's faith and death are irrelevant to Wyndham Lewis's narrative. He quite gratuitously belittles the spiritual ministrations of Johnson's clergyman and friends. He insults the Gospel of Our Lord Jesus Christ if he applies the word "meagre" to the assurances drawn from the Holy Scripture about Christ as our Redemption. For Boswell records that "For some time before his death, all his fears were calmed and absorbed by the prevalence of his faith and his trust in the merits and propitiation of Jesus Christ."

Why turn to the Lives of the Saints when Johnson, like us, had access to the fountain-head? Why overlook the comforts and assurances of Holy Scripture, and the Saviour's words "I go to prepare a place for you; I will come again and receive you unto myself?" That promise was as familiar to Johnson as to anyone, and he died calmly for he believed it.

As to fear of death: it has generally been more a Roman Catholic emotion than a Protestant one. If Dr. Challoner (an English Roman Catholic bishop and editor of the Rheims-Douay Bible) had been present with Dr. Johnson the comforts he could have given must have been "outside the church no salvation!" or else the protracted tortures of Purgatory—to our mind far less comforting than St. Paul's "with Christ, which is far better."

Mr. Wyndham Lewis has used his opportunities in this readable book to further his

Roman Catholic cause by putting in bits of propaganda. It is pathetic to read his observations about Johnson: if only we could hear Johnson's verdict on him! Johnson is once on record as answering Boswell's objection to Roman Catholicism: but Boswell knew his friend well enough to remark that "if one had taken the other side he might have reasoned differently!"

EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

Summary of Calvin's Commentary.

We pass over the practical exhortations of Chapter 5, 19 to end, and Chapter 6, 1 to 9. We come then to the supreme message of discipleship, to the equipment, vocation, and victory of the Christian. St. Paul impresses on the reader that the enemy of the Christian Soul is spiritual. So he cannot be overcome with earthly weapons.

Chapter 6, verse 10:—"Be strong"—Calvin points out that our strength is "in the Lord". "If the Lord aids us by His mighty power we have no reason to shrink from the combat. Paul reminds us to ask from God a supply for our own deficiencies, and promises that, in answer to their prayers, the power of God will be displayed".

"The whole armour"—"The Lord offers us arms for repelling every kind of attack. It remains for us to apply them to us, and not to leave them hanging on the wall".

"Paul describes our enemy as formidable: not to overwhelm us with fear, but to quicken our diligence and earnestness. By speaking of the power of the enemy, Paul labours to keep us more on the alert.

"Against principalities"—the darkness of these means unbelief and ignorance of God with the consequences to which they lead.

By calling it "wickedness" he denotes the cruelty and malignity of the devil. The utmost caution is needed to prevent him from gaining the upper hand.

An argument drawn from this passage by the Manicheans to support their notion of two "principles" is easily rejected. They supposed the devil to be an antagonistic deity whom the righteous God would not subdue without great exertion. For Paul does not ascribe to devils a principality which they seize without the consent, and maintain in spite of, the opposition of the Divine Being,—but a principality which, as Scriptures everywhere asserts, God, in righteous judgment, yields to them over the wicked.

Verse 13:—"If we only put on the whole armour of God and fight valiantly to the end we shall certainly stand."

"There will be no danger which may not be successfully met by the power of God; nor will any who with this assistance, fight against Satan, fail in the day of battle."

The armour and weapons are there described—"the most necessary instruments of warfare—a sword and a shield—are compared to faith and to the word of God. In the spiritual combat these two hold the highest rank. By faith we repel the attacks of the devil, and by the word of God the enemy himself is slain. What shall we say of those who take from a Christian people the word of God?"

* * *

Verse 17:—"The helmet of salvation"—"The head is protected by the best helmet when, elevated by hope, we look up towards heaven to that salvation which is promised."

* * *

Verse 18:—"Praying always for all saints"—"Are we to pray for believers only? The Apostles does not exclude others. Yet in prayer as in all other kind offices, our first care is due to the saints."

Verse 19:—"And for me"—"Does not Paul discover unbelief when he entertains doubt as to his own steadfastness, and implores the intercession of others? No. It is the command of God that believers shall pray for one another. If in addition to all the other manifestations of His kindness, God were pleased to declare that He will listen to the prayers of others on our behalf, would it be proper that this bounty should be slighted?"

"Paul, when he resorted to the intercessions of his brethren, was influenced by no distrust or hesitation. His eagerness to obtain them arose from his resolution that no privilege which the Lord had given him should be overlooked."

Verse 24:—"Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity".—"The meaning is ". . . with a pure conscience." The word signifies "incorruptness". Paul intends to say that when the heart is free from hypocrisy, it will be free from all corruption. Let there be no hypocrisy: for most men while they are not unwilling to make some professions of religion, entertain exceedingly low notions of Christ, and worship Him with pretended homage. I wish there were not so many instances in the present day to prove that Paul's admonition is as necessary as ever—i.e. to love our Lord in sincerity."

EDITOR'S CHAIR

BIBLE AND CHURCH.

One evening recently we walked along O'Connell Street, Dublin (formerly Sackville Street), and at the corner of Middle Abbey Street we found on one side an open-air meeting conducted by the missionaries of the Dublin Y.M.C.A. Evangelistic Scheme, and on the corner opposite a stall of Roman Catholic pamphlets staffed by young people who, no doubt, were prepared to explain how wrong the missionaries were; how wrong it was to listen to them, and how right they themselves were. They were doing no competitive preaching, but over their stall was a banner with an inscription more or less as follows—"If you reject the infallible church how can you have an infallible Bible?"

It is a fair question, and a fair challenge from the standpoint of those who make it. They believe that the Bible is only the Bible because the Roman Catholic Church says so: without the testimony of the church, they have been told, there is no way by which the Old and New Testament writings can be guaranteed to be "the Word of God."

We were glad to see, in the Dublin Evening Mail of the following Saturday that the Rev. T. R. Horan was to preach on this theme on Sunday evening. If any of the people concerned with the bookstall had the courage and candour to go to hear Mr. Horan we are sure that they soon discovered that their naive slogan was not as self-evident as they thought. In short, it is extremely easy to make these tremendous assertions; but it is not so easy to prove them. The simple and uninformed may be impressed by apparently logical argument, but if intelligent questions are asked it soon appears that such claims are illusory.

As we went on our way that evening we said to ourselves "John Warren had an answer to that challenge." We have always found that what the late Rev. John Warren, B.D. wrote is very satisfying. He had learning and could apply it aptly to such problems. It was most unlikely that he would have ignored or neglected such a topic. So we searched our shelves, and ran to earth in "The Evangelical Quarterly" (vol. X, January 1938) an article by him with the business-like title "Our Alleged Debt to Rome for the Bible." We knew then that we had got what we sought and needed.

* * *

Mr. Warren's career in the ministry of the Church of Ireland (he was Rector of parishes in Co. Kerry and later in Co. Waterford) gave him extensive acquaintance with popular Roman Catholicism; while his mature scholarship in the best traditions of Trinity College Dublin in the days of Provost Salmon, justified confidence in his handling such a subject. Two of his books, in particular, ought to be treasured—"Ireland and Her Fairy God-mother" and "The Emotions in the Religious Life." The second of these is a remarkable piece of work, and is unfortunately unobtainable. We may say in passing, that we know nothing quite like it. The subject has been handled by men with well-known names, and able to use the phrases of modern psychology, but there is still much to be profitably read in Mr. Warren's book. This however is a passing tribute to the man's work in general. We must return to the article on Rome and the Bible:

Mr. Warren asks, first, "how is Rome, in keeping with her own axioms, going to prove that she is the true church, or, for that matter, that there is at all such an entity as a church, true or false. From the Scriptures will she say? But it is her axiom that to get the sense and meaning of Scripture we need, and must go to, the true church which is the very thing we are out to find and identify!"

Then he reminds us that "from its own very outset the Christian Church was nurtured upon a Bible—the Old Testament. The O.T. was the Bible constantly appealed to by and quoted by Our Lord. The O.T. books were 'the Holy Scriptures' which, along with the single but significant addition of 'faith in Jesus Christ,' were extolled by St. Paul as being 'able to make wise unto salvation'—2 Tim. 3, 15."

We do not suppose that the Roman Catholic Church claims to have written the Scriptures of the Old Testament, or even to have translated them from the Semitic tongues into the Greek in which the first Christians knew them. Still less can it be claimed that the acceptance of the Old Testament among Christians is due to any decisive step taken by Rome, or to any influence exercised by her. The Churches of the East, in early centuries the greatest and weightiest part of Christendom used the writings of Evangelists and Apostles and Apostolic men without reference to Rome or any dependence on her.

But someone may say that the authority for the Christian use of the Old Testament is its authentication by the New Testament, and that the New Testament owes its compilation and authority to the church. Mr. Warren goes on to consider that.

He says that it is quite true that the Christian Church existed before the New Testament Word took on its written form. "But anterior to both its written form and the church there came the spoken New Covenant Word, communicated through Christ and His Spirit-taught apostles after Him. That Word of God, proclaimed and brought home by the Holy Ghost created the church: the church was simply the body of those that believed in that Word. As to that, the Nicene Creed can testify: which is it: Scripture or Church—that gets first place there, as to order of mention, and as to date of insertion as well?"

"Suppose some savant or reformer were to deliver a course of lectures, and a society sprang into being for the purpose of propagating their teaching, and twenty or thirty years later, published them in book form, could it be properly said that they were the offspring of the society?"

Mr. Warren points out that St. Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians shows that the apostle is vehemently asserting his apostolic status against a strongly hostile opinion throughout the church; "Yet, forsooth the church it was that produced that epistle!"

Next Mr. Warren points out that "Athanasius (A.D. 365) seems to be the first to set forth a list precisely identical with the present agreed N.T. Canon." Of the ancient church we can know little or nothing apart from what has come to us through surviving writings of its scholars, clergy, etc. It may well be claimed that bishops and people all over the church, East and West, believed as Athanasius did, moreover, they no doubt believed it quite independently of the influence of Athanasius. Anyhow, Athanasius was a bishop and theologian of the East (Alexandria), not of the West, or of Rome. So also with Epiphanius, who gave the same sort of list in A.D. 370. Other Easterns followed, publishing lists in agreement with each other. We do not find that they waited dutifully to believe or obey a book until Rome had spoken.

On the other hand, in the West, that is, in the areas in which the bishop of Rome had most influence the list of canonical writings in use omitted the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistles of James and Peter II, and probably, or better, possibly, included a work called "The Shepherd" of one Hermas. Hence it seems clear that when St. Jerome and Bishop Damasus of Rome in A.D. 382 accepted the list of New Testament writings as we now have it, they were correcting the usage of the West by the wiser and more comprehensive usage of the East. Far from this showing leadership on the part of Rome, it shows imitation. A great deal of the development of papal claims had yet to come!

Of course Rome accepts the books we call "Apocrypha" as part of the O.T. canon. The one real Biblical scholar Rome had in early centuries, St. Jerome, took the view the reformed churches take, which is the view the Jewish church always took. Many things in the contents of the Apocryphal books show the wisdom of Jerome in not reckoning them to be canonical.

Of the N.T. Mr. Warren writes "What took place was a more or less imperceptible trend towards unanimous acceptance and inclusion of this book, and unanimous disregard and exclusion of that book, among the general aggregate mass of the church's widely scattered members. Such turned out to be the Divine Spirit's sovereign mode of appointment."

"It was" says Mr. Warren, "the church Catholic—not the Roman church—which, informally and unofficially was Divinely used under a genuine inspiration, to establish the Canon of Holy Scripture." He refers to the witness of St. Augustine—"we have repeated assertions of his to the effect that the tests of canonicity were apostolic origin and acceptance by the bulk of the churches, with no reference whatever to Papal adjudication."

We make the same point by saying that a century, and longer, before a Council of the Church set down any canon of Scripture, the ancient Christian writers had been quoting the books which form our New Testament as authoritative and inspired writings. They had no council under the Pope's direction to instruct them. for in their days there was no Pope (only a not very important patriarch in Italy), and probably no council (if we think of a council as a gathering like Nicaea or Ephesus).

Further, in early centuries there were many Gospels and many Epistles of great interest to Christians, but gradually Four Gospels stood out as inspired, and the rest faded away. Of the other once valued writings only those now forming part of the New Testament established themselves as genuinely inspired. It is plain that what God wanted us to have as Scripture we did recognise and accept through practical experience, and if a council in the fourth century put out a list of canonical books, it was not its decision which gave the books authority. They had established themselves; and the council (whether of Hippo A.D. 393, or of Carthage, A.D. 397, or of Pope Damasus, A.D. 382) only concurred in the decision reached by Christian opinion, under the Spirit's guidance, of course.

We do not for a moment deny that the New Testament grew up to canonicity (i.e. to recognition of its divinely inspired character) within the ancient Catholic Church. We do deny that the Roman Church under its bishop had any deciding voice. It should always be remembered that the great councils of the church which settled the Christian expression of our faith in the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation were all Eastern, and not papally guided — Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon, recall Greek, not Latin Christianity. No oecumenical council of the church ever was held in Rome.

Mr. Warren puts the further point — "If Rome claims to have given us the Bible, what has she done to conserve it, and to foster it?" He replies that Rome did nothing to preserve the oldest extant MSS. of Greek and Hebrew Scripture. The famous Greek Codex now in Rome, and called "the Vatican Codex," did not reach Rome till after A.D. 1475. When, at the Renaissance, Greek and Hebrew texts began to be brought forward they were suspect and disparaged. It is true that a Cardinal (a Spaniard) did prepare a Polyglott Bible — Latin with Hebrew and Greek on either side (1522), but it was not thought improper to liken the sacred Latin thus placed to Christ crucified between two thieves!

With such devotion to the Latin Vulgate (due to St. Jerome in the fourth century) we would expect to find a desire and effort to keep it correct. But so careless were they of God's Word, that the Latin theologians allowed the text to become very corrupt. Only in this century have we seen a serious and sustained effort to settle the original text of Jerome through the Vatican Biblical Commission. Its progress is very very slow.

* * *

If we owe to the Roman Catholic Church the body of inspired Scripture, we ought to find that there is an obvious and "unanimous consent of the Fathers" as to its meaning. This is not so. Dr. Wm. Barry, a learned English Roman Catholic scholar of our day has said "diversities make the unanimous consent of the Fathers in an identical exegesis rare" ("Tradition of Scripture," p. 15).

The supremacy of Holy Scripture is no longer a doctrine of Roman Catholics. At the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century the supremacy was denied by putting the traditions of the church on an equality with the Bible.

Indeed it appears that from this point of view Scripture could be dispensed with. Fr. Hunter, S.J. in his "Outlines of Dogmatic Theology," page 197 (as quoted by Mr. Warren) says "The church could dispense with the Holy Scriptures." The Scottish Roman Catholic Bishop Graham (in his "Where We Got Our Bible: Our Debt to the Catholic Church" says (page 55) "We are independent of it, and would be just as we are, and what we are, though there were no Bible at all." The Protestant reader will say "Alas, too true." This statement of Bishop Graham confirms what we often heard Dr. N. J. D. White, Professor of Divinity in Trinity College, Dublin, and an old pupil of Dr. George Salmon, say, that the Roman Catholic Church had done with the Bible: that it had long extracted from it what it wanted, and could lay it aside.

Yet it is only fair to recognise that there is nowadays a good deal of sound Biblical scholarship in some quarters in the Roman Catholic Church. Perè Lagrange of the Dominican Order, and Mgr. Kissane, President of the Irish Seminary of Maynooth, the distinguished commentator on the Hebrew of the prophet Isaiah, occur to one's mind, as well as the Vulgate translator in England, Mgr. R. A. Knox.

Also, if we owe the Bible to the infallible church, can we say that the church has done much to make it known? We find that authorised translations (apart from the Vulgate) are and have been rare. The late Cardinal Gasquet attempted to claim for his church the English translations which had always been associated with the name of John Wyclif. Miss Deansley (in her "Lollard Bible") easily exploded that claim.

We have before us a leaflet entitled "The Catholic Church—the Mother of the Bible" (by the Rev. J. A. O'Brien, Ph.D., Univ. of Notre Dame, U.S.A.). In a table this leaflet says that there were 17 editions of the Bible printed in German before Luther's translation in 1522. Dr. O'Brien does not tell us, but leaves us to suppose, that these seventeen were approved translations. Mr. Warren refers to them thus: "It is audacious for the modern polemic to claim as official all pre-Lutheran versions of the Bible, of which, according to G. G. Coulton, 21 are known, and not one duly approved by the church!"

Dr. O'Brien in his leaflet sets out the translations — "1522 Luther's translation; 1582 Rheims-Douay (R.C.); 1611 Authorised Protestant (nearly 16 centuries after Christ)."

The impression here created is that there was no authorised Protestant English version of the Bible till 1611, whereas in fact, "The Great Bible" of the time of King Henry VIII was official, and its version of the Psalms is still in the Book of Common Prayer. Its date is 1539. Probably Dr. O'Brien is unaware of this; an American Roman Catholic is not likely to look into such a subject. Yet it is but one instance of how inadvertent misleading can arise. The Rheims-Douay R.C. version was not the pioneer translation of the Bible into English.

Dr. O'Brien also says that there are 626 "Catholic" editions of the Bible printed in all languages. This is a very poor record for the "Universal Church" when we contrast it with the achievement of a single Protestant Bible Society. The British and Foreign Bible Society can surpass that.

We hope that we have shown, with the help of what we have quoted from Mr. Warren's article in "The Evangelical Quarterly," that we do not depend for the Bible on the vouchers of the infallible church. The banner we referred to at the outset must appear in many places as well as the streets of Dublin. Its challenge is deceptive, for there was no concept of the infallible church in the days when by trial and error the Christian community under the Spirit's guidance came to its conclusions about Holy Scripture.

When at its best and purest the church has never wanted to be superior to the Bible: it has always turned to the Bible for its own correction and reform.

A REVIEW.

"Jehovah's Witnesses."

("Jehovah's Witnesses," Royston Pike, London, Watts & Co., 140 pp. 10/6).

The religious sect called by this name is of quite modern formation. It is the creation of Pastor Russell (1852-1916), and has been known by several names—"The Bible Students' Association," "Millennial Dawnism," "Watchtower Bible and Tract Society." Perhaps the adherent of Russellism to-day prefers the grand title "Jehovah's Witnesses," though there are many who do not admit that Russellites have any monopoly of witnessing to Almighty God.

What strikes us in reading Mr. Pike's excellent little book is the self-confidence of the people he describes. They are second to none in their assurance that they are perfectly and completely right. Of course they are not the only sect which holds that it has 1. the whole truth, and 2. that no one else has it, and 3. that everyone else is wrong. In a world replete with religious error one would think that a cautious approach to divine truth is advisable. Not so the Witnesses: they can't be mistaken!

This opinion is, no doubt, an immense asset to their cause. To have all the answers puts one in a strong position in pressing one's claims upon the unwary, the partially educated, the disappointed, and the maladjusted. To promise that a good time is coming (after Armageddon) and that millions now living will experience and enjoy it is likely to be a popular message. To-day some half-million people profess to believe the creed of the "Witnesses."

What is their origin?

They originated in a Bible study circle held in Pittsburgh by C. T. Russell, a commercial traveller, about eighty years ago. (It is not without interest to note how many sects have come to us from America: Christian Science, Mormonism, Seventh Day Adventism, Pentecostalism, and several forms of Spiritism and Theosophy). Russell was of Ulster descent. He had a religious upbringing, but said that as a youth he lost his faith. He regained it (in part) by coming into contact with Adventism. Attracted by the possibilities in the interpretation of Bible prophecy Russell tried his hand (or head) at it, and found that the calculations of Adventism (Miller) had been thirty years out in fixing the date of Our Lord's return. Russell's date was 1874. His conclusion was that Our Lord had actually arrived! But it was a spiritual, not a physical manifestation. As supporters were found, pamphlets, and later books were issued and sold in large quantities. In 1881 Zion's Watch Tower Tract Society was formed. In 1896 the name was changed to "Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society," and this continues to be the controlling organisation of the Witnesses.

Russell's followers became so enthusiastic that the movement was assured of success. Some even regarded him as foretold in the Gospel (Matt. 24, 45 "The faithful and wise servant" cf. also Rev. 3, 14 "The faithful and true witness").

Much uncertainty exists over the extent of the movement in Russell's day, but it grew, and attacks on Russell probably served to intensify interest. In 1914 "the International Bible Students' Association" was formed to spread the message overseas.

Russell was succeeded as leader by J. F. Rutherford, popularly called "Judge" Rutherford. (He was a lawyer, and had in fact served as a Missouri circuit judge for a short time). He was the author of a long series of books—"The Harp of God," "Creation," "Deliverance," etc. He also had to do with a theory that the patriarchs, King David, and other Old Testament worthies would return to dwell on earth, and for their reception a house was erected in California "Beth Sarim," its gardens appropriately planted with date palms.

His books had a vast circulation, due to the salesmanship of the agents who took them from house to house. Rutherford's activities swamped the name and literary labours of Russell, who is well-nigh forgotten. Oddly enough, according to Mr. Pike, the books written by Rutherford are being allowed to drop out of sight.

Under Rutherford (in 1931) the movement assumed the present title it bears. Whether the name will change again is hard to say. Rutherford died in 1942.

The present head is Nathan Knorr, born 1905. Organisation and administration have developed, and the Witnesses in many places suffered persecution for their opinions, especially during the last war. In Great Britain they refused to do military service, not because they are pacifists, but because the only war they are interested in is Jehovah's which will culminate in the battle of Armageddon.

What do they teach?

Mr. Pike gives a fair and factual statement, as far as we can judge. Plenty of Rutherford's books are available in the second-hand book stalls (at least in Dublin) to show us. They teach a most bitter enmity to all sorts of clergymen, accusing them of monstrous things—only the Father of Lies could inspire some of the things said, for while we attribute no perfection, still less superiority to criticism, to any body of clergymen, the charges brought against them by these people are plainly the fruit of envy and malice. They teach that the great angel Lucifer decided to wrest from Jehovah the kingship over man when man was created. Hence the fall, and hence Lucifer becomes Satan. They say another great angel. Our Lord Jesus Christ (who is Michael) re-deemed those who were the victims of Satan. He is not, however, God the Son, for the Witnesses are very strongly Anti-Trinitarian, and call the doctrine of the Holy Trinity "God-dishonouring."

They claim that the only way God's Kingdom can be realised on earth to take the place of all present governments is by their destruction in the battle of Armageddon.

They teach that the "Little Flock" is the 144,000 elect who are to be associated with Christ in ruling God's Kingdom (cf. Book of Revelation, the "Sealed"). They are not to live again on earth as human beings in the millennial age, but are to be members of the "Body of Christ." They are being resurrected now, and the number is being completed.

Some Witnesses now alive on earth believe they are of the 144,000. As such they alone partake of the Bread and Wine at the Memorial (the Witnesses' name for their observance of the Lord's Supper). To the non-Witness this is a confused topic, but no doubt among themselves the Witnesses believe that they understand it.

There is a great deal more than this of course, and Mr. Pike seems to have done his best to be objective and fair. He refers to the treatment of Scripture, and to the pretentious translation of "the Greek Christian Scriptures" with its foolish attempts to alter the meaning of certain passages. We are not told what Mr. Pike himself believes, or whether he is to be considered a Christian in faith, but we think his book will enlighten readers, and also prepare them should they be accosted by any of the persevering young disciples of Pastor Russell and his successors. It will be regretted that these good young people do not put their faith and energy into a true form of evangelical Christianity.

These institutions have separated two passions from all the rest: they have existed to fight the lust of the flesh and poverty, while the sins of the mind and the spirit grew. God created man and woman in His own image—but the monk and the nun have violated their instincts which are God given. As surely as monks and nuns have fled from the world and the devil, they have carried their instincts into their loneliness—and so often those instincts have taken a fearful revenge upon them as the history of the double standard of piety in monastic institutions proves.—“The Christian”, 7/5/54.

U.S. Conversions to Protestantism—4 Million Claimed in Ten Years.

From “The Times”, 27th March, 1954.

From our own correspondent

New York, March 26.

The Protestant magazine “Christian Herald”, in its April issue, makes the sweeping assertion that more than four million Roman Catholics in the United States were converted to Protestantism in the past 10 years. Its conclusion was based, it states, on replies to a question paper sent to 25,000 of the 181,000 Protestant ministers in this country.

A projection of the figures supplied by the ministers produced “the startling nation-wide figure of 4,144,366 Roman Catholic-to-Protestant converts”. The magazine added: “With allowance for error, the total national figure could not be less than three million . . . and in all probability runs closer to five million.” It says also that the Roman Catholic Church had reported that 1,071,897 Protestants were converted to Catholicism in the same period.

The editor of the “Christian Herald”, Dr. Daniel A. Poling, who is head of World Christian Endeavour, an interdenominational Protestant youth organisation, said that the survey was undertaken because wide publicity about Catholic conversions of Protestants had led many persons to believe that inter-faith conversion was a one-way matter.

The reason for conversions to Protestantism advanced in the magazine article were “intellectual differences with Roman Catholic dogma . . . the need for greater freedom of personal belief and interpretation and the desire in mixed faith marriages of one spouse to change to the religion of the other.” With reference to the last-mentioned reason, the magazine said: “Contrary to widespread public opinion, the report revealed that it is the Catholic rather than the Protestant who adopts the faith of his mate and is converted to Protestantism.”—Quoted in “The Churchman’s Magazine”, London, May, 1954.

Irish Presbyterian General Assembly on Colombia, and on the Martin Luther Film—Efforts to meet Roman Catholic Primate and Nuncio described.

The immediate past-Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, the Very Rev. Principal J. E. Davey, told the General Assembly, in Belfast that the Papal Nuncio in Dublin, the Most Rev. Dr. O’Hara, and the Primate of All Ireland and Archbishop of Armagh, Cardinal D’Alton, would not consent to meet representatives of the Assembly to discuss the persecution of Protestants in Colombia, South America.

The Assembly decided to make representations to the British Foreign Office and to the Colombian Ambassador in London about the persecution. The former Moderator said that Cardinal D’Alton was “a kindly, literary man and a humanist, and a most unlikely man to wish to persecute anyone.”

Principal Davey went on to say: “But, unfortunately, the policy of the Church is not dictated by humanists, but by the Vatican.”

Cardinal D’Alton was asked, added Principal Davey, for dates on which representatives of the Assembly could meet him, but the Cardinal offered no suggestions in his reply. The Assembly then sent the Cardinal a copy of the latest reports available on persecution in Colombia.

When the Assembly wrote to the Papal Nuncio in Dublin, Principal Davey continued, the Nuncio might well have refused to reply as the Assembly did not represent any Government. The Nuncio did reply, however, and questioned the allegations of persecution in Colombia, but did not offer to meet representatives of the Assembly. “We sent him a copy of the latest report on persecution—an even later one than we sent to the Cardinal,” the past-Moderator observed. “The Nuncio in reply, said that the report would be sent to the proper quarters, which probably means Rome: There was still no meeting."

In England, the authorities of the Roman Church did meet Protestant Church leaders, Principal Davey remarked.

The Persecution.

The Rev. S. J. Knox, of Abbey Church, Dublin, gave details to the Assembly of the persecution of Protestants in Colombia. In one case, he said, a church was dynamited. In another, a group of 60 worshippers were attacked by a mob led by a priest.

A Protestant school was closed, and the Roman Catholic Church ordered that Protestant schools should not be permitted to operate in mission areas. The Protestants in Colombia had asked that their case be brought before the United Nations.

The report of the Continental Mission, which gave details of intolerance in Spain was presented by the Rev. Ray Davey. It was "received" by the Assembly.

The report included the following passage about conditions in Spain:

"No external sign can mark a Protestant sanctuary; no publicity can be given to the services; no literature can be published by the congregation. Protestants cannot propagate their faith, nor can they have schools for their children and, what is worse, they cannot, in many regions of Spain, have any religious service for the burial of their dead. In certain districts only the closest members of the family are allowed to attend the last rites for a deceased loved one.

"But still more terrible—because it affects the living and not the dead—only in rare instances can people be legally married if one of the two should happen to have been baptised a Roman Catholic. In Madrid, there are at present only two judges who have the courage to perform civil marriage services for any man or woman who has left the Catholic faith."

In Public Schools.

The quotation from the report went on:

"In the public schools there is discrimination against Protestant children. It is impossible for a Protestant to become an officer in the Spanish army. A Protestant cannot become a lawyer, because in all the educational institutions of the nation Roman Catholic dogma is taught and every student must give nominal assent, at least, to the Roman Catholic Faith. In a word, the attempt is being made to stifle the Protestant movement. In spite of all they have endured the numbers of the Protestants are increasing and the influence of the Church grows. The rank and file of the Spanish people admire the Protestants. In their eyes they are the only people in the national community who have been able to maintain their unity and integrity under a régime which is the most hated in Spanish history."

Assembly told of Attempts to Stop Showing of Film.

Later the past-Moderator said that inter-denominational efforts may soon be made in Northern Ireland to secure a general release in the United Kingdom of the Protestant film, "Martin Luther." Attempts were being made to prevent the showing of this film in Britain and in Northern Ireland, although it had enjoyed enormous success in America.

Principal Davey said: "This film had actually greater attendances in America than the Coronation film, and it is natural that we should expect to see it here.

"It looks as if the Roman Catholic Church decided that they would ignore the film at first, but the success was so great that they apparently got frightened, and had an amazing success with people in Britain claiming to be Protestants in getting the film not shown here.

"They say they would not make enough money on it; but I suggest that, in view of the American success of the film, that could not be so. They also say it might cause disturbance. I do not think it likely."

Principal Davey continued: "We have never agitated against Roman Catholic films and there have been a great many and a great many good ones."

He mentioned particularly, "Going My Way," "Boys' Town," "Fighting Father Dunne," "The Song of Bernadette," "The Keys of the Kingdom" and "The Miracle of Fatima."

He then told the Assembly: "We have been tolerant. I think we have every right to expect that Protestant films will also be admitted, especially a great film like this one, which apparently has been a great eye-opener to Roman Catholics in the United States."

Of the two leading men in control of the British film industry one had definitely turned the film down and the other had not decided, principal Davey concluded.—"Irish Times," 9/6/54.

PASSING EVENTS.

Marriage and Emigration in Eire — Commission Report.

The Commission comments: "There is something gravely wrong with a community where there is such widespread frustration of natural expectation, and in our considered view the low marriage rate is one of the country's two great population problems, the second being emigration, the primary cause of the fall in the rural population."

Development of land and industry was the remedy for Eire's problems, the Commission considered.

The country, the report says, has an exceedingly high percentage of young unmarried people and people who never marry.

They are 56 per cent. of males over 14 years unmarried. The average marriage age for men is 33 years, for women 28 years. The average age of farmers at marriage is 37 years, and of their wives 30.

Labourers, with low wages, marry much younger than any other section, which, comments the report, shows that social custom in those groups was more important than income.

The Commission rejected what it referred to as a fairly widespread belief that the poor marriage background was partly attributable to the fact that, since the great majority of the population are Roman Catholic, marriage to them was an indissoluble contract and family limitation by contraception was against the moral law.

The report points out that marriage rates in other Roman Catholic countries are markedly higher than in Eire.

It says that in Northern Ireland, where only one-third of the population is Roman Catholic, the marriage rate was also exceptionally low.

The Commission was told that the discouragement of social mingling among young people, because of the moral risks said to be involved, might lead to fewer marriages.

Understandable.

The report comments that while economic circumstances in rural areas remained unfavourable to marriage, it was understandable that parents should discourage young people from mixing freely.

It was found that the late and low marriage rate over such a long period had an unfavourable effect on the outlook of young people, and had contributed to discontent, unsettlement and emigration.

People left the country for better prospects, as well as for the prospect of marriage, says the report.

The report comments that while emigration was not confined to any particular place, it tended to be somewhat greater from counties where the rural population was high and where small holdings were predominant. Social amenities were an important factor, although the fundamental causes of emigration were economic.

Dull and Drab.

High standards of organised entertainment, with a wide range of recreational facilities, had developed in modern urban life, and by contrast, particularly to the young mind, rural areas appeared dull, drab, monotonous, backward and lonely.

Tradition and example had also been powerful influences. Emigration by some members of the family had become almost part of the established custom of the people in certain areas.

For many emigrants there was a traditional path from the "known to the known"—from areas where they lived to places where their friends and relations awaited them.

The report adds: "Recent emigration to Great Britain is building up centres of attraction in that country, and because of the facility of movement between the two countries, there is a danger that these may become magnets as powerful as the Irish centres in the United States in the 19th and early 20th centuries."

The Report adds: "It is hardly surprising, however, that a proportion should tend to give up the practice of their religion and to fail in the matter of sexual morality. It is impossible for us to estimate what this proportion is. We consider that there is a good deal of exaggerated comment on the point."

The Commission suggests that not all emigration is bad. Much of it is involuntary and some unnecessary. When it reaches high figures it is a matter of public concern.

Emigration must be referred primarily to economic causes, and the remedy must be sought mainly in the economic field. Its volume could be reduced through economic and social programmes with that end in view.—"Belfast Weekly Telegraph", 16/7/'54.

Evangelicals in Brazil.

The tragic death of Dr. Vargas, President of Brazil, is sad evidence of the political and economic unsettlement of the country. For 25 years he had been the outstanding statesman of Brazil, but his constructive leadership created many enemies. "I have struggled month after month", he wrote, "resisting constant and increasing aggression, enduring in silence, forgetting, and resigning myself to defend the people who are now left helpless. I have struggled against exploitation in Brazil, against exploitation of the people." Under Dr. Vargas, Brazil had moved far toward religious freedom and tolerance. The Baptists have made notable progress in Brazil during the last 50 years and the Baptist Missionary Society has lately planned for the expansion of work there. It is sorrowful news that attacks by Roman Catholics were made against the Amazonas Baptists while holding their Convention in July—Baptist and other Evangelical churches were plundered and dynamited. But such persecution, we are assured, is not due to any change in Government policy. An expert writes: "If there had been any changeover in the Government's attitude toward Evangelicals as a result of the disturbances culminating in the suicide of the President, the Evangelical Union of South America would have heard of it. It is fairly safe to assume that these are purely local disturbances, the sort of thing that might happen at any time through the bigotry of local Romish priests. As a whole, Evangelical Christians are esteemed and respected by the population, and the Brazilian Government has been very tolerant to Protestant and Evangelical work."—"The Christian", 3/9/'54.

Bias Found in History Books—Survey Made For Church Leaders.

A research group investigating the fairness of history text books used in schools reports to-day that every sectional interest, every set of beliefs and every nation will find something to regret. But the standard is generally good.

The inquiry was carried out for the Council of Christians and Jews. The report was written by Mr. E. H. Dance, senior history master at Wolverhampton Grammar School.

Joint presidents of the Council are the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Fisher; the Archbishop of Westminster, Cardinal Griffin; the Moderator of the Church of Scotland, the Rev. Professor Pitt-Watson; the Moderator of the Free Church Federal Council, Dr Martin, and the Chief Rabbi, the Very Rev. Israel Brodie.

53 Examiners.

A total of 100 text books for 11 to 15-year-olds were examined by 53 critics, most of them teachers. They found bias most common in writing on religion. Roman Catholics and Jews felt they had not "their due share of the national tolerance, or at any rate of the national sympathy".

Most Roman Catholic criticisms were of explanations of the Reformation and the Roman Catholic Church's attitude to the Bible. Some Protestant critics said there was a complementary bias in favour of the Roman Catholic Church in other books.

The chief complaint about writing on Jewish contributions to history is that they are usually ignored. One Jewish teacher said: "It always looks as though the Jews had done their duty to history after they had presented Jesus Christ."

Text books emphasised the importance of Greek and Roman poetry, though few people read these classics and most Christians sang Hebrew psalms. Plato and Aristotle received more credit than all the Hebrew prophets put together.

No Clear-cut Answer.

Mr. Dance says no categorical decision can be made whether text books give fair and adequate treatment to different groups. But among his general conclusions are:

History text-books have to be short, selection is made quite ruthlessly and inevitably there is inadequate treatment of many groups.

Some books concentrate too much on political and military aspects, ignoring the social;

The "tyranny" of public examinations has led to "cram" books which do scant justice to groups about which no questions are expected;

There is still a tendency to write history from a predominantly British point of view;

Differences about treatment of religion point the necessity for an inquiry into religious text books.

Mr. Dance concludes that there is need for wide cultural background among writers and teachers.

Bingo Games Cease—Orders to Priests.

Bingo (Housey-Housey) games have ceased in New York since the reduction in rank and retirement from the police force last week of Deputy Chief Inspector Goldberg. As reported in The Daily Telegraph, he angered his superiors by trying to enforce the anti-gambling law.

Since he was disciplined, the law is being observed. Officials of the Roman Catholic archdioceses of New York and Brooklyn have declined to comment on the fact that fund-raising games formerly held in Roman Catholic churches have suddenly stopped.

It is believed that orders were given to all parish priests to organise no more of these games, which were an important source of income for some charities. In one borough, Queens, a police officer, said: "Bingo is dead in Queens. There will be no more until the law is changed."

U.S.A. Lutherans.

The United Lutheran Church in America in its survey of its congregations, discloses that its church has gained four times as many Roman Catholics as members of its congregations in the United States and Canada, as it has lost to Roman Catholic churches through perversions.

Gains and losses in 3,726 congregations of the United Lutheran Church during 1952, showed that 1,017 pastors said that they received into membership one or more Roman Catholics for a total of 2,902. One or more members were lost to the Roman Catholic Church by 458 congregations, or about 2 losses per 100. 3,268 congregations reported that they had no losses. Lutheran pastors had solemnised 2,195 marriages, in which 850 brides or 1,345 bridegrooms were Roman Catholics. Roman Catholic priests performed 1,322 marriages involving 859 brides and 463 bridegrooms in the same 3,396 U.L.C.A. congregations.

The Christian Herald claims that a total of 4,144,366 Roman Catholics have become members of Protestant Churches in the United States during the last ten years.

More Protestants than Roman Catholics oppose "mixed marriages", and the Jews favour them least of all, declares a survey made for the Catholic Digest, which was published in St. Paul, Minnesota.

Eighty per cent. of Jews opposed such marriages, though 19 per cent. were not against them; 76 per cent. of Protestants were against them, while 21 per cent. felt "that it made no difference"; 73 per cent. of Roman Catholics opposed, while 25 per cent. did not mind.—"The Protestant Woman", Sept. 1954.

800,000 Protestants in France.

In a recently published and authoritative book on "The French Protestant", the author, Emile G. Leonard, states that about 800,000 of France's 42,700,000 people are now Protestants, but adds that about 60 per cent. of these 800,000 are seasonal churchgoers who "attend Christmas, Easter, wedding, baptismal and funeral services but almost never have recourse to their church at other times". (The same claim is often made of the Roman Catholic population in France.) Although Protestants represent only a small percentage of the population, Mr. Leonard states, "they are a strong spiritual and moral force in France to-day". The two largest Protestant churches in France are the Reformed Church of France with 350,000 members and the Lutheran Church of Alsace Lorraine (Augsburgh Confession) with 240,411.—"Protestant World", Sydney, June, '54.

Scottish Reformation Society—(From Annual Report—the 103rd).

The Autumn Conference, held in Glasgow last September, was not a whit behind any of its predecessors, either in the numbers attending, or in the quality of the speaking. In fact, there was an increase in the number present, and the speaking was of a high order. The guest speaker was the Rev. F. Rupert Gibson, B.A., of The Irish Mission of The Presbyterian Church in Ireland, whose theme was "Signs of the Reformation in Ireland To-day". In the course of his address Mr. Gibson spoke of the success attending the work of the agents of The Irish Mission. Bibles and Testaments were being sold in thousands, no fewer than half a million copies of the Scriptures having been sold to Roman Catholics during the past ten years. He stressed the importance of getting Roman Catholics to read the New Testament without notes or comments, for experience had shown that the reading of the Scriptures had created a longing for the knowledge of the true faith, and had been more useful than any other method in leading to a definite decision for Jesus Christ. He was hopeful of another Reformation in Ireland, but whether it would come through the witness of members from the Church of Rome, as happened in Czecho-Slovakia at the close of the Second World War, no one could say. The President of the Society, the Rev. Wm. J. Baxter, M.A., D.D., followed with a brief address in which he said that the way to win Roman Catholics was not by condemnation or persecution, but by doing to them what we would have them do to us.

The Piltown Hoax.

Our Lord when on earth acknowledged Satan's efforts to mislead men. To-day his wiles are plain for all Christians to see. Romanism, Christian Science, Jehovah's Witnesses, Evolution, Spiritualism, Modern Theology are all cunningly devised Satanic schemes evolved to deceive, if possible, the very elect. The Geographical Society has now decided that "Not a single piece of all the 'prehistoric' remains found in the gravel-pit at Piltdown, Sussex, by the late Charles Dawson, solicitor and clerk to the Uckfield Bench, was genuine". Yet one remembers how elated the Evolutionists were when the "discovery" was made. But still the Bible lovers clung "old-fashionedly" to God's Truth and will continue to do so in spite of all the "brainy" arguments of those who want to believe that man has "evolved" and was not made in the image and likeness of God. Now one learns that the "Abominable Snowman" has not been traced in spite of the costly expedition to the Himalayas. It is not known who planned the clever hoax at Piltdown but it is good to know that at long last it is proved to have been a trick. Is it not time that those people who are hoaxed by Judge Rutherford, Mrs. Eddy, the many Popes and others who trade on the credulity of unthinking people dusted their Bibles and searched the Scriptures for themselves? Truly, our Lord said: "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures".—"The Churchman's Magazine", Aug. 1954.

The Roman Church Attacks Protestant Leaders.

In the book "Christian Denominations", by Rev. Vigilius H. Krull, containing the Imprimatur of Bishop Hermannus Josephus, Protestants can find the official Catholic attitude regarding their respective denominations. Let us turn to the Presbyterian Church, of which the President and his wife are members. According to the author, John Knox, disciple of John Calvin who founded the denomination, was:

"a degraded apostate priest . . . who agitated with might and main against the Catholic Church . . . In his fury against the Church, he roused the people by inflammatory harangues to a pitch of frenzy, encouraged them to enter the churches by violence, to break the images of the saints and even those of our Lord, to sack the churches and set on fire the monasteries."

Calvin fares little better. He is chiefly accused of rank blasphemy for allegedly making God the author of the sin of Adam because of his promulgation of the doctrine of predestination.

The Episcopal Church is accorded no charity. It assertedly started "with the complicated love-story of an indecent, lustful, ruthless, and brutal king . . . An immoral king caused the secession of England from the true Church . . . All Anglicans who sincerely wish a reunion of the Episcopal with the Catholic Church, must return unconditionally to the Church, from which their good ancestors were forced to separate themselves by a brutal king and then again by a wicked queen, 'the notorious Queen Elizabeth', and an unscrupulous Parliament."

The Lutheran Church evokes the greatest outburst of calumny and is allotted the most space as well as invective. Luther, "an apostate, a sinful, insubordinate, excommunicated man, the Father of Protestantism", left the wake of his . . . so called reformation . . . rebellion, bloodshed and licentiousness. No true historian can ever cheat himself into the conviction that Protestantism brought peace and happiness."

On the contrary, "by his incentive talk and venomous pen" he "destroyed peace and harmony throughout the Fatherland". "Where formerly people had lived peacefully together, there rebellion and hatred entered, and despotism ruled with an iron hand. This universal cause of discord, devastation and despicable barbarism was the result of revolt against the Church."

That this attitude towards Protestantism in general and Lutheranism in particular, still obtains is indicated by an article on the recent, widely publicised film "Martin Luther". The November, 1953, issue of "The Sign", national

A MESSAGE FROM THE SECOND ASSEMBLY OF THE WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

To all our fellow-Christians, and to our fellow-men everywhere, we send greetings in the Name of Jesus Christ. We affirm our faith in Jesus Christ as the hope of the world, and desire to share that faith with all men. May God forgive us that by our sins we have often hidden this hope from the world.

In the ferment of our time there are both hopes and fears. It is indeed good to hope for freedom, justice, and peace, and it is God's will that we should have these things. But He has made us for a higher end. He has made us for Himself, that we might know and love Him, worship and serve Him. Nothing other than God can ever satisfy the heart of man. Forgetting this, man becomes his own enemy. He seeks justice but creates oppression. He wants peace, but drifts towards war. His very mastery of nature threatens him with ruin. Whether he acknowledges it or not, he stands under the judgment of God and in the shadow of death.

Here where we stand, Jesus Christ stood with us. He came to us, true God and true Man, to seek and to save. Though we were the enemies of God, Christ died for us. We crucified Him, but God raised Him from the dead. He is risen. He has overcome the powers of sin and death. A new life has begun. And in His risen and ascended power, He has sent forth into the world a new community, bound together by His Spirit, sharing His divine life, and commissioned to make Him known throughout the world. He will come again as Judge and King to bring all things to their consummation. Then we shall see Him as He is and know as we are known. Together with the whole creation we wait for this with eager hope, knowing that God is faithful and that even now He holds all things in His hand.

This is the hope of God's people in every age, and we commend it afresh to-day to all who will listen. To accept it is to turn from our ways to God's way. It is to live as forgiven sinners, as children growing in His love. It is to have our citizenship in that Kingdom which all man's sin is impotent to destroy, that realm of love and joy and peace which lies about all men, though unseen. It is to enter with Christ into the suffering and despair of men, sharing with them the great secret of that Kingdom which they do not expect. It is to know that whatever men may do, Jesus reigns and shall reign.

With this assurance we can face the powers of evil and the threat of death with a good courage. Delivered from fear we are made free to love. For beyond the judgment of men and the judgment of history lies the judgment of the King who died for all men, and who will judge us at the last according to what we have done to the least of His brethren. Thus our Christian hope directs us towards our neighbour. It constrains us to pray daily "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven", and to act as we pray in every area of life. It begets a life of believing prayer and expectant action, looking to Jesus and pressing forward to the day of His return in glory.

Now we would speak through our member churches directly to each congregation. Six years ago our churches entered into a covenant to form this Council, and affirmed their intention to stay together. We thank God for His blessing on our work and fellowship during these six years. We enter now upon a second stage. To stay together is not enough. We must go forward. As we learn more of our unity in Christ, it becomes the more intolerable that we should be divided. We therefore ask you: Is your church seriously considering its relation to other churches in the light of our Lord's prayer that we may be sanctified in the truth and that we may all be one? Is your congregation, in fellowship with sister congregations around you, doing all it can do to ensure that your neighbours shall hear the voice of the one shepherd calling all men into the one flock?

The forces that separate men from one another are strong. At our meeting here we have missed the presence of Chinese Churches which were with us at Amsterdam. There are other lands and churches unrepresented in our Council, and we long ardently for their fellowship. But we are thankful that, separated as we are by the deepest political divisions of our time, here at Evanston we are united in Christ. And we rejoice also that, in the bond of prayer and a common hope, we maintain communion with our Christian brethren everywhere.

It is from within this communion that we have to speak about the fear and distrust which at present divide our world. Only at the Cross of Christ, where men know themselves as forgiven sinners, can they be made one. It is there that Christians must pray daily for their enemies. It is there that we must seek deliverance from self-righteousness, impatience, and fear. And those who know that Christ is risen should have the courage to expect new power to break through every human barrier.

It is not enough that Christians should seek peace for themselves. They must seek justice for others. Great masses of people in many parts of the world are hungry for bread, and are compelled to live in conditions which mock their human worth. Does your church speak and act against such injustice? Millions of men and women are suffering segregation and discrimination on the ground of race. Is your church willing to declare, as this Assembly has declared, that this is contrary to the will of God, and to act on that declaration? Do you pray regularly for those who suffer unjust discrimination on grounds of race, religion, or political conviction?

The Church of Christ is to-day a world-wide fellowship, yet there are countless people to whom He is unknown. How much do you care about this? Does your congregation live for itself, or for the world around it and beyond it? Does its common life, and does the daily work of its members in the world, affirm the Lordship of Christ or deny it?

God does not leave any of us to stand alone. In every place He has gathered us together to be His family, in which His gifts and His forgiveness are received. Do you forgive one another as Christ forgave you? Is your congregation a true family of God, where every man can find a home and know that God loves him without limit?

We are not sufficient for these things. But Christ is sufficient. We do not know what is coming to us. But we know who is coming. It is He who meets us every day and who will meet us at the end—Jesus Christ our Lord.

Therefore we say to you: Rejoice in Hope.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

A CHANGE FOR THE BETTER.

Since the beginning of this century we have had, on the one hand, a decline in Protestant interest in the Reformation, and, on the other hand, a more vigorous repudiation of the idea of a Reformation by Roman Catholics. Many causes can be indicated to explain both attitudes. Among them we may point to the change in outlook in the last half of the nineteenth century. Thoughtful and educated Protestants were turning to the new sciences, and to the new discoveries, and intellectual energies were no longer being confined to the older channels. The Darwinian theory of evolution tended to reduce the interest in the spiritual nature of man, while the novelties of Biblical criticism weakened the faith in revealed religion.

There was also a new conception of history. The new school writers tended to view the conflicts of the past coolly and rationally. They claimed to have a scientific approach to history, and in order to get away from the old explanation of the Reformation on religious grounds, they would even suggest that it could best be explained by economic causes. Much importance for example, was attached to the effect on Europe of abundant imports of silver from Peru! The new wealth altered the old stable level of prices, and caused unrest among the production classes, and this unrest was made articulate in the sphere of religion. So some said, and this attitude grew until one was almost afraid to hint at a spiritual cause of the Reformation.

Of course it was all reaction: the swing of the pendulum. From generations which learnt their Reformation history from Foxe's "Book of Martyrs" we passed to a generation which thought that the martyrs of Smithfield and elsewhere were an awkward lot who need not have taken things so much to heart. It was realised also that a good deal of human weakness and sinfulness: of self-interest and greed, lay behind the legislation of the sixteenth century. Yet it should be proclaimed everywhere that if certain great families of these islands had the foundation of their fortunes laid in the loot they secured from the disbanded monasteries and plundered churches, no one can accuse Latimer and Ridley and Cranmer and Bale, and the numerous others such as Tyndale and Coverdale in England, or Luther, or Calvin, or Knox, of enriching themselves or founding wealthy families. These men, and their fellows in the various lands of Northern Europe, and not the greedy nobles (who were the successors of generations of feudal robbers in mediæval Europe, from whom they differed only in this, that they did not die fortified by the rites of Holy Church), were the true reformers, and the true agents of spiritual and moral progress. If their professed followers did not always emulate their earnestness and devotion the fault was not the reformers, but was due to the frailties of our nature.

We must point out also the influence of the Oxford movement (as far as the Church of England is concerned) in weakening the interest in the Reformation. From the time when Hurrell Froude declared that he hated the Reformers the whole course of his friends was set to disparage the Reformation, and to get the Church of England as far away from it as possible. This resulted in a great deal of distorted history. It was alleged that the reformation of the Church of England was so slight as to be nearly imperceptible, apart from the temporal effects of sixteenth century legislation. People were encouraged to glamourise the Middle Ages, to have nostalgic dreams about monasticism, to add plausibility to their fancies by seeing them in "a dim religious light". In short they tended to imagine that the only thing that distinguished them from Rome was that they had dispensed with the Pope.

We could dwell upon the many vast advantages of the Reformation—the Word of God open to all by means of faithful vernacular translations: in England, for example, Tyndale's and Coverdale's work; the "Great" Bible of Henry VIII; the Bishop's Bible; the Geneva Bible; the "Authorised Version"; the restoration of the Lord's Supper, Eucharist, Holy Communion,—Call it what you will—to its proper use and character; the Cup no longer kept from the Communicant; the realisation that the Sacrament is not a propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead, but a communion Feast and Fellowship with the Ascended Lord and a memorial of His meritorious death for us; the abandonment of the profitable but unscriptural Purgatory; the acquisition of a plain dignified Biblical Liturgy; the honest right of the clergy to marry and rear families in the fear and nurture of the Lord; the foundation of the rights of conscience at least laid even if the full recognition thereof was delayed; the truth that we are justified by faith creating a higher obedience and spirituality. Much might be added to these: yet, even though men failed to make the best of them, they mark a great ethical and spiritual advance. The deliberate belittling of the Reformation by certain of its children in some quarters in the last hundred years cannot destroy the worth of the achievements we point out.

We detect, indeed, a somewhat reluctant change of outlook on these matters. It appears that to-day in the circles in which they were once belittled, or soft-pedalled, or overlooked, they are being accepted as important: if not all of them as yet, still the promise is there. For instance, in some sections of "Anglo-Catholic" practice the ideal was to see that the "priest" said "Mass", even if he had few or no parishioners present. He performed his ceremony and that was the thing that mattered. But to-day a new and healthier concept of the Sacrament is spreading—the ideal of "the Parish Communion" when as many as possible of the parishioners gather for the service and partake, and "the priest" is now truly a priest, for he is one with his people and fellow-communicants, showing that the sacrament is to be partaken and shared, and not to be gazed upon. While we may still find matters to dissent from we see here a return to Reformation ideals and precepts, both of Cranmer and Calvin.

We have shown then that the Reformation is nowadays beginning to be seen in a fairer light, and the indifference to its history and heroes is giving way to a growing interest. We may refer to the work on Reformation history of Mr. Gordon Rupp, who is a learned member we believe of the Methodist Connexion in England.

But there is still another factor in this, and it is, as we said at the outset, the vigorous denunciation of the Reformation by Roman Catholic writers. They quarrel with the word "Reformation". They propose that it should be called "Deformation" (a cheap point of view, and not worth much: it was used long since by the Tractarian Dr. J. M. Neale). With such boisterous propagandists as G. K. Chesterton and H. Belloc, and with their imitators an impression on the public mind could not fail to be made. We recall lecturing many years ago in a South Dublin parish on "The Reformation", and saying something in favour of Archbishop Cranmer. One of the audience came up afterwards and expressed surprise. On enquiry we found our critic had just read Belloc's "Life of Cranmer", and seemingly swallowed Belloc's point of view. It cannot be too much emphasised that when we read a Roman Catholic work on history we should reserve judgment on any conclusions involving religion until we have read a Protestant work on the same subject. Dr. Pollard on Cranmer is preferable to Belloc.

Further, an ill-informed public is not capable of recognising a piece of propaganda and there are people who have some confused notion that history is unfair to Roman Catholicism. This illusion is properly fostered by some popular writers, though we can see no injury to Roman Catholicism in admitting what the best Roman Catholics of the late Middle Ages and of the sixteenth century acknowledged: that the church needed reform in head and members, and that before Luther began, cardinals (some of them) in Rome pleaded for a reform of abuses. Cardinal Manning did not hesitate to declare that the Council of Trent was a great reforming Council. Did he not therefore agree that reform was needed? We know that if the call for reformation had been fairly met at the proper time great good would have resulted, and many regrettable things might have been avoided.

The volume called "Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent" (translated in one version by Buckley, and in another by Waterworth) bears ample testimony to the state of the Church in the sixteenth century, for a substantial part of every session of the Council was devoted to passing "Decrees on Reformation", i.e. correcting abuses.

Of course the Council did not improve matters doctrinally. It defined dogmas too readily and rigidly; it stereotyped error in many cases; and it committed the sad blunder of declaring that tradition is equal to Holy Scripture as a source of truth. As a result we have had subsequent additions to the faith of Trent (which far outstripped the ancient Catholic Creeds), such as the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception, the Infallibility of the Pope, the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin. No doubt more will follow.

At least, if there was not doctrinal reform (some bishops favoured it) there was a reform of morals and law and discipline. That fact may always be quoted in favour of the Reformers who were forced by an obstinate and unenlightened majority to carry their message outside the traditional unity of Western Christendom.

We have been led to these observations by re-reading an article published some years ago in "The Irish Monthly", a Jesuit magazine. The author is the late Mr. Aodh de Blacam. The title of the article is "Why the Reformation"? Mr. de Blacam was a well-known and capable Dublin journalist, but he had too much confidence in Roman Catholic writers on history such as Hilaire Belloc. Mr. de Blacam says for example "The more closely we study the history of the sixteenth century, the more clearly we realise that there existed no excuse for revolutionary change." It seems to us that no historian would write thus, but a propagandist would.—"No excuse"—Erasmus would not have agreed, or the many other enlightened but more courageous men. But it may be said "no excuse for revolutionary change", and that no sixteenth century circumstance could possibly have justified that sort of change. What does "revolutionary" signify? Any change in the usual routine or procedure. The Bible in the vernacular was a revolutionary change, and Rome sanctioned some sixteenth century versions (e.g. the Rheims-Douay). Church Services in the vernacular were revolutionary things (and after four hundred years Rome is now slowly coming round to the Protestant point of view in this matter. The process is very gradual, but highly significant). The restoration of the Cup at Communion to the laity after a comparatively short period of withdrawal needed no excuse. The withholding of it had been the revolutionary change, not the return to obedience to Our Lord's command. We could add instance after instance to show how utterly wrong it was for Mr. de Blacam to affirm that there was "no excuse". Surely some excuse was needed for Latimer and Ridley to go to the stake for their beliefs. Had there been nothing at all in what they stood for their steadfastness would be difficult to explain.

* * *

Was there "no excuse" for holding the Roman Council of Trent? Were its reforms (in their own way revolutionary enough) unnecessary? Was its interference with old abuses unwarrantable? Mr. de Blacam cites St. Ignatius of Loyola and his followers in the newly founded Order of Jesuits as proof of the spiritual vitality of the Church in the sixteenth century—that may be so, but the Jesuit Order was created by the very fact of the Reformation, and other Orders founded in that age were designed to correct the faults of the time.

Picturing the age which preceded the Reformation, Mr. de Blacam says "men everywhere in Christendom did acknowledge one spiritual authority". This is of course quite untrue. He ignored (as Roman propagandists are always careful to do) the Orthodox Eastern Churches, which, whatever their errors in doctrine, are standing witnesses against the imperialistic papacy.

Again, speaking of the conflict of ideologies which gave rise to the late war, he says "O, Reformation—here are your works: your progress from worse to better!" How easy to write in that strain! How easy to forget that Mussolini's Fascism blessed by the Church had no Reformation spirit or Protestant sympathy or inspiration. Fascism was the ideology responsible for the war, and it arose in a solidly Roman Catholic country. Communism, another ideology, became the system of another country which was untouched by the Reformation—the doings of Russia can never be laid at the door of the Protestants.

Further, none of the countries of Europe which have gone over to the conflicting ideologies was Protestant. Germany was only partly Protestant. Apart from it, Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, were all Roman Catholic. Spain accepted a Fascist ideology: to-day France and Italy have very powerful communist parties. What Protestant country reveals such a situation? Are not Protestant countries by contrast, havens of political stability, religious freedom, and economic security? These facts are eloquent enough for all to judge by if they will.

We could pursue this theme, but it is a well-worn track, and the lessons have been pointed out often enough. The competent student of history will point to the movement known as "the Counter-Reformation" as it affected Roman Catholicism and improved it, as the proof of the need of reform even of a revolutionary character.

Better still is it to recall that the changes wrought in countless lives by the spirit of God, then as now, could not fail to be revolutionary!

* * *

One final word—the Middle Ages, proportionately had as much lust, brutality, greed, wickedness and war as the post-Reformation centuries. It is futile to blame Protestantism for the faults of human nature."

REVIEWS.

"Roman Catholic Objections Answered", Sermons by the Rev. Canon H. O. Lindsay, 20 pp. This office, 4d. (by post 5½d.) 4/- for 12, post free.

Here we have in neat pamphlet form two sermons ("A Reply to Cardinal MacRory's Attack on Protestantism" and "The Protestant Basis, Holy Scripture") which appeared in our pages recently (and also in "The Ulster Protestant"). The author is Rector of St. Bartholomew's Parish, Belfast, and has gained more than local renown for his "Clonard Sermons", i.e. his sermons in reply to the Clonard Fathers of Belfast, who are Redemptorists, and carry on a mission for non-Roman Catholics. Canon Lindsay combines sound knowledge, Gospel earnestness and Christian goodwill in an admirable degree. We could wish that all controversial speech and writing were modelled on his style!

These two sermons supplement others Canon Lindsay has published ("Clonard Sermons" from A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson St., Dublin. 3d.). They are stimulating, and bring a fresh tone to subjects which are often handled in a tedious and repetitive fashion. Whether the author corrects the Cardinal, or upholds the Protestant Rule of Faith, he makes it plain that he is a patriotic Irishman, a sound Christian, a loyal churchman, and a good scholar. We ask our readers to spend a little on buying these sermons and distributing them. They cannot fail to do good.

"Rome's Challenge to our Protestant Heritage"—Rev. T. R. Horan, M.A., Irish Church Missions, 5 Townsend St., Dublin. 1/-

This publication (16 pp.) is based on an address given to a conference of Church of Ireland Clergymen. The title shows its general character. One might be tempted nowadays to think that Rome does not challenge, but patiently endures attack: at least the Roman apologists usually try to give us that impression. We recall, for instance, that when the S.P.C.K., London published the now well-known "Infallible Fallacies" in answer to Rome's insidious campaign against the Church of England, there was an outcry that this was aggression against the Roman Church. Fr. Christie, S.J. in his rejoinder "Anglicans Anonymous" plainly describes it as "attacking the Catholic Church". Mr. Horan brings together in a little space the fruits of his many years' experience of Roman Catholic action. He has unequalled qualifications among us in this matter, and we have often regretted that his busy life (and modesty about his own abilities in this line) deprive us of pamphlets and books from which we and the Church of Ireland might profit.

The subjects considered are the implications of the title "Catholic"; the Marian Year; Eucharistic Congresses; Convent classes for "non-Catholics"; Legion of Mary activity among Protestants; the Clonard mission to Protestants; Ne Temere marriage decree etc. Mr. Horan gives authoritative sources for his comments, and writes with dignity, restraint, and mastery of his subjects. Would that all who write on such matters might imitate him!

"Britain's Enemy Number One" by "Historicus"—Protestant Truth Society, 4d. 23 pp.

"Historicus" has for a long time contributed a page of notes each month to the "Churchman's Magazine". He is outspoken in his criticisms of the political activities of the Vatican, and detects in them a good deal that is inimical to the interests of the British Commonwealth of Nations. Complacent people who flatter themselves on their wordly-wisdom and tolerant good-humour may dismiss people like "Historicus" as bigots, or intellectual backwoodsmen, but there is too much of an ominous character going on in the world to justify that attitude. Cardinal Manning, eighty years ago, did not mince matters when he told his brethren of the Roman Catholic episcopate in England that their task was "to subdue an imperial people" (or words to that effect). Why should it be assumed that the Cardinal was talking at random, meaning nothing by it? Why not believe he meant it, and that his hearers and their successors accepted it as their task and are now actively engaged in it? Manning called on his co-religionists to regard themselves as soldiers fighting to win a war, and no matter how protracted the fight, to continue it until victory. Which is folly—to ignore what goes on, or to be watchful, on guard, and active? This pamphlet ought to be widely read and remembered.

CORRESPONDENCE.

34 CASTLEWOOD PARK,
RATHMINES, DUBLIN.
5th October, 1954.

To the Editor of

"The Catholic".

Dear Sir,

The Dublin press this week reported that "Roman Catholics crowded Wembley Stadium yesterday for the crowning of the statue of Our Lady of Wellesden at a Marian year rally" and "The ceremony had received the sanction of the Vatican and the crowning was carried out by Cardinal Griffin, R. C. Archbishop of Westminster. The statue replaces one removed and burned during the time of Cromwell".

Will you, sir, kindly allow me to point out that the latter was done as the result of England's throwing off the shackles of Rome when she became Protestant and I wonder whether the Vatican is not now—having gathered this 90,000 of her people at Wembley—seeking to enthral England again with her false doctrines?

However to me—a staunch Protestant—this latest action of Rome is a sort of counterblast to the tremendous campaign under God, of his servant Dr. W. Graham; who at the close of that campaign brought together 120,000 devout souls on the closing night! The result of the whole campaign was that as many as 30,000 souls were "born again" of the Holy Ghost.

Now, sir, in face of this, does it not seem a sacrilege for the Church of Rome to get together in that place a crowd to set up an image and crown the same; which is contrary to God's second commandment? The report also mentions the scourge of persecution descending on millions of God-fearing men! Could he have had in his mind the millions of Serbs etc. in Croatia not to mention all the so-called non Catholics in Italy, Spain, Portugal and Colombia who are at present suffering great persecution?

By the way, I see by "The Times" 27/3/'54 that 4 million R.C's in U.S.A. were converted in the last 10 years.

Yours sincerely,

I. L. JONES.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PUBLIC, REVEALING SINISTER CENSORSHIP IN A LAND WHICH WE THOUGHT WAS FREE

Sir,

I wonder how many of your readers know of the existence of a new film entitled Martin Luther. The producer, Lothar Wolfe, has withstood any temptation to exaggerate or tamper with historical fact, and is in consequence to be congratulated for having produced a motion picture which is compellingly moving for its sheer sincerity. This has been achieved by painstaking documentary research and by intelligently weaving Luther's own words into the script. It is doubly encouraging to find such a masterpiece coming from a country which has wasted so much celluloid in the past. (The film is American, but most of the scenes were shot in Germany.)

The disturbing feature as far as this country is concerned, however, is that although the film has been shown with immense acclaim in the United States and (parts of) Canada—the New York Times described it as "brilliant" six months ago—none of the British circuits has accepted it, in spite of the very considerable time that has elapsed since it was first offered to them. There is a very real danger, therefore, that the British people may be deprived of what has been termed "an aesthetic and spiritual experience". This is to be deplored, as it is the sort of film that many people will want to see three or four times.

One is led to enquire, what are the forces at play which have given rise to this situation? Is it that we have our tastes dictated to us by the secularly-minded or, which could be worse, by influential pressure groups of a more calculating and sinister kind? For that matter, one frequently wonders why the popular Press is so strangely silent about many things the public ought to know. However it comes about, the effect of muzzling of any sort is essentially anti-democratic and particularly dangerous because it is liable not to be recognized by the victims, namely the general public. We are justly proud of our tradition of freedom of speech, thought and conscience, but it would be a tragedy if this pride lulled us into self-complacency and lack of vigilance.

In the present instance, our very possession of these freedoms is due to Luther and to others of like calibre who had the tenacity of purpose to risk and in many cases sacrifice their life-blood to win them for Western civilization. How many of us are sufficiently mindful of this? In these times it is more than ever vital that the widespread ignorance regarding this historic figure should be dispelled.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) L. H. Long, Ph.D.

University College, Exeter.

[Since this letter was written the situation has changed, and the Luther film is now being shown in a few places in Great Britain. But the fact remains that obstacles were put in the way of its exhibition. The reason for this has not, as far as we know, been disclosed].—Ed.

THE PURPOSE OF HOLY SCRIPTURE.

The best account of the purpose of Holy Scripture is the one we may extract from the Bible itself—

1. The purpose for which God spoke through the prophets, apostles etc. is to reveal His Law. In Exodus 24, verses 3 and 4 we read—"Moses came and told the people all the Words of the Lord, and all the judgments: and all the people answered with one voice and said, 'all the words which the Lord hath spoken will we do'. And Moses wrote all the words of the Lord, and rose up early in the morning, and builded an altar under the mount, and twelve pillars, according to the twelve tribes of Israel."

2. The purpose was also to show man that he is in a lost condition. That is, without God's intervention man must die in his sinfulness. We find this stated in Galatians 3, verse 22—"Howbeit, the Scripture hath shut up all things under sin, that the promise by faith in Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe."

3. The purpose therefore must involve the revelation of Jesus Christ as Saviour so that we may have unfeigned faith in Him. So therefore we read in the Gospel of St. John, 5, verse 39—"Ye search the Scriptures because ye think that in them ye have eternal life: and these are they which bear witness of me."

This is further expressed in Acts, 10, verse 43—"To Him bear all the prophets witness, that through His name everyone that believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins."

4. The purpose may be expressed in a personal fashion if we say, with St. Paul, that it is to reveal the way of salvation. We find in 2 Tim. 3, verse 15 these words spoken to Timothy—"From a babe thou hast known the sacred writings which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus."

* * *

5. But more than this, Scripture is designed not only to point to the object of our faith, but to produce faith in us. Hence we read in John, 20, verse 31—"These are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing, ye may have life in His name."

Also in Romans 10, verse 17 St. Paul says "Belief cometh of hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ."

6. Like the physical life, the spiritual life needs to be fed. So Holy Scripture has often been likened to food, and thus we read in Deuteronomy 8, verse 3 how it is said of God—"He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knowest not, that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live."

It will be remembered that when Our Lord was tempted by Satan in the desert, that He said to the tempter—"Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God". (Matt. 4. 4.)

7. If the support of life is important, it is also important that life should be enlightened. So we read of God's word in Psalm 119, verse 130—"The opening of Thy words giveth light: it giveth understanding unto the simple."

* * *

8. To admonish, to instruct, to build up, to promote spiritual growth, all form part of the function of God's word. These are referred to in many ways, and are effectively summed up by St. Paul in 2 Tim. 3, verse 16—"Every Scripture inspired of God is profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work."

9. Sanctification is another of the purposes of Scripture, for we read in St. John 17, verse 17 Our Lord's words of prayer to the Father—"Sanctify them in the truth: Thy word is truth."

10. We have good reason, then, to agree that God's word brings joy to the heart—see Ps. 19, verse 8—"The precepts of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart."

11. They produce also patience, comfort and hope—cf. Rom. 15, verse 4—"Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning that we . . . might have hope."

12. Lastly, God's word throws light on what is to come—"The word of prophecy: a lamp shining in a dark place until the Day dawn" (2 Pet. 1. 19).

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 124

Catholic magazine, replies in the following words to a query regarding the film.

" . . . the religious war spearheaded by Martin Luther was a deformation rather than a reformation . . . Luther was one of the most depraved men the world has ever known—vile in thought, word, and conduct."—"The Vigilant", Melbourne, July, 1954.

Roman Catholic Barbarism in Colombia.

In the enlightened year of our Lord 1954, Christians are being murdered in the name of Christ!

While Pope Pius XII from the "privileged sanctuary" of the Vatican prays for peace and makes eloquent pronouncements on freedom of religion and worship, the church that boasts she never changes is with modern intolerance and medieval tactics murdering Protestants in Colombia, South America. While the Pope urgently calls the free world to the aid of persecuted Catholics behind the Iron Curtain, he is secretly encouraging the wanton persecution of Protestants in hapless, Catholic-dominated Colombia. While the bells of St. Peter's in Rome are resounding on behalf of peace and goodwill, tolerance and brotherhood, the bells of all the sainted churches in Colombia are sounding the alarm for the barbaric destruction of Protestantism.

It is a bald, incontrovertible fact that Protestant Christianity is now outlawed in three-fourths of Colombia. The reason? Nothing but traditional hatred and intolerance for non-Catholics.

By an order dated September 3, 1953, the National Government directed Departmental Governors to stop every form of religious activity except Roman Catholic in 18 regions of the country designated as Catholic Mission Territories. These same Territories were recently enumerated in the 1953 Treaty on Missions between Colombia and the Vatican. This stringent order, known officially as Circular 5,106, affects thousands of Protestant Christians and tens of thousands of Protestant sympathisers. Forty-one foreign missionaries and about 20 Colombian pastors, with their 25 churches and chapels, an equal number of manses, one Bible institute, three dispensaries, a dozen cemeteries, and some 25 primary day schools—all valued at about 145,000 dollars—are the direct objects of attack, since all Protestant religious services, sacraments, day schools, and health centres are under interdict.—“Converted Catholic”.

Protestant Nations Seen First Bulwarks Against Communism.

Addressing a gathering of over 3,000 people at Atlanta, Georgia, recently, Methodist Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam declared that the predominantly Protestant nations are the “first bulwarks against communism”. This is true, he said, because the Protestant churches “stand for the free mind in the free society”, and because their emphasis on individual freedom has created an atmosphere “in which the communist virus cannot live”.

Bishop Oxnam said the Protestants want the same religious freedom for Roman Catholics and their church as they demand for themselves and their churches. “Protestants are determined that the clericalism that has cursed other lands shall not take root here”, he said. “It is not intolerance to refuse to bow to intolerance. We are not bigots when we protest the denials of religious liberty by the Roman Catholic Church in those lands where it is powerful enough to determine action by the state.”—“The Sentinel”, Toronto, July 1, 1954.

Council Asks for Ban on “Comics.”

Leitrim County Council has adopted a resolution from Roscommon County Council calling on the Minister for Justice to amend the Censorship Act for the banning of all forms of evil literature, imports of foreign “comics” and foreign newspapers, which “extol crime and divorce”.

The banning of everything alien to the Irish Catholic way of life, foreign picture post cards, many of them “obscene and indecent” is also urged.

Mr. J. M. Mooney, who proposed the adoption of the resolution, said that he felt strongly about the import of the foreign papers, for when this country was neutral during the war, Irish news did not get a line in the English Sunday papers, but to-day they were flooding the country with special editions on Sundays, with news playing up to the Irish sentiment to get the gullible Irish to buy their papers. The Censorship Act should be amended to ban those papers. Comics were imported, and were not fit even for adults to read.

Mr. T. P. Burke, solicitor, said it would be wrong to ban the English Sunday papers, because they were so got up as to cater for the Irish readers. There might be something as regards the comics, but no council should set itself up as a censor when there was a censorship board.

Mr. P. J. Reynolds said that he would be slow to say they should do away with the English Sunday papers. They would be well advised to leave the matter alone.

Senator P. O'Reilly said that this country got on well without imported papers. If these were banned it would mean more employment in this country in printing good literature.

Mr. M. Kilrane, P.C., who seconded the proposal, said it was up to them as a council to voice their opinion on the question of having good, decent reading matter entering the homes of the people.

Mr. J. Holohan said that this was a matter entirely for the Censorship Board, and they should forget about the ban on the Sunday imported papers as their circulation gave a lot of employment.

Mr. Mooney said that this was a national question and one for them, many of whom were married men with families. The Sunday papers produced in this country were worthy of the day. In addition, they had good Catholic papers which should be brought into every home, and, because of lack of support, there were Catholic papers which had to cease publication.

Mr. P. Guckian said that this was not a matter for the County Council. There were men and women who would get the imported papers to read in spite of what the Council would say.

Anglican Congress.

Dr. Woods, Bishop of Middleton, writing on the recent Anglican Congress at Minneapolis, draws attention to the astonishing transformation which the Church of England has undergone during the last 150 years. From the Church of England “mostly being confined to these islands,” it has grown “to the Anglican Communion, consisting of sixteen independent provinces in all five continents.” Such unity was confirmed at Minneapolis. Four subjects were discussed—first in groups and then in full session—Our Vocation, Our Worship, Our Message, Our Work. The papers were in no way original, but the unanimity and fellowship of the discussions were memorable.

Errors of Neo-Modernism — Vatican Warning to Lay Catholics

Rome, September 16.

The official organ of the Vatican, the "Osservatore Romano," has published an important article on the theology of lay Catholics, which is clearly to be interpreted as a rebuke to the zealous neo-Modernists of the various Christian Democratic parties in Western Europe.

Observing that lay Catholics tend to feel "ever more strongly the need to participate in the life of the Church in a more active and operational intimacy," the paper considers none the less that this movement has produced dangerous exaggerations which tend to transform zeal into "excesses full of peril for the very life of the Church," he added.

"The movement appears the more dangerous in that its promoters present their doctrines under the attractive appearance of being dictated by the need to inform the ecclesiastical authorities of the problems of the day."

The danger of this attitude, it recalled, had been pointed out by the Pope to the cardinals and bishops recently convened in Rome for the canonisation of Pius X.

Among the principal errors of this lay theology, it stated, were a false conception of the priesthood and of marriage. This last was made to appear "in a light of unwholesome mysticism as an almost indispensable complement of the human personality." Others continued to consider the Mystical Body as "a mere conjunction of the faithful in liturgical offering," thus fomenting "a false spirituality which restricts the Church's action within strictly sacred limits."

Another error was the belief that the Church in dogmatic and disciplinary matters could establish nothing of a definitive character without preliminary searching discussions with the clergy and lay Catholics. This tendency had been observed on the occasion of the proclamation of the dogma of the Assumption. The paper concludes:

"Lay Catholics, especially those who militate in the political field, tend to insist on a clear-cut distinction between the spiritual and the temporal, recognising subordination to the ecclesiastical authorities as legitimate only in the strictly spiritual sector, while they affirm the full and total independence of laymen in all the rest without taking count of the doctrinal aspects which enter into the competence of the Church and also in not a few political and social problems."

The Welsh Bible.

"Truly," says The Times, "can the people of Wales proclaim Dr. William Morgan, who died 350 years ago, on September 10th, 1604, as their greatest benefactor." And all who know the story will consent. His memory, and the achievement of his translation of the Bible into the Welsh tongue, will be honoured by Welsh people all over the world. Welsh culture is rooted in the knowledge of the Scriptures, and at a critical juncture in the history of the nation, Morgan's translation did much to keep the Welsh language alive. As a poor boy in a Caernarvonshire village, Morgan revealed an amazing capacity for linguistic studies, and he was taught at the opportune time by a monk who had taken refuge in the village, after the dissolution of the Welsh monasteries. The landlord of Morgan's father also discerned the boy's genius for learning. In 1564 he entered St. John's College, Cambridge, as a sub-sizar, and studied under Tremillius—the foremost Hebrew scholar of the day. Happily, he became vicar of a remote country parish in the diocese of St. Asaph, and in the first ten years of his stay there, he translated the Bible into Welsh. The Hebrew and Greek originals, with his knowledge also of the Latin Vulgate, and the English Geneva Bible to help, were the foundations over which he worked: "and in magnitude and in quality he produced a translation unequalled in the history of the Welsh Bible, if not of Welsh scholarship. His achievement won the lasting friendship of Archbishop Whitgift who made him his chaplain and later procured his appointment as Bishop of Llandaff, also his subsequent translation to the See of St. Asaph."—"The Christian," 10/9/54.

No Persecution in Northern Ireland Blanshard Says.

The claims of Roman Catholic persecution in Northern Ireland was completely discounted by Paul Blanshard, after a lengthy and intensive visit to Ireland, in his latest book, "The Irish and Catholic Power," In it, he said:

"Actually, there is no religious persecution as such by the Northern regime to-day, and there are no restrictions on full religious activity. Roman Catholic churches, Roman Catholic schools, Roman Catholic social organisations, and Roman Catholic newspapers are guaranteed the full privilege of British freedom.

"But when Roman Catholic citizens with the backing of their church deny the jurisdiction of the government that maintains this freedom and openly attempt to overthrow it they are sometimes treated as enemy aliens. This treatment is quite conventional and would be adopted by any democratic majority in parallel circumstances. — "The Vigilant," July, '54.

It is perhaps not surprising, as The Churchman of New York stated in a recent issue, that Roman Catholics and Protestants throughout the country were either surprised or "shocked" by the news story reporting that a survey by The Christian Herald revealed that over four million Romanists have joined Protestant churches during the past decade. The accuracy of the figure was quickly disputed by the Jesuit journal, America, and in other Roman quarters. Rev. T. J. M. Burke, of America, asserted that the sampling techniques used were not scientific and thus proved nothing. However, he wrote: "That in the past ten years hundreds of thousands of persons from families vaguely identified as (Roman) Catholics should have identified themselves, whether vaguely or more formally, as Protestant," might be possible.

It is doubted, however, if many Protestant clergymen were surprised by the figure given, The Churchman states. They are aware that Americans have been widely misled by the propaganda of the Roman Church when any well-known individual becomes a communicant of that church, whereas Protestant churches rarely publicise reverse conversions.

Limerick Protestants Confer on Partition.

An answer to the question, "What are the moral evils connected with partition?" is contained in a statement from a joint meeting of Methodists and Presbyterians in Limerick that partition represents the breakdown of trust and neighbourliness between two large sections of the inhabitants of this small island and that, moreover, the maintenance of Northern Ireland in its present form tempts the Protestant majority to countenance "gerrymandering" tactics which lead to injustice.

The joint meeting in Limerick was called "to bear public witness to Christian truth in a matter which gravely affects the life of our whole country". Mr. Risteard O'Glaisne and the Rev. Alan Booth answered a number of question on the subject and the Rev. William Mills of the Presbyterian Church, presided. The statement from the meeting appeared in a recent issue of the Limerick Weekly Echo.

"What is the reason why the Northern majority desires partition?" The statement says that there are economic reasons, such as more liberal social services and the dependence of industry on the British market. "But most important is the element of fear that Protestant liberties would be endangered in an all-Ireland State. The fear that 'Home rule means Rome rule' is the crucial difficulty."

"Do you think, then, that Britain is not the chief villain?" To this question the reply was that, while the play of party politics at Westminster did, certainly, have a part at the end of the last century in producing a "partition psychology", it certainly was not Britain which dominated the present situation. There were 800,000 Northern Protestants, and, until their almost unanimous resistance to the idea of a united Ireland could be overcome, Britain could not be expected to act. This was where Southern extremists at present were being grossly misled.

The Protestant minority in the South had received particularly fair treatment since the foundation of the State wherever Dublin authorities were involved, though sometimes narrower and more bigoted elements in local authorities and country communities had not been so balanced, the statement said.

It was sometimes thought that this fairness would not survive once the problem of partition was solved, because the special incentive to "window dressing" would be removed. But there had to be set against this the instinctive tolerance of the Irish, their historic sympathy for the "underdog". While there were contemporary examples of severe discrimination against small Protestant communities by the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church in such places as Spain and South America, "which give just cause for uneasiness, there are factors in Ireland which suggest a different outcome. We treasure the many examples of mutual trust and affection between the two communities in the South; if it ever came to a pinch, Protestants would need to ask themselves whether their Christian witness would not be better served under persecution than by the use of doubtful political stratagems."

First Requirement.

"What is the answer to Northern fears?" The meeting said that the first requirement was to nourish every kind of mutual friendship across the border, whether through churches, sports organisations or other bodies. The aim should be to reduce the element of "cold war". The anti-partition propaganda "in its bellicose mood" only hindered the growth of that mutual trust and reasonableness on which unity would have to be based. Acts of violence confirmed the Northern Protestant in his conviction that he and his family would be endangered if the border was removed. "That is why they are such a dis-service to the cause of a united Ireland; they ought not to be countenanced by anyone who seriously cares about the unity of our country."

The meeting considered how Protestants could act helpfully in the situation, and said that Protestants had the possibility of acting as a link between North and South, "of which every advantage should be taken. They should also welcome every opportunity of discussing the matter with their Roman Catholic neighbours in order to reduce the many misunderstandings . . ."

— "Irish Times", 15/11/'54.

[The Presbyterian and Methodist communities in Limerick are tiny, and their opinions must not be treated as representative. The meeting seemingly did not involve members of the Church of Ireland which must be numerically, and in other ways, more important. Not very far from Limerick a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic recently said that when he thought of an Irishman he thought of a "Catholic". That attitude fosters partition. Further, there are many other sorts of unity we ought to seek in Ireland, so why should political unity always be the prime question? Some sensible things were said at Limerick, many more might have been. Many policies pursued in Eire have widened the division between North and South.]

Marriage Ban In Spain.

Evangelical churches in Spain, on the initiative of the Spanish Evangelical Alliance, have called upon their members to give themselves to prayer and intercession on November 1st in regard to the obstacles placed in the way of the marriage of Protestants who were baptized as infants in the Church of Rome. The position is that in Spain there is legal provision for the civil marriage of "non-Catholics", but difficulty arises from the definition of this term. On any basis which respects the conscience of the individual, a "non-Catholic" is one who does not profess the Roman Catholic religion—a matter which could be attested by the pastor or officers of the church of which the person is a member, and by a solemn declaration by the respective parties before the judge who is responsible for civil marriage in Spain. This was the procedure even under the present régime until recent years, but now the Roman Catholic definition of a "non-Catholic", as one not baptized in the Roman Church, has prevailed. In consequence, fewer and fewer judges are now prepared to marry couples without a sworn declaration that the parties have not been so "baptized". What has become almost a universal tendency in the country may soon be fixed in the revised Civil Code which is now being

PASSING ON HISTORICAL ERRORS.

Father Johnston in a note to one of his broadcasts seeks to illustrate how historical errors are "copied uncritically from one writer to another". I presume he means copied uncritically by one writer from another. It is a most dangerous practice and one that we all should take heed to avoid. Father Johnston selects the difficult case of Pope Hormisdas and his criticism of Dr. Kidd is not as convincing as it might be. Dr. Kidd declares that a libellus of Hormisdas was accepted, but only with modifications. Father Johnston roundly states "this statement is inaccurate and misleading". Now as a matter of fact Dr. Kidd had in mind the strange preamble which John the patriarch of Constantinople prefixed to his profession of adhesion to the Chalcedon faith. In it he writes: "I hold the most holy Churches of the elder and of the new Rome to be one; I define that See of the Apostle Peter and this of the imperial city to be one See." It is a long and perplexing story in which the Pope urged on the Emperor Justin persecution as a sacred duty. There is much to be said for the view that in point of fact Hormisdas in the end was content with a declaration of orthodoxy and did not too strongly insist on the erasure of the bishops' names who had not been in communion with Rome. Father Johnston's chosen authority, Rev. H. E. Symonds, asserts that "the phrasing is perhaps purposely vague" On the whole examination we must say Father Johnston has not made out a case of passing on a historical error but rather an instance in which competent authorities read the evidence in a slightly different way. An accusation of passing on a historical error ought not to be based on intricate historical circumstances. Nor are we impressed when a critic tells us that the formula of Hormisdas "was, indeed, widely accepted" according to Rev. H. E. Symonds is a contradiction of the statement "It was accepted with modifications". Then when he quotes Mr. Symonds at length he adds "The interpretations of the writer . . . are obviously coloured at times by pre-conceived notions." "Widely accepted" is not the same as "universally accepted" and "accepted with modifications" is quite consistent with "widely accepted". After much labour Father Johnston establishes the fact that the statement "Hormisdas authorised Epiphanius to accept subscriptions to a new formula, which contained nothing about prerogatives peculiar to the Roman See "might be more correctly rendered", Hormisdas authorised Epiphanius to accept a number of formulas provided they were in the same tenor as the original libellus sent by the Pope." We have read somewhere of a mountain in labour bringing forth a mouse. Now let us turn to the other side of the picture. Are there any historical errors passed on by Roman Catholic writers? I begin with an experience of my own. A small experience, but then I am a small man. Some time ago a heavily marked copy of "The Catholic Weekly", in which Dr. Rumble answered a question concerning a sermon I had delivered, was sent to me. The questioner asked, "Is it true that Abbot Ratramnus answered Paschasius Radbertus?" My heart stopped a beat. Ah, I said Dr. Rumble will point out that Ratramnus was not an Abbot at all, but actually wrote against his own Abbot Paschasius and I will appear to have been most careless." Imagine my surprise when Dr. Rumble replied, "I have read all that Abbot Ratramnus ever wrote." And there was no Abbot at all. That is a small matter, of course, but it illustrates how errors are passed on. Many Roman Catholics will probably be sure that Ratramnus was an Abbot. Didn't Dr. Rumble say so? I did not make the mistake that time. It was my listener. If ever I do make a mistake I hope my better informed listeners will hasten to correct me. Here is a more serious historical error that has been passed on by a recent Pope and has been repeated times without number. In the new Index of Prohibited Books issued by Pope Pius XI in 1929 Cardinal Merry de Val states in the official preface. "During the seventy years which intervened between the invention of printing and the publication of Luther's German version, more than 200 editions of the Holy Scriptures in different living languages were spread abroad among the peoples, duly approved by the Church."

Now the Catholic Encyclopædia can only muster twenty-one pre-Lutheran editions for a certainty and one other reputed copy. Miss Deansley tells us "The printing of German Bibles was done without the approval of the Church." Here is a flat contradiction. Yet the historical error is passed on. I have not seen any close examination in any Roman Catholic writer of the weight of evidence collected in Miss Deansley's "Lollard Bible". Although to take a leaf out of Father Johnston's book, "The Lollard Bible" was published nearly ten years before Cardinal Merry de Val wrote his misleading preface which received the sanction of the Pope. Turn back for a moment to the case of Hormisdas, which has so disturbed Father Johnston. The Emperor Justin appealed to Hormisdas not to use force in bringing certain Orientals to the unity of the Roman See. Hormisdas replied at length. He tells the Emperor that wounds inflicted for a remedial purpose are desirable and that it is right for those who are not moved by the example of a religious prince to be subdued to his command. The Pope supports the appeal to force as early as the sixth century. Yet we find Dr. Rumble stating categorically, "The Catholic Church does not rely upon force of arms to propagate the Catholic faith or win back deserters." Here again historical errors are passed on simply because Dr. Rumble is content to answer a question without considering its historical implications. Dr. Sparrow-Simpson gives a startling illustration not, indeed, of the way in which historical errors are passed on, but the way in which historical truth is passed over. The Liber Diurnus contained the famous words "Anathema to the heretic Honorius." "As Pope Honorius is condemned in the profession of faith of the new Pontiffs," says Cardinal Bona, "It is better not to publish this work." And so there is room for the glib assurance of modern Roman Catholic controversialists like Dr. Rumble who asserts Honorius' personal opinion was not heretical, and thus contradicts three Ecumenical Councils in succession and never once reveals that Pope Honorius was condemned as a heretic by successive Popes for centuries. There is surely need for the warning about passing on historical errors. Nor are we at the end of our long list of historical blunders so plainly evident that we need not study the pages of Migne or immerse ourselves in intricate historical problems to discover them.

I have not come across anywhere a convincing explanation of the mishandling of Keenan's Controversial Catechism. From 1846 to 1880 this little book circulated freely with the following question and answer: "Must not Catholics believe the Pope in himself to be infallible?" This is a Protestant invention; it is no article of the Catholic Faith; no decision of his can oblige under pain of heresy, unless it be received and enforced by the teaching body, that is, by the bishops of the Church."

Notice that the edition of 1860 bore the confirmation of four Roman Catholic Bishops. These men sanction a Catechism which declared that the opinion that the Pope was in himself infallible was a Protestant invention. In 1896 we have a revised edition of Keenan. The above question and answer has disappeared entirely. In its place we find several questions. One will suffice: "What do Catholics believe concerning the Infallibility of the Pope? That the visible head of the Church on earth received from Christ the same prerogative of infallibility which we have shown above to be necessary to and belong to the Church by divine institution." But before the Roman controversialists could come to this direct contradiction the way had to be prepared. Copies were issued apparently identical in every particular. The same word began each page and ended each page. But by a clever spacing of the Chapters the question and answer which described Papal Infallibility as a Protestant invention had disappeared. After some time, as I have said, new questions and answers were substituted in a revised edition flatly contradicting the original Keenan. Can Father Johnston give any instance of passing on historical errors equal to that? So far has this doctoring of facts gone that Newman pathetically complains, "There was true private judgment in the medieval schools; there are no schools now, no private judgment (in the religious sense of the phrase), no freedom, that is, of opinion. That is, no exercise of the intellect" (Ward's Life, p. 558). That is surely a condition of paralysis in which the wonder is that anything at all is passed on. Thoughtful observers are coming to the opinion that the Roman Church is becoming more and more static. But I must not philosophise. I must return to cold facts. There is a very popular Roman Catholic Book of Devotions called "The Glories of Mary", written by Saint Alphonsus de Liguori. It abounds in quotations from Saints and Fathers. It comes as something of a surprise to Protestants to find that in a commendatory notice in The Dublin Review the reader is warned not to use the good Saint's quotations for any polemical purpose, as many of them could not stand historical investigation. The excuse is offered that the writer's purpose is devotional and not polemical or historical. Now what are we to make of that? Does it not look like seeking to glorify God by carelessness or untruthfulness? Newman has to admit, "Though commonsense may determine that the line of prudence and propriety has certainly been passed in the instance of certain statements about the Blessed Virgin, it is often not easy to prove the point legally, and in such cases authority, if it attempt to act, would be in the position which so often happens in our Court of Law, where the commission of an offence is morally certain, but the Government prosecution cannot find legal evidence sufficient to ensure conviction." One is tempted in the face of such a defence to say to the canonising Pope parodying some well known lines, "You may have been right to dissemble your fear, but why did you kick him upstairs?" Dr. Salmon stated and he has not been challenged on the point, "Anyone must be mad who would trust St. Liguori for a reference." Here is an instance of passing on historical errors with a lavish hand. And yet the offender has been made a Doctor of the Church. The highest authority has declared that there is nothing worthy of censure in his writings. I conclude with one particularly foul historical error that has, unfortunately been revived in modern days. Sanders, the violent opponent of Protestantism in the sixteenth century, accused Henry VIII of being the father of Anne Boleyn, whom he subsequently married. This vile slander had been allowed to die and was not repeated by any reputable person for many years. William Cobbett, the chosen champion of the Roman Catholics, although himself a mendacious Protestant of a sort, repeats the slander in his History of the Protestant Reformation. He is cunning enough to declare that though he believes the tale himself, he does not wish to assert it as proven fact! Apparently Cobbett was capable of believing what was not proved. Indeed, had he not done so he could never have written his history. But Cardinal Gasquet, who is regarded as the last word in historical matters, edited Cobbett and has this note at page 41 of his edition. "The story is not without a certain amount of evidence to support it." Now the dates that can be gathered from the State Papers make this story wholly incredible. Even if we accept the year 1507 as the date of Anne Boleyn's birth, that is two years before Henry VIII ascended the throne and therefore two years before he could, as the story alleges have sent Thomas Boleyn to France on the King's business in order to carry on an intrigue with his wife, a woman old enough to be Henry's mother. This vile slander found its way into the Annals of Baronius continued by Raynaldus. It was revived in England by David Lewis, a curate of Newman. From thence it went into Cobbett and from thence secured the blessing of Cardinal Gasquet. Truly we need to guard against passing on historical errors.

EDITOR'S CHAIR MARIOLOGY.

The title of this paper is a word which is coming into wider use nowadays. Formerly it was uncommon, at least in English. Apparently the first use of it in our language was in 1857 when a writer named J. S. Harford wrote "in the third and fourth centuries we find nothing that can be resolved into 'Mariology'". In 1903 in the "Dublin Review" the subject of "Mariology" is treated of at great length under this title. We learn this from the Oxford English Dictionary which finds no use of the word before the date given (1857).

Incidentally, the same Dictionary gives an example of the use of the word "Mariolatry" as early as 1612, in a book called "The Corruption of Scripture" by T. James. It gives the quotation (in reference to Genesis III) "the reading, 'ipsa' is the best ground for their Mariolatry". The next example of the use of "Mariolatry" given is in 1844 in a book by a Mr. Close (was this the distinguished rector of Cheltenham, afterwards Dean of Carlisle?) "A Reply to Dr. Arnold." The quotation is "Whether the exhibition of Mariolatry hath destroyed many souls I cannot tell". A third example is in 1874 in Green's "Short History of the English People", in which the phrase "the pretty conceits of Mariolatry" occurs.

These references to the Oxford English Dictionary show that neither word has been usual in the past. Of course the words differ greatly in their character. We do not think that a Roman Catholic would write or speak of "Mariolatry" (unless in ignorance), for the word incorporates the idea of "Latreia", i.e. the worship we give to God; and Roman Catholicism defines that the worship given to the Blessed Virgin Mary is not "Latreia", but "Hyperdulia", or a higher degree of the adoration or veneration offered to saints. How far the distinction is scrupulously observed: indeed, how far it is possible to observe it, need not be our question at the moment.

On the other hand "Mariology" is officially used among Roman Catholics, and signifies a subject to be studied, just as "Theology" signifies a study about the nature of God, and "Christology" one about the nature of Our Lord. We can recall seeing a reference to a "Professorship of Mariology" in some Seminary, so the matter is one for academic and scholastic investigation. The doctrines about the Blessed Virgin, the evidence for them, and their implications, constitute the contents of Mariology.

We can readily see that Mariology as a study can begin with Genesis III. 15 (in the Vulgate mistranslation of the Hebrew, i.e. reading "she shall crush thy head" instead of "He shall crush thy head"). Its promoters and exponents must seek evidence in Scripture for their doctrine. Much can be quoted in favour of Mariology if we allow the remarkable interpretations which are current to justify the groundless assertion that the Bible warrants the Roman Catholic theory. The facts about the "first Eve" in the early chapters of Genesis are used to build up a doctrinal picture of the "second Eve" who is Our Lord's Mother. We readily agree that there is a symbolic or allegorical sense in which the title "second Eve" may be applied to the Blessed Virgin, for some of the earliest Christian writers use it, and we appeal to them in general to demonstrate that they, as witnesses to the faith of the early Church, are ignorant of such beliefs as are now universal among Roman Catholics. But if we admit this title it is not to justify a claim that the Blessed Virgin had a conscious active share in our redemption comparable with the first Eve's responsibility for the fall.

From Genesis III onward the Mariologists are full of ingenuity in adapting old Testament texts to fit their cause. We have before us a little book called "Mary", (a volume in the "Religion and Culture Series" edited by J. Husslein, S.J., Ph.D., Bruce Publishing Co., Milwaukee, U.S.A., 1939). The author is Sister Eleanore C.S.C., Ph.D. One chapter is called "Mary in Prophecy". It begins by discussing with charm and piety the significance of the fall in relation to the promise that "the seed of the woman" shall crush the serpent's head. Sister Eleanore admits that the Hebrew refers the victory to the seed (or son i.e. descendant of the woman rather than to her, but adds "the Douay Version and the Vulgate, as likewise the Bull Ineffabilis Deus, refer it also to the woman", from which it appears that the Latin and its English translation and the Papal Bull interpret, or better, correct, the Hebrew (of which, the Council of Trent says, God is the author).

From this improvement on the Hebrew the writer can easily conclude that Mary "neither was conceived with original sin, nor ever committed actual sin", because the enmity between her and the Devil is complete! Thus we have a "Scriptural" basis for the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. A bold assertion will carry us a vital step further—"Tradition and consistent teaching have held always to the Immaculate Conception." In fact neither point is true. There is a definite lack of primitive Christian Tradition, and through the Middle Ages many great theologians refused to admit the Immaculate Conception.

Pope Pius IX declared in 1854 that the dogma of the Immaculate Conception was a revealed truth necessary to salvation. Sister Eleanore says "only after the successor of Peter had proclaimed her privilege did she (Mary) join her own public testimony to that of angel and pontiff". The reference is to the story of Bernadette's vision of the Lady at Lourdes, and to the child's claim that the Lady said "I am the Immaculate Conception". "For us" says the writer "Rome has spoken and Mary has verified".

The book before us says "Mary is mediatrix with Christ for us". Every student of the new Testament knows that it tells us nothing of Mary as our mediatrix. On the contrary, it tells us that Christ said "Come unto Me"; "Ask in My Name"; that He rebuked His followers "Ye will not come unto Me" (John 5.40). Had her Son designated His mother as the intermediary between Himself and us it is inconceivable that Scripture would not have preserved a record of it.

Sister Eleanore also writes "As the Fathers of the Church insist; she is Dispensatrix as well of all the graces gained for us by Christ." Note that the Fathers, not the New Testament, i.e. the Apostles, are claimed as the authority for this. The Fathers cited are 1. St. Bernard (who lived about a thousand years after the Blessed Virgin). 2. St. Bernardine of Siena (who lived over thirteen hundred years after Christ). 3. St. Ephrem (some three hundred and fifty years after). 4. St. Thomas (about twelve hundred years after). 5. St. Gregory of Nyssa (three hundred and fifty years after). 6. St. Alphonsus (presumably St. Alphonsus Liguori, A.D. 1696-1787, not St. Alphonsus Rodrigues, A.D. 1617—seventeen hundred years after). 7. St. Bonaventure, c. 1250 A.D. i.e. (twelve hundred years after). 8. St. John Damascene, A.D. 750, i.e. (seven hundred years after).

What we want is a consistent testimony of the Fathers of the first three centuries, all of them, if we are to be convinced that the early Christian Church, from the days of the Apostles held to such beliefs. What we are given is a random selection of quotations from eight men over one and three quarter millenniums. Further, the quotations do not support the claim in every case. For example, St. Thomas Aquinas is quoted as saying "Mary would never have been worthy to be the Mother of God if she had committed a single sin". Passing over the phrase "Mother of God", we believe we are correct in saying that St. Thomas was one of the chief mediæval opponents of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. What he believed was that the Blessed Virgin had been cleansed from original sin at the moment of her creation; not that she was sinless ab initio. You may say that this is an obscure and mysterious point. No doubt it is, but St. Thomas was too sound a theologian to ignore the teaching of the Bible, for example, St. Paul in Romans V "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Therefore he could believe that the Blessed Virgin was cleansed from original sin at her Conception, but not that she had escaped from the entail of sin upon every child of Adam.

The fault of many writers of this sort of popular piety is that they seize upon passages in old writers which seem to support their views. They do not examine critically. They assume that an ancient, or not so ancient, Father must think as we do. If there is silence or doubtful words it is easy to claim for the ancients "implicit faith".

The second prophecy about Our Lord's Mother (note how the prophecies about Our Lord Jesus Christ became prophecies about the Blessed Virgin!) is Isaiah's "The Lord shall give you a sign. Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and His name shall be called Emmanuel." This, says Sister Eleanore, is a prophecy of Mary's perpetual virginity. This interpretation is further developed in reference to Jeremiah's words "The Lord hath created a new thing upon the earth: a woman shall compass a man." She says that "the Vulgate Version of the Hebrew" (i.e. the Latin translation) is interpreted to refer to the Virgin's conception of Christ without the co-operation of man.

of the Lord: be it unto me according to thy Word." More than thirty years after, a certain woman who heard Jesus preaching said "blessed is the womb that bare thee". He replied "Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it." It seems extraordinary that in face of the plain implications of Christ's words "Yea, rather . . ." Sister Eleanore should choose to arrange some other words of His so as to give a different character to His teaching on relationship—She first quotes "Whosoever shall do the will of My Father who is in heaven, he is My brother, and sister, and mother" and follows it with the words of the Blessed Virgin we have quoted i.e. "Behold the handmaid of the Lord: be it unto me according to Thy Word." The quotation of Our Lord's words in Matt. 12. 50 seems to abolish physical relationship in favour of spiritual affinity and discipleship. They have no connection with Mary's answer to the Angel given a generation earlier.

Another Old Testament quotation is introduced to us with the words "There is another prophecy, that of Micheas (English versions Micah), which has more recently been referred to Our Lady, though some of the earlier Fathers thought it referred rather to the Church—"Thou, Bethlehem Ephrata, art a little one among the thousands of Juda: out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel: therefore will he give them up even till the time wherein she that travaileth shall bring forth . . ." (Micah 5, 2-3).

The application of this to the Blessed Virgin is not improper of course: there is no reason at all to refuse to see in the Old Testament a foretelling of her task. But where Scripture mentions her in order to direct attention to her Son, writers like Sister Eleanore turn the whole passage into something different, and treat it as if the prophet were predicting Mary rather than Emmanuel! Some time ago; last Lent or the previous one we saw a pastoral Letter on Mariology, issued in Ireland. It was furnished with very numerous Scripture references. On examination the text cited had usually no reference to Our Lord's Mother, though they purported to give us Scripture evidence. The simple fact is that the Bible has the theme "Christ in all the Scriptures" not "Mary in all the Scriptures". (See Luke 24. 27).

Our authoress tells us also that "besides these four prophecies there are many other passages in the Old Testament that by accommodation refer to Mary." Type and figure, allegory and metaphor can be provided, and we are tempted to conclude that as the narrow field of the New Testament is too plainly taken up by Christ Himself, the wider field of the Old, with its rich imagery and wealth of symbols, can be turned to so as to give us evidences which have been denied to us in the New Testament.

The liturgical and devotional language of Roman Catholicism developed in Mediterranean lands, not among the less volatile and more realistic northern peoples. The Mediterranean lands from the beginning worshipped many female divinities. After their adherence to Christianity they modified their new faith to suit their temperament. In the Old Testament, itself produced by the Mediterranean Sea, like the New, there is much to capture the imagination of peoples who were slow to grasp the deeper lessons of God's Word.

This year 1954 was designated "the Marian Year". It officially ends with the Feast of the Immaculate Conception on 8 Dec. It commemorates, as we know, the centenary of the declaration by Pope Pius IX of the Dogma of the Immaculate Conception in 1854. The present Pope has lately instituted a new feast of Mary the Queen, so that the Marian Year will be itself commemorated.

A number of years ago a feast was instituted of "Christ the King". In Ireland a few churches were given the title or dedication "Christ the King". We recall our own sense of gratitude that such dedications had been introduced, for we hoped that as a result the attention of our fellow-countrymen might be directed to the central Figure of our Faith, and that it might be increasingly realised that He is the Christian's "All in All". Our Redeemer, our Mediator, our King, our High Priest, our Master and Lord, our Coming Judge. We hoped that men and women everywhere might find that He is all-sufficient—that His love and His intercession are for everyone. An attempt was made to erect a statue of Christ the King at Dun Laoghaire so that visitors to this land, arriving at Kingstown Harbour might see at once that this is a Christian land: not pagan like its neighbours. A statue was sent to Dun Laoghaire, but was never erected there. At length it was removed elsewhere, and nothing is ever heard of it. It may have been unsuitable. But if so, we heard of no effort to obtain a more fitting one to take its place. The interest in Christ the King was not what it should have been, nor as great as the Pope had wished and hoped for.

There is now a project to erect a statue of the Blessed Virgin at the Port of Dublin. This will be carried into effect soon. What puzzles many is the question why one undertaking should be allowed to lapse, mainly through apathy, and the other should be energetically pursued.

We know, of course, that the religion of the soul is independent of visual aids, and that the want of a statue of Christ the King is not proof of indifference to Christ. But is He thought to be too remote from us, and too detached from warm human relationships? The Mother who said at the marriage feast at Cana "Whatsoever He saith unto you, Do it" would surely favour the widest devotion to Her Son, and that devotion can best be shown by obedience to His commands.

What we all need is more deliberate and devout study of the Scripture, and especially the Gospels. They bring Christ very near to us—in His living humanity; in His atoning death; in His abiding presence; in His Divine Sonship. He is the Second Person of the Holy Trinity, the First and the Last. He is the Way to the Father—"no man cometh unto the Father but by Me".

PIUS X AND MARY

It was on the 50th anniversary of the issue of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception* that Pius X published his immensely influential encyclical, "Ad diem illum", on the exaltation of Mary. And it is on the 50th anniversary of that encyclical's publication, in this "Marian year" proclaimed by Pius XII, that Pius X is canonized.

In this historic encyclical Pius X wrote "By means of all these (Marian) truths, whatever rationalism and materialism exists is torn up by the roots and destroyed, while to Christian wisdom remains the glory of guarding and defending the truth . . . By the dogma of the Immaculate Conception of the Mother of God . . . we are all constrained to recognize in the church a power to which one must submit not only the will but also the intellect . . . The church rightly attributes to the august Virgin this, that she by herself destroyed all the heresies in the whole world."

In this encyclical Pius X lays the foundation for the Marian dogma of the Assumption, proclaimed by Pius XII, as for those other beliefs in Mary as Co-Redeemer, Co-Mediator of all graces and Queen sharing the rulership of the world with her Son, which President Flynn of St. John's University has predicted will, before another century has passed, be dogmas the faithful must accept as necessary to salvation. To be sure, he does not do this in the sentimental or speculative terms which make so much of the popular literature of Marian devotion almost unreadable to any mind which attempts to make reading an exercise in comprehension.

By Mary's sharing in the sufferings of Christ, said Pius X's encyclical, "she merited to become in a most worthy manner the Reparatrix of the lost world and consequently the Dispenser of all the gifts that Jesus acquired for us by his death and blood." "Mary . . . is the neck by which the Body (the Church) is united with the Head," and through this neck "all spiritual gifts are communicated". "Since we are so weak as to be easily frightened by the greatness of the Exemplar, divine Providence has proposed for us another model which, though it is the closest copy of Christ that human nature is capable of, is more suitable to our littleness." Many of the extravagances of Roman Catholic pulpit exegesis find a justification in Pius X's claim that Adam, Noah, Abraham, Jacob, Moses, David and Elias "—all these thought of Mary." And Rev. 12:1 is papally interpreted to depict the glory of Mary in heaven, "clothed with the sun, and the moon was under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars."—"Christian Century."

BACKGROUND TO THE SCRIPTURES

London Exhibition Gives a Fascinating Glimpse of the Biblical World.

By Dr. JAMES PARKES

In a little frame by itself is a small piece of pottery bearing in Hebrew the words "Gold of Ophir: to Beth Horon". It is a receipt of the 8th century B.C., and it was discovered in the ruins of the custom-house which guarded the mouth of the river Yarkon (or Auja) north of Tel Aviv.

Partly because I was staying opposite the site of the excavations just after it was discovered, partly because "gold of Ophir" was always part of the romance of the Biblical world, and partly because the receipt of a customs official is a timeless link between then and now, this little bit of pink earthenware was in itself enough to justify my visit to the exhibition which the Government of Israel put together, and which the Trustees of the British Museum have courteously housed and opened to the public.

We should be grateful to both the Government and the Trustees, for it would have been a thousand pities if this small but splendidly chosen exhibition, after visiting America and Holland, should have passed Britain by. The exhibition (as reported in C.E.N.) was formally opened on October 26 and will continue until the end of the year.

Back To Genesis.

The earliest exhibits date back to the Stone Age, an Age dimly referred to in the early stories in Genesis. They become fuller and more interesting as we move into the period after the Exodus, and give astonishing reality to Biblical stories of the relations of the Children of Israel with the inhabitants of the Land and the neighbouring peoples of the Nile, the Euphrates and the Mediterranean.

Here are votive offerings to Canaanite gods and goddesses, specimens of the famous "el-Amarna letters" from local Egyptian governors of the 14th century B.C., and evidences in glass and pottery of trade relations with the Mediterranean peoples.

The excellent placing of the exhibition by the British Museum enables visitors to see, in close contact with its special exhibits, such treasures of the Museum itself as the famous reliefs and reports of Sennacherib describing his invasion of Palestine, his capture of Lachish and his failure before Jerusalem.

It is astonishing that we can still see delicate ivories from the ivory house of King Ahab (1 Kings 22, 39); or exquisite specimens of the jewellery of the daughters of Jerusalem such as provoked the anger of Isaiah. (Isaiah 3, 16-24). Here also are three-pronged forks such as the priests used to take their share of flesh from the pot (1 Samuel 2, 13-14), here are reconstructions and fragments from the famous stables of Solomon at Megiddo, here are seals, signatures, scraps of Hebrew writing, all serving to bring life and realism to the Biblical story.

The entry into Palestine of Greek culture is illustrated by two interesting heads, and by votive offerings to Greek gods and goddesses who take the place of their Canaanite predecessors. With the Age of the Maccabees, coins come on the scene and there are few more personal touches in the exhibition than the graceful little bronze pot in which some inhabitant of Jerusalem hid his little store of money—nine Tyrian and three Jewish shekels—as the Roman armies converged on the doomed city.

The Dead Sea scrolls naturally figure in the exhibition, with specimens of three in the possession of the Hebrew University. One contains the text of Isaiah, one a collection of psalms of thanksgiving after some national crisis, one an apocalyptic "battle of the sons of light and the sons of darkness".

There is also one of the jars in which the scrolls were found, and this takes us back to the time when Jeremiah bought his ancestral property at Anathoth and placed his title deeds in just such a container (Jeremiah 32: 14).

The exhibits continue to illustrate life in Palestine up to the time of the Muslim conquest in the 7th century. It is in this section that Christian objects will be seen. The first centuries of Christianity have left disappointingly few traces, but there is an example of a finely carved Byzantine chancel screen from the Negey, and a bronze lamp from Beth Ahan.

From The Synagogues.

Of Jewish objects from the same period the most striking are carvings from the famous 2nd century synagogue at Capernaum, and a fascinating, if primitive, mosaic floor from a 6th century Galilean synagogue. It illustrates the sacrifice of Isaac, and shows that, at any rate during some periods, Jews did not mind representing the human figure in their art.

Finally a word should be said about the excellent guide. It is not just a hand-book of the exhibits. Each of them is fully described at the place where it is shown, so that the published guide can range over wider fields, and devote itself to the background and setting of the actual exhibits.

Deprived Of Human Rights.

Many of our Spanish brethren and sisters are placed in a serious dilemma. Some priests might be prepared to marry Evangelicals without Mass or Confession, but the undertaking to bring up the children in the Roman Catholic faith remains, and in any case Evangelicals are in general unwilling to seek this way out. Then again, morally, a religious service in an Evangelical church might be considered adequate, and is sometimes necessary in extreme cases, but Evangelical leaders are convinced that this "remedy" would lead to many complications in the course of years (as there would be no legal backing, and the children might be "recognized", but would not be legitimate in law) and therefore they advise against it. It is obvious that this problem goes to the very roots of human rights; it creates grave problems of conscience, and it threatens to cloud the happiness of the partners just in the crisis of their lives when all right-thinking persons would wish them joy. It is important that people should know that the position is created by Roman Catholic Canon Law which the Pope has recently reaffirmed by a motu proprio. It is evident in Spain because Canon Law is accepted in all religious matters, but it is latent wherever Roman Catholic influence is encouraged. The Evangelical Alliance has appealed to ministers and churches to engage in special prayer on Sunday, October 31st for our oppressed brethren and sisters in Spain, who in addition to the disability mentioned above, are not allowed to open new churches and chapels; are not allowed to announce services publicly (worship is supposed to be private), and are not allowed their own schools.—"The Christian", 15/10 '54.

THAT CHARRED FRAGMENT.

A colporteur was selling Bibles in a South American town. A priest followed, seized all the Bibles and made a bonfire.

A partly burned page was carried by the breeze into another street, picked up, and the Word of God went home.

PASSING EVENTS.

Watchmen for Armageddon—National Service Plea.

Douglas Walsh (20), of Kitchener Street Dalmuir West, Glasgow, sought in the Court of Session, Edinburgh, a declaration that the Jehovah's Witnesses movement is a religious denomination for the purposes of the National Service Act, 1948, and that he is a "regular minister" of the denomination.

The Minister of Labour and National Service opposed the declaration.

Three of the witnesses had flown from America. They were Mr. F. W. Franz, vice-president of the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, the organisation concerned with Jehovah's Witnesses; Mr. G. Suiter, the secretary of the society; and Mr. H. C. Covington, of the General Legal Council.

Sir John Cameron, Q.C. represented Mr. Walsh and Mr. H. R. Leslie, Q.C. appeared for the Minister of Labour and National Service.

Mr. Franz said in evidence that last year there were 468,106 Jehovah's Witnesses in a world-wide organisation. It was a theocratic organisation, with the dual purpose of worshipping Jehovah and preaching "the Gospel of the Kingdom" throughout the earth. There were over 25,000 members in the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic.

"We believe that the battle of Armageddon will arrive within the generation that began witnessing the events of 1914," he said. God had constituted witnesses as a "watchman class" to give warning of the coming of Armageddon, which was "the great executorial sword that would destroy the adversaries of Jehovah God. We feel therefore under obligation to preach the message of the Kingdom in order that all may be warned, the wicked as well as the righteously disposed, and in order that we be not held accountable for the death or destruction of anybody."

During cross-examination by Mr. Leslie, Mr. Franz said he was bound not to reveal the names of those responsible for new translations of the Scriptures.

Mr. Leslie: It is very important, is it not, to beware of false prophets?—That's right.

Eastern Orthodox Churches—Roman Doctrine "Being Eradicated" from Greek Orthodox Church.

The Most Rev. Dr. J. A. F. Gregg, Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland, stated that in the 17th and 18th centuries a very considerable amount of Roman doctrine percolated into the Greek Orthodox Church, but it was now being eradicated from its theology. He was speaking at the Church of Ireland Training College, Kildare Place, Dublin, to the annual meeting of the Irish branch of the Anglican and Eastern Churches' Association, of which he has been president since its formation 25 years ago.

Dr. Gregg said that he recently had been reading Greek Orthodox literature and was surprised that in many ways it was simple in outlook. One of the things that impressed him was that the Greek priest did not hold anything like the same position as the Roman priest. The Greek Orthodox Church was there from the beginning. It had no reformation. While there were many substantial changes in the Roman Catholic Church, the Greek Church was the same as the undivided Church of the early days.

In his annual statement, the outgoing honorary secretary, the Rev. Canon W. E. Vandeleur, recalled that, at the last annual meeting, the Most Rev. Dr. Gregg had asked them to remember that 1954 was the 900th anniversary of the great schism between East and West. The branch had marked that by a notable Service on July 20th in St. Anne's Church, Dawson Street, Dublin, when the Primate had preached to a congregation of over 700. The number of life members of the branch remained the same—100—and there was a large number of adherent sympathisers.

India's Tradition.

The Rev. C. A. Abraham, of the Syrian Orthodox Church of India, said that in England—where he was still a student—he was often asked if he were a convert from Hinduism or if his father or grandfather had been converts. At times he was tempted to reply that there were Christians in India before there were Christians in England. According to tradition the Church of south-west India was founded by St. Thomas. Modern historians were inclined to accept that historical tradition. St. Thomas had done for India what St. Patrick had done for Ireland, and it could be proved definitely that the Church in India existed before St. Patrick came to Ireland.

The Church in India received bishops from Antioch and sometimes from Persia and because of that it was sometimes described as Nestorian, but there were few heresies of which it was not accused. After the coming of the Portuguese in the 16th century, the Church in India was brought under the Roman Catholic Church. For 50 years it remained under the Roman Church and was prevented from having foreign visitors. Then, with the coming of the Dutch, half of it broke away and continued an independent existence. The work of the western missionaries was, on the whole salutary; it stimulated more missionary activity. The ancient Church remained one of the strongest churches in India and the fact that it was so old was an answer to the accusation that Christianity was a foreign import into India.

Referring to the difficulties facing his Church, Mr. Abraham said that in the whole history of Christendom there was nothing like renascent and resurgent Hinduism. It had immense powers of assimilation and the Greco-Roman world had not had to face anything like it.

Senator Professor W. B. Stanford, Trinity College, Dublin, told of a tour of Greece which he carried out this year. His most remarkable impressions of the religious life of the Greeks were of its mixture of adoration and joy and of dignity with family feeling.—“Irish Times”, 16/11/54.

Exaltation of the Blessed Virgin Mary—Criticism by Bishop of Chichester.

The prevalent Roman Catholic tendency to exalt the Blessed Virgin Mary to a place almost on an equality with our Lord is criticized by the Bishop of Chichester in the current number of his diocesan leaflet.

The Bishop remarks that this tendency, which is contrary to the spirit of the New Testament, must, in the end, detract from the uniqueness of our Lord as the Son of God. He writes:—

“What is described in the Roman Catholic Press as ‘the climax of the Marian Year in Rome’ illustrates this point in a conspicuous way. The ‘climax’ was the crowning of the picture of our Lady by the Pope on November 1, and the solemn proclamation of the new feast of the Queenship of Mary. This feast is deliberately set forth as a parallel to the feast of the Kingship of Christ.

“The establishment of this new feast is justified by the Pope in an Encyclical Letter, on the ground that ‘Mary, whether as Mother of Christ or as companion in the work of the Divine Redeemer . . . participates in the royal dignity, be it only in a limited and analogous manner.’

Slender Distinction.

“The slenderness of the distinction between Christ and his Mother is illustrated by a comparison of the words accompanying the inauguration of the two feasts—in the Encyclical of Pope Pius XI in 1925 (for the Kingship of Christ) and of Pope Pius XII in 1954 (for the Queenship of Mary).

“The former, fixing the last Sunday in October as the feast of our Lord Jesus Christ the King, enjoins that ‘on the same day, the dedication of the human race to the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus shall be renewed each year.’ The latter, naming May 31 as the feast of the Queenship of Mary, ordains ‘on the aforesaid day the consecration of the human race to the Immaculate Heart of the Blessed Virgin Mary.’”

Hydrogen Bomb May Hasten World's End.—Archbishop of Armagh's Forecast.

“What you use to defend you may destroy you” is where the horror of the whole hydrogen bomb situation lies, said Most Rev. Dr. J. A. F. Gregg, Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All-Ireland, in a Christmas Day sermon in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Armagh.

Dr. Gregg said reasoning, thinking men had brought human society to a point at which the application of scientific discovery had placed it face to face with destruction.

God, who had given them their reasoning and thinking faculties, had also given them a conscience to guide them, and it was perfectly plain that if Christ and Christ's rule of peace was being known and honoured and obeyed by all the nations, not only would the two recent world wars with all their ruin and all their bitterness have been avoided, but also we should not be standing to-day at the point of danger to the whole human race.

“I refer to the danger, the very real danger, caused by the existence in the hands of nations which at any moment may go to war with one another, of the hydrogen bomb,” Dr. Gregg said.

“We cannot blame the scientists for pursuing their researches as far as nature reveals itself to them, but it is the use to which they have applied their discoveries for which a grave responsibility rests upon them.

If . . .

“If war does break out between Communists and anti-Communists the temptation to get in first with the use of the hydrogen bomb will be very great.

"I do not believe that we on our side will yield to it, but if the other side uses it there will be prompt retaliation from our side on grounds of mere self-protection, but this is where the horror of the whole situation lies.

"What you use to defend you may destroy you.

"No one can tell and the scientists do not even profess to know, the extent of the effects of the wide use of these bombs, both on the world we live in and on us who live in it.

"We are warned that it may mean the mutilation at least of millions of human beings and not impossibly the self-destruction of the whole human race.

"And such is the state of world affairs today, it needs only the word of some dictator to bring into play the vast machinery of annihilation.

"Men have never stood so near to a possible ending of the world as we know it, as we do today," Dr. Gregg warned.

"Here then, we have two kinds of false peace—the peace of material self-satisfaction, and the international peace which is only just not war. In each case Christ can help us to a truer peace."

The Primate concluded: "I doubt if ever there was a time when the old words of the Prayer Book were more true on the lips of men who knew they could not help themselves—'Give peace in our time, O Lord' with the answer 'Because there is none other that fighteth for us, but only Thou, O Lord.'"

How World Population Is Growing.

Every day there are 100,000 more births than deaths. This means that the world's population is growing by that number every twenty-four hours. A population of 290 million is forecast for the Soviet Union within twenty-five years, and China's population is expected to reach 692 million by 1980.

CHURCH UNITY.

One of the major problems of Christendom today is Unity. But because Unity is beset by many extremely difficult problems it is frequently disregarded. For many earnest professing Christians Unity is simply not an issue. Neither individually nor denominationally do they feel any concern. Why?

We ask "why?", and we know the kinds of answers which may be given. For example, a man may say "we have the kind of Unity I want in great Christian enterprises such as the Keswick Movement, the Y.M.C.A., the C.E., the C.S.S.M., the interdenominational foreign missions etc. In these I have fellowship with numerous like-minded Christians."

As another example we may consider the man who is in search of the kind of Church fellowship he wants. He attaches himself to one denomination after another in the hope of finding what he wants; and after a long series of disillusionments ends up nowhere. All have been wrong. He has never thought of the possibility of being himself wrong in his view of Christianity. Still less has he thought of the Unity of the Church as meaning anything.

Another may say that a more important matter than Church Unity is the safeguarding of Scripture truth: that in the past men have had to secede from Churches in order to preserve and to testify to truths which have been obscured or which may be in danger of distortion. With this point of view many of us will sympathise. Yet it still remains a serious reflection on the professing Christian World that it is deeply divided and therefore unable to bear the witness Our Lord Himself intended His people to bear "that all may be one"—John 17.

Now it may readily be conceded that the divisions of Christendom are historic, and that the witness of the various Churches has mostly been worthwhile. We may go further, and hold the view of the once valued theologian Alexander Knox (of Derry and Dublin) that there is a peculiar Providential purpose in the emergence and continuity of various denominations. If that is accepted it then must still be said that Our Lord's ideal remains before us: we are falling short of it, and whatever it means, we have not fulfilled it. There is something in which we all fail. None of us; no Churches; can claim to be in harmony with New Testament principles throughout.

It will perhaps be remembered that J. N. Darby held the view that the Church of Christ was in ruin from almost the first century, because of division. He himself gave much strength to the divisive spirit in his own circles. It is so easy to say "all you have to do to secure Unity is to agree with me". Rome says that; the Eastern Church (Orthodoxy) says that. So do many Protestant Churches. But the fact is that far more often apathy, self-absorption, and the fear of change prevent a real and energetic movement towards Unity among those who agree in the broad principles of Scriptural Christianity.

Often the leaders of a Church are afraid of change, and regard themselves as in some singular fashion more responsible than the men who do not believe that the practice of the past should dominate the present. The dread of novelty is very real among Churchmen who are naturally and properly among the more conservative elements of society.

Still the problem remains. We ought not to be divided—the One Loaf, the One Fold, the One Shepherd, the One Faith, all invite us to consider if we ought to be separated. The great constructive factor of our day is the increasing realisation that Unity may no longer be ignored. Men to-day are conscious that the old world in which divided Christendom flourished has gone. The new world of militant atheism and of materialism presents a powerful challenge to the Christian Church which is being very inadequately met.

It is not likely that all Christendom can ever be united. We cannot envisage the reformed Churches, Lutheran, Anglican, Presbyterian accepting Rome's terms of reunion, i.e. submission, and professing of beliefs they have always repudiated as unscriptural and untrue. We cannot well picture an agreement of practical kind with Eastern Orthodoxy, though the largest measure of fraternal goodwill is possible. These obstacles to complete union ought not to hinder the others from pursuing the paths of understanding, and of brotherhood.

We have referred to Rome's terms, and to the impossibility of regarding her as the true Church of Christ from which we are disobediently separated, and to which it behoves us to make a penitent return. Nevertheless there are Roman Catholic divines who conscientiously try to meet us, and who are willing to see that we have some ground for our protest, and that our principles must be understood.

The name of Dr. Karl Adam is well-known. Years ago he published a book "The Spirit of Catholicism", which in its English form was widely read. No doubt in Germany it was very well received. The Protestant people Dr. Adam sought to enlighten were Lutherans. There was a soft attractive quality about his interpretation of Roman Catholicism. It might easily have persuaded readers that the Rome of the Reformers was only a Protestant bug bear. "The Spirit of Catholicism" as explained by Dr. Adam was somewhat different from the spirit expounded by the Spanish Cardinal, or by the ecclesiastics of Colombia. We still find advocates of Rome who are ready to argue that "heresy" is a very great evil, and that as the community has the right to protect itself against murderers and to punish them, so it has the right to protect itself against heresy. The "non sequitur" is plain enough, but the argument can condone anything.

Lately Dr. Adam has issued a small book "One and Holy" (English translation, Sheed and Ward, London). It is a study of the possibility of Roman and Protestant union (i.e. Lutheran).

"It cannot be doubted that a bridge is being built between Catholics and Lutherans, at least in the sense that the unreality of mere polemic is being abandoned, that Luther on the one hand, and the Papacy on the other are being seen in a clearer and more friendly light, and that real efforts are being made, by Christians everywhere, to bring about if not a unio fidei at least unio caritatis."

In the chapter on "The roots of the Reformation" Dr. Adam gives a frank and honest account of the religious state of Europe in the fifteenth century, and far from trying to explain away the abuse of Indulgence, which gave Luther his starting-point, he says "Some of the papal decrees themselves were in a great measure responsible for the crude interpretation of indulgences" (i.e. the notion that "your cash no sooner clinks in the bowl than out of Purgatory jumps the soul"). He speaks of how "this hideous simoniacal abuse of indulgences corrupted true piety": Of Luther he says "Had he brought all his magnificent qualities to the removal of the abuses of the time and the cleansing of God's garden from weeds, had he remained a faithful member of his Church, humble and simple, sincere and pure, then we should to-day be his grateful debtors." He thinks in that case Luther would be comparable to Aquinas and Francis of Assisi. Such language is very different from the older controversial language of Rome.

On efforts at Reform of the Church before Luther began Dr. Adam says (to quote one phrase) "The Lateran Council of 1513 might energetically deplore the evil state of the Church in Head and members, but a really effective will to reform was lacking." Little wonder that only four years later Luther was challenging the abuse of indulgences, and indulgences themselves.

Yet Dr. Adam traces the origin of Luther's movement to a breaking-away from the Church's doctrine of justification by Faith as early as 1512. That may be, but it is a matter for very careful study to decide if the Church's view of justification in the sixteenth century, or Luther's, was right i.e. Scriptural.

But the main point is not the differences of the past, but the possibility of reunion now.

Dr. Adam's question here is "Does a closer view rather show that both Churches have much in common, and even that the beliefs which differentiate them come together, ultimately, in the fundamental basis which is common to both religions?" It is, of course, Luther's Christianity and not the diluted faith of "the Enlightenment" (what we would call "modernism") which Dr. Adam has in mind.

It is noteworthy that Dr. Adam himself can advance so far towards us as to write "For the Catholic it is not ultimately the objective norm of the teaching voice, but the subjective decision of conscience which has finally to decide on a believing acceptance of the revealed truth laid down by the authority of the Church." "The two confessions meet each other in the decisive place they give to the judgment of the individual conscience." What a pity it is that Rome, recognising the right of conscience, should at the same time claim the right to coerce conscience by penalties! It is still held that the Church has the right to use force. How, we wonder, does Dr. Adam's view harmonise with the spirit of the Syllabus of Pope Pius IX?

Dr. Adam emphasises what we have often put to Roman Catholic enquirers—the agreement between us in the fundamentals of true Christianity—the Triune God, the Gospel, the Coming Judge—"the core" as he says, "of both Christian confessions". But we go further: these are not only the core, but the contents of true Christianity. We want, not only an agreement as to the core but a restrictive, a limit, placed on what may be considered to be the Christian gospel and general message.

How far Dr. Adam is right in saying that private confession and devotion to the Blessed Virgin (both these in a sense in which a Roman Catholic would understand them) were part of old Lutheranism, and dropped out in the 17th and 18th centuries we are unable to say. We assume that he is correct. This brings us to a criticism, that he is discussing a Lutheranism of the 16th century, of Luther himself. That would have to be revived before reunion could be considered on his lines.

He suggests that the main objection of the 16th century was to abuses in the sphere of "discipline" rather than in the sphere of faith! This would not be true of the Thirty-Nine Articles, or of the Westminster Confession. Perhaps here we see the contrast between "Lutheran" and "Reformed" He quotes an evangelical historian, Karl Meissinger. "If Luther returned he would see that not one of the abuses which were the actual occasion of his break with Rome remains in existence." Is that not a great tribute to Luther and the essential task he performed?

It seems to us, however, that Adam goes too far in minimising the differences between Luther and Rome. Luther's view of Holy Orders and all that is involved in it (priesthood, sacrifice, etc.) seems to us to be very different from Rome. He indeed says "Papacy had no bitterer foe than the friar of Wittenberg". Dr. Adam says "As things are now the question of the divine rights of the Papacy can be decided for the faithful only in the light of Revelation."

We are to see the Pope in the New Testament. We are to study the Petrine claims there. But the New Testament will not in fact bridge the gulf between Peter's claims and the claimants who occupy the See of Rome.

For Adam the Papacy is, and has to be, the centre of Unity. He sees the divisions of Protestantism, more than 300 sects he says, and "these facts practically force upon us the Catholic interpretation of Matt. 16. 18 as finally developed at the Vatican Council of 1870."

Dr. Adam generously recognises the loss the Church of Rome endured in the Protestant separation, not numbers, but "all those precious constructive powers, all those souls of deep religious aspiration who have since worked so fruitfully and creatively within the separated communions."

"Taking one's Confession (i.e. Creed) seriously."

"A religious movement."

"Softening antagonism between believers."

These are Dr. Adam's prerequisites for the move towards unity. We warmly concur, but regard these three principles as right in any case. The one obstacle is that Rome itself is not expected to discard any dogmas which are unscriptural and untrue. Roman Catholic belief in them does not convince us of their revealed truth. Of Marian dogmas this Roman Catholic theologian says "The Bible is silent concerning them". We say, if that is so, then abandon them as dogmas necessary to salvation, otherwise the hope of reunion is illusory. As things are it would not be right.

THE NEW BIRTH.

"Born again", "born anew", "born from above",—each of these phrases may represent the words of Our Lord quoted in the Gospel of St. John (3, 3-17). They are taken up in the New Testament in various ways, but in every instance the purpose is plain. Their meaning is that the Christian must have a new nature: must be so transformed as to be "a new creature".

Our Lord said "Ye must . . ." This is an imperative—it lays down a necessity. Yet it remains one of the hard things. It is difficult to bring people to realise that their natures require renovation; that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God"; that though we have been born of the flesh we need to be born of the spirit.

"Except a man be born anew he cannot see the Kingdom of God"—these are Our Lord's words. He also said that unless we become as little children, we shall not share in the Kingdom of heaven (Matt. 18, 3; 19, 14). New life by a fresh start seems to be signified by the phrase "little children"; new life as a new conception of life, with new purposes, ideals, affections, and will, is the requisite for progress in the spiritual Kingdom.

This was obviously the mind of St. Paul who wrote (Rom. 8, 5, "They that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit, the things of the Spirit . . . they that are in the flesh (i.e. subject to the will of the flesh) cannot please God."

Nothing need be added to this to show its necessary character. Even if neither Our Lord nor St. Paul had spoken of necessity, it would have been self-evident, for the Christian life is concerned with God, and He is Spirit, so man, to be in fellowship with God must be "in the Spirit."

If then "we must be born again" the question arises "how"? Well does Scripture say to us that no man hath quickened his own soul. It must be "of God". Scripture shows that it is the work of Tri-une Jehovah. We see that from the following passages:—

1. It is of God—John 1, 13 "As many as received Him, to them gave He the right to become children of God, even to them that believe in His name: which were born, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh, nor of man, but of God." 1 Peter 1, 3. "Blessed be the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to His great mercy begot us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead."

2. It is by Christ—1 John 5, 1. "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God: and whosoever loveth Him that begat loveth Him also that is begotten of Him."

3. It is through the Spirit—the familiar words here are, of course, those we began with—"Except a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God"—John 3, 5.

* * *

How we are born again is thus defined. It is the work of the Holy Trinity: "of the Father who has made us and all the world: of the Son who has redeemed us and all mankind: of the Holy Ghost who sanctifieth us and all the elect people of God" (Church Catechism).

By what means is the next question.

1. By the resurrection of Christ. How do we relate that stupendous fact to the New Birth? In many ways, but primarily by the proof the Resurrection is that Our Lord spoke truth.

Also, that by the Resurrection He is shown to be "the Son of God with power" (Rom. 1.), so what He declared, that He is able to do. And further, the Resurrection is the proof of the reality of that world of Spirit into which we enter by the Resurrection—If risen with Christ we may seek the things which are above where He is at God's right hand. The supremacy and eternity of Spirit, and the present life of the Spirit must be intimately associated with Christ's continued existence in the Spirit even when He had endured death in the flesh (1 Peter 3, 18).

2. By the Word. This is the quickening Word as we see in James 1. 18 "of His own will He brought us forth by the Word of Truth". This Word is the vivifying Word, the eternal Logos. Peter puts it plainly when he says (1 Pet. 1. 18) that we have been "begotten again, not of corruptible seed but of incorruptible, through the Word of God which liveth and abideth."

3. By faith. This factor brings us to the personal responsibility. Admittedly the regeneration of the people of God is the sole work of the Holy Trinity. It is not our doing. But if it is the sole work of God it is not open to people to say that they have no responsibility in the matter, since, if they have faith and repentance and put themselves in the right attitude to receive God's blessings it is not likely that God will withhold His spirit and His grace. Our Saviour said "ask and ye shall receive". He also said that if we are ready to give good gifts to our children, God is even more ready to give the Holy Spirit to those who ask Him.

In 1 John (5. 1.) we have the words we quoted earlier "whosoever believeth . . ." That is the invitation to faith. In another sense it is also the challenge to faith; the challenge to seek the regenerating power of the Spirit.

Our attention has been constantly directed to this matter of "being born again". It is the prevailing theme of evangelistic and revivalistic work in modern times. From Moody to Graham these islands have not been left in ignorance. The revival of 1859 whose history has been well told by J. Edwin Orr ("The Second Evangelical Awakening"), and the "Convention" movement originating in the "Higher Christian Life" programme of Pearsall Smith, and growing into the Keswick Convention and kindred gatherings have kept the doctrine to the fore, as have, of course, the earnest ministers and clergymen of all churches (reformed). We suppose that even if a man believes in baptismal regeneration he does not believe that is the whole extent of the work of the Holy Spirit in the individual Christian life. But what is the benefit, what are the results, of being born again?

The benefits:—

1. A new creation—"made over again", a radical change of heart, disposition, aspiration. St. Paul writes (2 Cor. 5. 17) "If any man is in Christ he is a new creature: the old things are passed away; behold, they are become new." In Galatians (6. 15) he reminds us that racial privileges, and inherited religion avail us nothing. What does count is "a new creature". The real Christian he defines thus (Eph. 2. 10) "We are

His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works which God before prepared, that we should walk in them."

2. New life. This is not a change to new environment or new scenes. Neither is it the mere influx of new ideas or the vista of wider horizons. We may experience all these and yet be unregenerate. It is like passing out of death into life. It is well described in Rom. 6. 4 "We were buried with Him (Christ) through baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life." The change must be within.

3. If new life is a benefit, it expresses itself in a new Spirit. Romans 7. 6 shows the transformation. We no longer pursue the right course as a line of duty, but as a worthwhile and enjoyable vocation. It is worthwhile because it challenges us to bring out our best qualities; and it is enjoyable because it evinces the joy of serving God as His sons. St. Paul's words are "Now we have been discharged from the law, having died to that wherein we were holden; so that we serve in newness of the Spirit, and not in oldness of the letter."

4. The benefit reaches a higher level, for St. Peter tells us that not only are we new creatures, God's handiwork; but there is a rehabilitation of our original state in which we were in the image of God (Gen. 1. 26). In his second epistle St. Peter writes of God's glory and virtue "whereby He hath granted unto us His precious and exceeding great promises, that through these ye may become partakers of the divine nature."

5. In addition, there is "the washing of regeneration" (Titus 3. 5). It is regeneration that washes us; not washing that regenerates us. St. Paul associates this with the renewing in us of the Holy Spirit "poured out upon us richly through Jesus Christ Our Saviour". To be born again is a cleansing experience. It removes not only the defilements of sin but the patina of time and the hardening of experience.

6. The benefits we find in Holy Scripture are great, but are they permanent? We can be sure that in the truly regenerate (who are of course the obedient) they are, if it is remembered that there has to be a continual dew of blessing. St. Paul makes this plain in words of supreme encouragement—"We faint not; but though our outward man is decaying by day yet our inward man is renewed day by day." (2 Cor. 4. 16).

The "inward man" is the Christian personality, destined to survive the dissolution of the flesh, and to be clothed upon with the resurrection body.

7. St. Paul finds the most apt simile for these benefits in "resurrection", or life from the dead. The born-again person is like one who is brought to life. The life of sin is a sort of living death, an imprisonment. By spiritual regeneration a resurrection, so to speak, is affected, an emancipation is won, and in true freedom life becomes a new thing.

We see this in the words we quoted above from Roman 6. 4. We see it also in Ephesians 2. 1. "You did He quicken, when ye were dead through your trespasses and sins," and 5. "Even when we were dead through our trespasses. God quickened us together with Christ, and raised us up with Him."

We see it as well in the epistle to the Colossians (2. 12). "Having been buried with Him in baptism, wherein ye were also raised with Him through faith in the working of God, Col. 3. 1. "If then ye were raised together with Christ, seek the things which are above".

The benefits of spiritual renewal are real. Through the centuries countless Christians have lived "in the Spirit". They have had their failures, their depressions, "the dark night of the Soul", the times of spiritual aridity, the trials of faith and temptations of the devil. But they have known through it all the faithfulness of the promise "My grace is sufficient for thee". The promise, made to St. Paul, has never been restricted to him.

Having so far considered the necessity for the new birth, how it is effected, the means employed, and the benefits which follow, it remains to explore the results. That is, to see what general character the regenerate ought to exhibit, as well as what kind of consciousness of themselves they ought to have.

1. They find a new delight in the law of God. Here the Psalmist is our exemplar. If he in the distant days of the Kings of Israel could rejoice in the Commandments as well as discharge the duty of observing them, the Christian need not consider that because he is "under grace" the obligation of God's commands is relaxed. What the Christian must do is to keep God's law in the spirit Our Lord taught. The Gospel was not given to us to foster antinomianism, but to give us fresh reasons for doing God's Will.

2. We gain through regeneration a deeper knowledge of God. We may know Him in His works and, through the Gospel of the Incarnation, in His love. In the regenerating experience of the Spirit we know God as one with us—see Colossians 3. 10 "Ye have put on the new man which is being renewed unto knowledge after the image of Him that created him" (i.e. the new man).

This is, of course, in a certain sense recovery, for we know the outset, Genesis 1 and the making of man in God's image. The restoration of man is a present experience through the Spirit.

3. A revulsion from sin is another result. We may recoil from some sins from honesty and truthfulness; from others from self-respect and fastidiousness; from others because we do not want to do harm to other people. But through the Spirit those born anew are moving above the levels of commonplace sins. This danger is the more refined sins and their safeguard against them is humility—even the regenerate have "their treasure in earthen vessels". In 1 John (3. 9.) we read "Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin . . . he cannot sin because he is begotten of God." This does not, we think, imply inability to sin, but refusal to sin. The same Apostle tells us that in contrast with the world sunk in sin "we are of God". Our status and our privileges must make sin a wretched thing in our sight.

4. Next we can count on rightness of life. So much in life is thought to be normal because it is well-nigh universal, that the Christian has a task to keep in mind that unregenerate human nature is the thing which is abnormal. The only truly normal humanity, that is, humanity as its author intended it to be, is Christ. The regenerate personality has the ability to be in harmony with the mind and will of God—that is the foundation of the right life, which has no opposition to God in it. Note Ephesians 4. 24 "put on the new man which after God hath been created in righteousness and holiness of life".

5. Victory is the final result of being born again. The victorious life is possible only where the Holy Spirit is in control. Overcoming is the keynote of the messages of St. John to the Seven Churches (see Rev. 1 to 3). In the power of the Spirit, and in surrender to God the victory is ours. It must be, because Our Lord has told us that already He has overcome the world and sin on our behalf.

THE DOUAY BIBLE AGAINST ROME.

Absolution.

(See "Confession and Absolution.").

*Angels.

Angels should not be worshipped.

Matt. iv. 10 . . . God only to be adored.

Col. ii. 18 . . . Cautioned against religion (worship) of Angels.

* Council of Laodicea (A.D. 364) forbids Christians to attend conventicles where Angels were invoked.

- Heb. i. 6 . Angels themselves worship Jesus.
 Apoc. (Rev.)
 xix, 10 . St. John reproved for falling down to an angel.
 „ xxii. 8-9 . St. John again reproved.

*Anointing.

(EXTREME UNCTION.)

Priests anoint as a preparation for death.

Apostles anointed to effect recovery.

Mark vi. 13 . Many anointed and healed.

James v. 14, 15 . Sick to be anointed and prayed over, for recovery.

†Celibacy.

Rome imposes celibacy on her clergy.

Douay Bible imposes no such law.

Matt. viii. 14 . St. Peter a married man.

1 Tim. iii. 2-4 . A Bishop may marry.

Titus i. 5, 6 . A Priest (i.e., Presbyter or Elder) may marry.

1 Tim. iii. 12 . A Deacon may marry.

Heb. xiii. 4 . Marriage honourable in all.

1 Tim. iv. 1-3 . Forbidding to marry, a sign of apostacy.

†Church.

Christ is head of the Church.

Acts iv. 11 . St. Peter says Christ is Head of Church.

1 Cor. iii. 11 . St. Paul says no other foundation but Christ.

Col. i. 18 . In the Church Christ holds the primacy.

Rome claims to be Mother and Mistress of all Churches.

Isaias ii. 3 .

Luke xxiv. 47 . Jerusalem, if any, the Mother Church.

Acts i. 4, 8 .

Gal. iv. 26 . Jerusalem, which is above, our Mother.

No man appointed as head.—See “Peter, supremacy of.”

§Communion.

Rome withholds the Cup from the laity.

Douay Bible intends all Communicants to drink of it.

* The rite of Extreme Unction instituted by Felix IV., Bishop of Rome, about A.D. 528.

† Celibacy of the Clergy enforced by Gregory VII, A.D. 1074; and authoritatively enjoined by First Lateran Council A.D. 1123.

‡ All true believers in Lord Jesus Christ, on earth, constitute the Church.

§ Withholding Cup from laity adopted by Council of Constance, A.D. 1414.

- Matt. xxvi. 27 . Drink ye all of this.
 Mark xiv. 23 . They all drank of the chalice.
 Luke xxii. 17 . The chalice divided among them.

1 Cor. xi. 26 . As oft as you (i.e., all that invoke the name of Jesus, i. 2) shall eat this bread and drink the chalice.

1 Cor. xi. 28 . A man (not a priest merely) to prove himself before drinking of the chalice.

*Confession and Absolution.

Rome requires confession in secret to a Priest.

Douay Bible requires confession to God.

Matt. xi 28 . Come to Me all you that labour and are burdened.

John vi. 37 . Him that cometh to Me, I will not cast out.

EXAMPLES.

2 Kings (2 Sam.)

xxiv. 10 . David confessed to God.

Dan. ix. 4-20 . Daniel confessed to God.

Luke v. 8 . Peter confessed to Christ.

Luke xxiii. 39-41 Dying thief confessed to Christ.

Rome assumes authority to forgive sins.

Douay Bible reserves the power to God.

Psalm cii. (ciii.) The Lord forgiveth all our 3 iniquities.

Isaias xliii. 25 . God blots out our iniquities.

Mark ii. 7 . Who can forgive sins but God only?

Luke xi. 4 . In Lord's Prayer we ask God to forgive us. If he forgive us, why then trouble the priest?

The Apostles never exercised such authority; on the contrary, they pointed the sinner to God for forgiveness, e.g.—

Acts viii. 22 . St. Peter directed Simon the sorcerer to God for forgiveness.

John xx. 23, therefore, meant no more than that the Apostles, as inspired by the Holy Ghost, should be enabled to declare and pronounce in what cases sins were forgiven or retained.

Extreme Unction.

(See “Anointing.”)

†Image Worship.

Rome teaches that images of Christ, of the Vir-

* Public confession changed into private under Leo I in the 5th century.

Auricular confession in secret to a priest first sanctioned under Innocent III in the 13th century.

† Use of images adopted by Second Council of Nice, A.D. 787
 Rome divides the 10th Commandment into two in order to make up the required ten.

gin Mary, and also of other Saints, may be had and retained, and that due honour and veneration are to be given them.

Douay Bible condemns such a practice.

Exodus xx. 4-6. 2nd Commandment forbids images.

Deut. iv. 15, 16. Israelites reminded that they saw no similitude in Horeb lest they might be deceived into making a graven similitude.

Deut. iv. 23, 24. Images forbidden even to be made.

„ xvi. 22 Statues hated by God.

„ xxvii. 15 Cursed be the man that maketh a graven or molten thing.

John iv. 24. Spiritual worship required by God.

Exod. xxxii. 20 Molten calf ground to powder by Moses.

xii. 28-30. Jeroboam's golden calves an occasion of sin.

4 Kings

xxviii. 4. Brazen serpent destroyed by Hezekiah.

Rome, in some of her Catechisms, entirely omits, and in others cuts short, the 2nd Commandment given in Exodus xxi. 4-6, and Deut. v. 8-10. Her responsibility is great.

Deut. iv. 2. We are neither to add to nor take from God's Word.

„ xii. 32. Neither add anything nor diminish.

“In Exodus xx. 5, the Hebrew verb shachah, “strictly means to bow or prostrate one's self, “and only secondarily comes to mean worship or “adoration, and is translated bow down in the “Douai Version of Genesis xlii. 6, speaking of “Joseph's brethren's obeisance towards him.” (Littledale's “Plain Reasons,” p. 39, footnote). See also notes (Douay Bible) on Genesis xxiii; xxxvii. 10.

Roman Catholics therefore even in bowing down to images transgress the 2nd Commandment.

That Roman-Image Worship is Idolatrous. (See Littledale's “Plain Reasons,” p. 40.)

*Indulgences.

Indulgences are remissions from temporal punishment for sin, either here or in purgatory.

* Indulgences in the primitive Church were relaxations from temporal penalties inflicted by the Church on those who had been guilty of sins, whether public or private.

Indulgences in the Roman Church are wholly different and date from about the 11th century.

Grants of Indulgences are drawn from a store or treasury of merit of Christ, and of his saints, alleged to be at the disposal of the Church. “Anyone who obtains an Indulgence can apply its merits to himself, or transfer it to some other, living or dead.”

Douay Bible opposed to such teaching, since it declares against necessity of

(a) Purgatory. (See “Purgatory.”)

(b) Merits of Christ being supplement by merits of Saints.

Heb. ix. 12. By His own blood He obtained eternal redemption.

„ x. 14. He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.

Saints can claim no merit and consequently cannot give to the Church what they don't possess.

Luke xvii. 10. Unprofitable even after we have done all that is commanded us.

Romans iii. 12. None that doeth good, not so much as one.

Even had they merit it would not avail for others.

2 Cor. v. 10. Each will receive according as he hath done.

Apoc. (Rev.) xxii. 12. Christ will render to every man according to his works.

*Infallibility.

Rome claims infallibility. It is now (1870) stated to be in the pope personally.

Douay Bible discloses the infallible guide.

Psalm cxviii. “Thy Word” a lamp to my (cxix.) 105, 130 feet.

Jeremias xvii. 5. Cursed be the man that trusteth in man.

„ xvii. 7. Blessed be the man that trusteth in the Lord.

John xvii. 17. Thy Word is truth.

John xvi. 13. Holy Spirit will teach us all truth.

Luke xi. 13. Holy Spirit given to those who ask.

* Infallibility of the Church adopted about A.D. 1076.

LINGUISTIC MISSIONARIES.

One of the most heartening and powerful movements toward the prospect of a better world is the spread of Bible translations in many tongues. This movement operates 24 hours a day but gets little publicity.

Nowhere, perhaps, are its activities more evident than among the primitive peoples of the South Pacific, the stirring nations of tomorrow.

Not all these dedicated teachers and scholars are westerners. The writer recalls a very interesting meeting a few years ago with a South Seas chief, a big, broad-shouldered, upstanding man with a fine face and a great mop of hair characteristic of South Sea islanders.

This chief was busy translating the King James Bible so that his people might read it in their own tongue, a task of translation requiring years of patient industry and no mean degree of scholarship.

In the Pacific area such scholars face a truly colossal task. In this vast region there are over 400 languages, most of them restricted to small tribal societies.

In some South Seas territories, such as New Guinea, these languages vary from valley to valley simply, because these superstition-ridden peoples seldom dare to venture beyond the ram-parts that enclose them.

Nor has every valley been discovered or penetrated by whites, even to-day. In a remote valley in Netherlands New Guinea, an American missionary expedition recently discovered a tribe believed to be one of the most primitive in the world. The only animals the tribe had domesticated were pigs and dogs. They knew nothing of pottery, metal-working, or weaving.

When such a "lost" tribe is discovered, this means, for missionaries, getting busy on yet another special translation of the Scriptures.

When this multiplicity of tongues is appreciated, it is possible to understand why progress toward a more modern way of life among the primitive peoples of the South Pacific often seems so slow when compared with other regions, such as Africa.

One of the most active organisations to bring the Bible to primitive peoples in this part of the world is the Pacific Christian Literature Society, a Protestant interdenominational body formed in 1942 by the National Missionary Council of Australia.

The aim of the P.C.L.S. is to provide Christian literature in native languages, as well as in simple English, and to encourage natives to write in their own language. P.C.L.S. considered that once having taught Pacific peoples to read, it was the moral responsibility of western civilisation to provide them with suitable literature.

P.C.L.S. has produced and distributed eight publications in 13 languages. Representative translations are "Selections from St. Matthew's Gospel," in the Gin Sangara language of New Guinea; a "Life of Christ Jesus" in Motu, and "Pilgrim's Progress" in the Muka-wan language, both spoken in Papua.

A notable publication is a leaflet entitled "Christian or Communist," which has been published in Fijian, Tongan, Rotuman, Kuanua, Indonesian, and Cantonese. An edition of this leaflet in Telugu, for the Indians of Fiji, is in hand, as well as one in Hindi.

The British High Commissioner for Malaya, which territory has suffered the ravages of Communist attack for seven years or more, is interested in having the leaflet translated and distributed in that country.

The vital role which such literature can play in defeating Communist influence was recently emphasized by Sir Anthony Abell, Governor of Sarawak in British Borneo. Sir Anthony pointed to the amount of Communist literature directed to Sarawak youth and said that "healthy literature and better information" were among the "weapons of attack which we are using against Communism."

P.C.L.S. is now working in close co-operation with the South Pacific Commission Literature Bureau, an international organisation sponsored by the United States, Britain, France, the Netherlands, Australia, and New Zealand. The two organisations co-operate in the publication and distribution of literature suitable for South Seas people, but not confined to religious subjects.

A feature of P.C.L.S. activities is the competition it sponsors among native writers for contributions in the vernacular. But in P.C.L.S. opinion, much more literature is needed to light the path of knowledge and more labourers are needed in this vast South Seas vineyard—A. E. Norman in "Christian Science Monitor," 15/10/54.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 15

Africa. Dr. Frank Laubach is spending December and January in West Pakistan. He and his team are starting a new literacy programme for the Sinds. For the first time, literature is being prepared in the Sind language. Literacy campaigns have been arranged in areas where Punjabi and Urdu are spoken. It is estimated that 60 million people have learned to read by this method in 250 languages—"S.G.M. Bulletin," Jan., 1955.

"Science Getting Out Of Hand"—Universities To Blame?

Dr. Eris Ashby, Vice-Chancellor of Queen's University, Belfast, said yesterday that the death of a Japanese fisherman in September from the effects of the dust of a hydrogen bomb experiment was the symbol of science getting out of hand. A few score of such experiments would leave unpredictable death drifting about the world. "Is it possible," he asked, "that his death marks the turning of the tide which will end in nature's conquest of man?"

Dr. Ashby, who was addressing graduates at the winter graduation ceremony, said: "Whether this incident is just another accident or is a turning point—the last turning point—in man's history we cannot yet say. But we certainly do not over-dramatise the situation if we see in it a symbol of science getting out of hand. For that is indeed what happened.

Since, he said, the hydrogen bomb had been designed by graduates, and could not have been designed without them, and since it was a direct outcome of academic research, no university could escape the implications of the death of that Japanese fisherman. "There is no obvious scapegoat, yet I wonder whether universities should not bear some of the responsibility for his death: for they supply, not only scientists and the technologists, but the civil servants and economic advisers, and many of the politicians.

The decisions these men make, he continued, were limited by their education: there was no doubt that the courses leading to a degree "can confer power without a corresponding sense of responsibility: a knowledge of means without a corresponding understanding of ends."—"Manchester Guardian," 17/12/54.

As In England, So In Tibet.

In the history of the Bible in our own land, it is well known that Caedmon, a herdsman at the monastery at Whitby, rendered the Bible story in rhymes which his fellows could remember and understand; he had been taught passages from Scripture by learned men of the monastery. Something of the same sort has been done in Tibet. In the pure classical form of that language, a Moravian missionary, Elijah Tsetan Puntsok, has written some Christian poems. One of these, eighty stanzas of adoration depicting the life of Christ, is said to be of true beauty. Buddhists like to read it, as the style and language are to their taste.

The Gospel By Gramophone Now!

What seems to be yet another fresh way of getting the message of the Gospel across to the unsaved is indicated by the announcement of phonographic records, provided by "Gospel Recordings," of California. These are being used in open-air work in Belgium—"S.G.M. Bulletin," Jan., 1955.

Bible Societies All Over The World.

It may not be generally known that there are at least twenty-four Bible Societies at work in the world—that is, societies which exist for the express purpose of translating, producing, and circulating the Holy Scriptures. That is the number given in "The Bible Translator," a most interesting and valuable quarterly concentrating on the work of translation. Beginning with the parent society the B.F.B.S., there are now others at work in America, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Iceland, Ireland, India, Pakistan, and Ceylon, Indonesia, Japan, Korea, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, as well as various countries in the British Commonwealth.

The Languages of the Pacific.

There are no fewer than 400 different languages spoken in the Pacific, many not written down until the arrival of Christian traders and missionaries. The Pacific Christian Literature Society is providing suitable Christian and secular literature.

—And of South America.

A linguistic miracle has made Latin America an exceptional field for literature. Out of approximately 160 million people, at least 100 million speak Spanish, and in Brazil 50 million speak Portuguese. The remaining 10 million use aboriginal languages, the chief being Quechua, into one regional dialect of which the New Testament is now being translated.

The Sikhs in India.

The Sikh population of India is variously estimated at 7 million to 11 million; probably the former figure is correct. It is dwindling, and it is thought that by the end of the century it will have disappeared altogether, being absorbed by the Hindus. Their language is Punjabi, written in Gurmukhi script. The symbols of the Sikh faith are the unshorn hair and beard, the sword, steel bangle, and comb. They have a Holy Book, the Granth Sahib.

Ireland for Christ. That is the Vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

"Decision Without Reasons"—A Catholic Criticism.

Wisely the Council of Christians and Jews is saying nothing about the reasons for the recent resignation of Cardinal Griffin, one of its four presidents, and of all its Roman Catholic officers and members. But the Roman Catholic weekly press makes it clear that efforts are being made to remove whatever difficulties have led to the resignations.

"We trust," says the "Tablet," "that it is possible to restate, and if necessary to limit the aims of the council in such a way as to satisfy the Catholic conscience and that then the resignations may be withdrawn."

"The Tablet" goes on to regret that there should not have been private discussions between the different parties before Cardinal Griffin and the other Catholic officers of the council resigned their positions. If these had taken place before and there had been a reconciliation "no harm would have been done," but "if unhappily the differences proved profound, and the Holy Office find it necessary to break the connection, the reasons should have been stated, and stated carefully and fully, after consultation with people who know the kind of language which would be understood and cogent in England. This is something which we think the English-speaking Catholics in particular are entitled to suggest."

General Policy.

The article then goes on to say that "decisions without reasons are far removed from the spirit of government in this country. The article notes also that it is only in this country that Catholics have been asked to withdraw from work of this kind and "the face of the Holy Office is not resolutely set against any Catholic participation in societies which associate Catholics with men of other faiths. If it is not the principle of association that is disapproved of, it must be particular writings or speeches under the auspices of the council in this country."

Another Catholic periodical, the "Universe," also regrets in a leading article this week that the resignations have been found necessary, and makes a point of congratulating the secretary of the council, the Rev. W. W. Simpson, a Methodist minister, on the way he has worked. It adds that "it is not the fault of Mr. Simpson if the council has sometimes been used as a platform for preaching doctrines unacceptable to Catholics."

Reference to Ulster in Oxford Union Debate—Power of R.C. Church discussed.

The Oxford Union carried by 339 votes to 13 a motion declaring "that the world would be a better place without the political power and influence of the Roman Catholic Church".

The principal speakers in the debate were Dr. Marie Stopes, the well-known advocate of birth control, and Father Joseph Christie, S.J.

Dr. Stopes declared that the Roman Catholic Church was determined, by its very constitution, to become the only religion, and to destroy every other religion. In the course of that attempt it

BUNYAN'S GREAT BOOK
INSPIRED BY THE BIBLE.

In his authoritative work, "History of the English People", John Richard Green has this to say of "The Pilgrim's Progress", written by John Bunyan in Bedford gaol:

The book had only just been completed when the Indulgence set Bunyan free. Its publication was the earliest result indeed of his deliverance, and the popularity which it enjoyed from the first proves that the religious sympathies of the English people were still mainly Puritan. Before Bunyan's death in 1638 ten editions of the "Pilgrim's Progress" had already been sold; and though even Cowper hardly dared to quote it a century later for fear of moving a smile in the polite world about him its favour among the middle classes and the poor has grown steadily from its author's day to our own.

It is now the most popular and the most widely known of all English books. In none do we see more clearly the new imaginative force which had been given to the common life of Englishmen by their study of the Bible. Its English is the simplest and homeliest English which has ever been used by any great English writer; but it is the English of the Bible. The images of the "Pilgrim's Progress" are the images of the prophet and evangelist; it borrows for its tenderer outbursts the very verse of the Song of Songs and pictures the Heavenly City in the words of the Apocalypse.

But so completely has the Bible become Bunyan's life that one feels its phrases as the natural expression of his thoughts. He has lived in the Bible till its words have become his own. He has lived among its visions and voices of heaven till all sense of possible reality has died away. He tells his tale with such a perfect naturalness that allegories become living things, that the Slough of Despond and Doubting Castle are as real to us as places we see every day, that we know Mr. Legality and Mr. Wordly Wiseman as if we had met them in the street.

It is in this amazing reality of impersonation that Bunyan's imaginative genius specially displays itself. But this is far from being his only excellence. In its range, in its directness, in its simple grace, in the ease with which it changes from lively dialogue to dramatic action, from simple pathos to passionate earnestness, in the subtle and delicate fancy which often suffuses its childlike words, in its playful humour, its bold character-painting, in the even and balanced power which passes without effort from the Valley of the Shadow of Death to the land "where the Shining Ones commonly walked because it was on the borders of heaven", in its sunny kindness unbroken by one bitter word, the "Pilgrim's Progress" is among the noblest of English poems.

For if Puritanism had first discovered the poetry which contact with the spiritual world awakes in the meanest souls Bunyan was the first of the Puritans who revealed this poetry to the outer world. The journey of Christian from the City of Destruction to the Heavenly City is simply a record of the life of such a Puritan as Bunyan himself, seen through an imaginative haze of spiritual idealism in which its commonest incidents are heightened and glorified. He is himself the pilgrim who flies from the City of Destruction, who climbs the hill Difficulty, who faces Apollyon, who sees his loved ones across the river of Death towards the Heavenly City, and how, because "the hill on which the City was framed was higher than the clouds, they therefore went up through the region of air, sweetly talking as they went."—"The Sentinel".

GREEK ORTHODOXY NOT "SCHISMATIC".

From the ranks of the Greek Orthodox Church come the following observations in the form of a letter to the Editor of the "Converted Catholic" magazine, signed by G. Procos, of Los Angeles, California. While use of the word "schismatic" must always be considered as relative, the letter presents such an admirable synopsis of the Greek position to-day that we have chosen to print it in its entirety:

For the sake of justice, please allow me an objection to the term "schismatic" appearing in your article in the last edition of your valuable magazine in reference to the Greek Orthodox Church. . . .

Christianity was born in the East, and Greek was the language of the Scriptures and of the early services of the Church. The Greeks were also the first to accept Christianity. These early communities and Hellenized converts constitute the original body of the Church of Christ in the East. But even the Church of Rome, and the Church in the West, generally, was predominantly Greek during the first two centuries of its existence. It was in the fourth century that Latin began to supplant Greek as the language of the Christian Church in the West.

These facts are emphasized here because the shaping and spreading of Christianity are attributed directly to them and not to Rome.

It was Greek thought and philosophy which created the doctrines and the theological structure of Christianity, and the Greek language that made possible its spread among the people of the Mediterranean and the Middle East.

At the present day it is best, perhaps, to state at the outset that doctrinal belief of the Greek and the Roman churches are identical, except for the word "filioque", which Rome added to the creed in 599 at Toledo, without the sanction of an ecumenical council, and it was the first cause of the Roman Schism. Other differences between the two churches are to be found in their practises and ritual and in the organization—all later Roman additions.

The Roman Church has undergone a profound transformation, especially under the domination of the Jesuits, beginning with the sixteenth century, whereas the Greek Church has resisted innovations and remained steadfast to the traditions of the Patristic Era. So you may judge which is the schismatic.

The most important of these differences are as follows:

The Greek church does not acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope in spiritual matters; it does not grant indulgences; it rejects the idea of a purgatory; uses leavened bread in the Eucharist; forbids the use of graven images in the church; permits its priests to marry; and confirmation is performed by the priest immediately after baptism.

The Greek Orthodox Church has no central "divine" authority with unquestioned and absolute monarchical powers. The Greek Church is rather a federation of five patriarchs and a varying number of national and autocephalous churches. The five Patriarchs are those of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem and Moscow, and they are all equal and independent.

Each Patriarch is supreme within his own jurisdiction, but all are within the jurisdiction of an ecumenical synod. The supremacy of Constantinople is nominal and was due to the supremacy of the city as the new capital of the Eastern Roman empire and later of the Byzantine empire. It was merely a primacy of honour, as was also the title of "ecumenical", which dates from the early sixth century.

This mark of distinction was fully merited also by the noble record of a galaxy of great Patriarchs. It was never translated into any special rights or powers, and as a primacy of honour it is still respected by the different orthodox churches, despite the decline of the See of Constantinople in our days.

The autocephalous churches to-day (1952)—for it must be remembered that their organization changes with political readjustments—are those of Mount Sinai, Island of Cyprus, Greece, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Albania, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Finland, and the youngest one: North and South America, which is autocephalous since 1927. Each uses its national language in the liturgy, according to the original policy of the Greek Orthodox Church. All these churches are in full communion with one another, and all of them accept the decrees of the first seven ecumenical councils, but reject all the later ones.

The three other (rightly called "schismatic") Eastern Churches are the Armenian, the Nestorian, and the Coptic or Ethiopian, with their national subdivisions. Of these, the Armenian and the Coptic accept only the first three councils, while the Nestorian churches accept only the first two. It was during the bitter Christological disputes that these churches receded from the Mother Church, but without loss of communion, an example of the democratic and tolerant spirit which generally characterizes the Greek Orthodox Church.

A CONVERSION TO ROME.

We wonder if any of our readers in the West of Scotland or in the outer Hebrides have met or heard of Miss Daphne Pochin Mould. She has written a book, an auto-biography and story of how she turned Roman Catholic.

A native of the South of England, and at an early stage a very tepid member of the Church of England, she studied geology in Edinburgh and explored the Highlands and islands. Captured by the Celtic place-names and general romanticism (which we think accorded ill with her much boasted scientific scepticism) she settled in Scotland near Lough Ness and became a Scottish nationalist. Later, in spite of the insisted-upon scepticism she became a Roman Catholic.

The book "The Rock of Truth" is, under the circumstances, a self-conscious personal study. We find in it much appreciation of Scottish landscape, very well described, and also some geological information which is interesting in itself. But naturally the chief interest is the self-portrait of the authoress. Her early background was, in religion, the Church of England. In that period she seems to have acquired very little intelligent understanding of her Church or of its faith. Possibly she was not very teachable in these matters: young people often are like that. For instance she says "I suddenly realised that I was in the Church of England, and that only the Church of Rome has either the power or the inclination to canonise you after you are dead."

This is followed by a further assumption which must have been made after turning Roman Catholic years later—"Every saint in the Church of England Calendar is a Roman Catholic saint: in every case the guarantee of their sanctity, our certainty that they are in heaven and friends of God, is given by the Pope of Rome." We have in hand the Calendar of the Church of England, so it is an easy matter to check up on this assertion (and on the knowledge behind it)—In Advent we meet with St. Andrew—What is Roman Catholic about him? Do we not regard him and the other ten apostles as vouched for by Our Lord Jesus Christ, not by the Pope? They are all in the Calendar. So is St. Paul. What Pope has vouched for him? We note Antony of Egypt, Polycarp, John Chrysostom, the Blessed Virgin Mary, David of Wales, Patrick, George, Athanasius, Basil, Mary Magdalene, Anne, John Baptist, Cyprian, Ninian, of these we can scarcely say that they owe their status to the Pope, for many of them belong to the Eastern Churches, and several to Palestine in the days of Our Lord, and some to the Celtic Churches. Many naturally are far older in their reputation for sanctity than the ecclesiastical and legal procedure which is called canonisation.

How many saints of the Celtic Churches were canonised at Rome? Columba of Iona who figures in later pages of "The Rock of Truth", Patrick, and numerous others in Scotland and Ireland in whose names Churches were dedicated owe nothing to Rome.

Having "power" or "inclination" to canonise means nothing at all really. Only the Holy Spirit can make a Saint (i.e. a true Christian), and all of us are called to be saints, as Scripture tells us. The sanctity of members of the Church of England or Ireland or Scotland, or of other Churches, or of Rome or of Eastern Orthodoxy is neither proved, nor increased by legislation. If a Church desists from making a distinction among Christians which has no warrant in the New Testament it is not displaying its fraudulent or heretical character, but its proper rights. However, the writer says she was ten or twelve when she worked this out.

Later, asking a Church of England clergyman about the survival of the soul after death, she put the question "how do you know that we won't go out like blown candles at death"? The answer was "if we do, I'll not know anything about it; and if we don't, you'll get the surprise of your life." This seemed to her "the old Anglican Conpromise" that can allow several different contrary theories to exist side by side. "Indeed I could have crossed the road to the (Roman) Catholic presbytery and may be got the answers to my questions then and there." That seems to be the trouble very often. Instead of appreciating the fact that in many profound issues of life and death we have to depend on Faith, and forego certainty at the present, she wanted a firm answer. The fact that Rome gives answers of a positive kind is no guarantee that they are the right ones. That is something the writer does not appear to have faced. She says that the Anglican clergyman laughed and made fun of her. Much later she says (p. 116) that the Church of England friends faced by her questions had come to a dead halt or tried to bluff "by snarling or sneering". These emotive words are regrettable, especially as coming from one who tells us (p. 130) that in religious discussion which she began with a Roman Catholic clergyman "I was on the point of slapping his face"!

She wanted to learn about Roman Catholicism in order to refute the Christian faith as a whole.

She sought information from a monk near her Scottish home, and seemed astonished that a reasonable case could be made for the Christian faith. Ignorant of philosophy and theology, she followed the logic of the monk's arguments. There seems to be no sign that she had sufficient critical faculty when the arguments went on from general Christian Apologetics to Roman dogmas. She just accepted the whole thing as a continuum.

The trouble with Ph.D's is often that they are too sure of themselves, too self-confident. We know the dangers here, and the authoress, in spite of telling us how sure she was, was in fact off the ground (geology) she understood.

Take, for instance, her approach to church history, on page 133 it is set out naïvely. She says "by all ordinary tests the Church ought to have come to an end a dozen or more times. She ought to have been stamped out by the early persecutions; she ought to have been overwhelmed by every vigorous heresy—at the very least she ought to have been destroyed by the wickedness of her own members. But the odd thing is that the Church survived." To the student of Church history these are strange conclusions. We can think of no adequate justification for them. Another strange conjecture is put forward, and then used as proof of Rome's case—"one would expect that some of the more notorious popes might have made some alteration in her dogmas—that the sinner would try to use his official position as head of the Church to put himself in the right and justify wrong doing." This is a very quaint sort of "evidence" for a scientific worker to put forward. It is an even stranger ground for leading up to a conversion. The sinner in the Church in the past is the same as the sinner in the Church to-day—he just disregards the precept he breaks, and thus shows that he doesn't take things as seriously as the votaries and fanatics and puritans do. It may be regrettable, but it is human frailty and has nothing to do with the survival of the Church. No one we ever heard of expected Pope Alexander VI to try to abrogate the Ten Commandments. He was content to break them. After all, he and others like him could always go to confession and obtain absolution.

The conclusion was based largely, we gather, on the reading of Roman Catholic works.

Under the influence of the Celtic past and the Roman present it was discovered that the Roman liturgy is beautiful. "Protestant services had always sickened one in that they never managed to reflect God's beauty and wonder." "If the Roman Church could produce that sort of a liturgy, it was in possession of the truth about God." We might ask at this point if the writer had any acquaintance with the liturgies of the Eastern Churches from which Rome had learnt both liturgy and theology. They might be credited with possession of the truth about God as well.

The standard of historical understanding may be shown by the sentence we quote from page 145 "The Celtic Church was as Roman Catholic as the Roman Catholics are to-day". A study of "The Independence of the Celtic Church" by the present Bishop of Down (published some twenty years ago) or a study of Dr. Duke's "The Columban Church" might have helped to a more reasonable outlook.

Again, we find the statement that the Church of England after the Reformation added to its Prayer Book "her own new ideas". The fact is that Rome's new ideas were left out of the Prayer Book, rather than that new ideas were introduced.

In keeping with all this there is generally an attitude of hostility to Scottish religious observance. All through, the Roman Catholic islands and communities are described in more inviting terms than the others. The disapproval of the Scottish minister is always assumed—for instance, on a sail to Mingulay the authoress has in the company a Roman Catholic clergyman. She has to say "The party was a pleasant one, and the Canon did not have the damping effect that a Presbyterian minister would have had" All the time the Protestant clergymen, English or Scottish are scornfully regarded, and the Romans admired. There must be an interesting psychological as well as theological explanation here.

A very interesting account of the period of instruction in Roman Catholic teaching is given. Of course much of it is basic Christianity common to other communions, for Miss Mould had at no time, as far as we can judge, any grasp of Christian truth. She is not to be regarded as in any sense a convert from Protestantism or the Church of England, but from unbelief, so her experiences of instruction and progress are the most valuable part of the book, and are told with liveliness and literary competence, even if the spirit of the work is unfortunately prejudiced, and therefore unable to do justice to other creeds.

In an interview with an Edinburgh priest (a Dominican) Miss Mould complained that she was being driven into being a "Catholic". "Who's driving you"? he asked. "I explained that I had been argued into the position; I could not reject what could be shown to be true." There we would completely disagree. The defect in Miss Mould's spirit of enquiry seemed to be a neglect of the many learned and conclusive answers to Roman Catholic dogmas. She knew the anti-Christian position, but apparently did not make a study of the Protestant teaching.

She seems to have been convinced of the truth of Christianity by Roman Catholic teachers, and so to have assumed that the Roman is the only genuine Christianity. That was in 1951.

Over in Ireland six months later she was struck with "the uproarious gaiety of the Irish people", and speculated about its being due to their faith—the visitor's first impression about Ireland ought to be received with indulgence. We here question the reality of that uproarious gaiety. It is too often an act put on for the benefit of the Sassenach. The "dourly glum" Celt of the Presbyterian islands is a commonplace in Roman Catholic Ireland too. She climbed Croagh Patrick, and writes so vivid a description that one feels almost as if one had accompanied her. Celtic legend and Celtic romance combine with the Roman faith some Celtic peoples now profess, to create a magic world for a South of England woman to explore. The charm of the Celtic twilight is inextricably woven with religious doctrine, and rapture comes.

It is a pity that a persistent distortion of the Protestant outlook is given. On page 214 we read "By all good Protestants Jesuits and Dominicans are supposed to be the very blackest sheep of an already black flock". This is one instance. We regard ourselves as very good Protestants. We have every reason to respect much that is associated with both of these religious orders, while at the same time believing that the creed they profess in common with all their co-religionists is erroneous. Any one acquainted with the New Testament studies of Fr. Lagrange of the Dominican Order, for example, must feel obliged to him. Similarly, much historical and scientific work of Jesuits commands respect. There are of course religious and social policies any informed Protestant is bound to protest against. But it is not essential to Protestantism to attribute deliberate faults to any body of men.

So this part of the record ends. It is a very valuable well-written story. It is irritating in many ways, not because of its Roman Catholicism, but because of its author's outlook. We wish the book contained more about the rocks of the Hebrides and Western Ireland; but we must remember its title is "The Rock of Truth". What she was told, what she learnt, and what she concluded would not, we fear, convince us. We, if we met her, would say with Fr. Connellan "Hear the other side", or with Oliver Cromwell "Consider that you may be mistaken"!

EDITOR'S CHAIR

MARXISM TO-DAY.

When we say "Marxism To-day" we are speaking of the actual facts of the Marxist situation. We refer to the practice of Marxist doctrines, and therefore recognise that the pure theory of Marx's teaching necessarily changes in its applied form. The passage of time inevitably modifies all forms of human thought; while the impact of life upon any theory must change it in varying degrees. The result is that Marxism in use differs from Marxism on paper. Marxism put to the test of thirty years' experiment in the twentieth century is not in all respects the same as Marxism thought out in the Reading Room of the British Museum in the second half of the nineteenth century.

To claim that Marxism to-day should be completely identical with the abstract principles and opinions of Marx is foolish, for if we do make such a claim we are not only fastening a dead hand upon a living organism but we are advocating a kind of infallibility in Marx which is almost pontifical.

We proclaim ourselves to be Christian, but we include much in Christianity which its Founder did not command or suggest. We have practical applications of Gospel principles suited, as we believe, to our circumstances. We do not assert that these applications are wrong things, but that they are consonant with the will and purpose of Our Lord. So with the Marxists or Communists —they have evolved in Eastern Europe and Asia working systems of social life and government inspired by Marxist Teaching. At times the views of the majority have been challenged by a minority claiming that it more faithfully reproduces the mind of the Leader (of the Trotskyists). The question is: do these systems justify their claim to be Marxian-Socialist systems? Why should we appeal from them to Marx himself as though, if we had genuine Marxism, every thing would be alright and we could all shake hands, and tell each other we have all been saying the same things, only in slightly different ways? If the founder of Marxian Socialism were to appear in Europe in mid-twentieth century would he recoil from the Soviet system, failing to recognise it as the embodiment of his plans, or would he accept it as proof of his skill as a social-economist? We think he would quickly appreciate the differences as the inevitable outcome of the practical experience. He was not a fool, and could recognise that his interpretations of history and programme for the future must adapt themselves to the possibilities of any given situation in order that they may pursue the policy of moulding a new order, and evolving the classless society based on materialism. More than one generation might be called to endure the dictatorship of the proletariat before the needed transformation of society has been achieved.

If the dictatorship of the proletariat is necessary, then the means taken to bring that dictatorship into being are necessary. The means taken to continue it are also regarded as necessary, until it has done what it set out to do. That is normal procedure as foreseen by Marx.

We take the view, then, that it is useless and foolish to claim that one can correct Communist practice and "distortion" of Marxism by reference to Marx's writings. It is difficult to see that Marxists in our day could have taken any other course to introduce the Communist state than they have done. The intrigues, the deceptions, the illegalities, the craftiness, the brutalities, the murders, all combine into the necessary steps to transfer political and economic power from the middle classes and the capitalists to the "proletariat". It was well understood by Marx that the ruling capitalist classes would not surrender power without a struggle, and that the victors, "the class-conscious workers", could not retain the power without constant watchfulness and contingent ruthlessness. The "Revolution" had to be achieved by force, and has to be defended by force until the ultimate purpose of a classless Godless human society is fulfilled.

In Marxism one very important point which we see illustrated to-day is the replacement of the individual by "collectives". That is, man is not considered in himself, but in relation to his fellows as a means of production. From the Christian stand point this is a fundamentally wrong attitude, for the Christian is an individual, a person, and redeemed as a person and not as a collective entity. The Gospel precepts reveal true human society as persons redeemed by Christ and united by love. Hostility to churches is a far smaller thing than hostility to the redeemed personality. The Christian holds that man is made in the image of God. The Communist holds that there is no God, and therefore no image, and no preciousness of personality.

Since personality means little or nothing, the "liquidation" of a class is not thought of as a crime against God, or against humanity. It is a stage in the fulfilment of a policy and a programme. If Marx outlined the policy and defined the objective, it falls to practical men to devise the methods of accomplishment without compunction or scruple. If challenged on humanitarian grounds we imagine they could answer that they work in the interests of humanity in the widest sense, and not in the interests of any single section. Thus the individual or class may be victimised for the purpose of advancing the wider concerns of the whole people.

That we are right in our view that present day Communism is not a repudiation of Marxism is, we think, confirmed by the following passage which we quote from the recently published "Marxism: Past and Present" by R. N. Carew Hunt (London, Geoffrey Bles, 1954)—"Neither Marx nor Engels were at sufficient pains to define the terms they used or, if they did so, to stick to their definitions; so that we find Marx devoting the three great volumes of his Capital to analysing the concept of value without ever making clear what he meant by it. Nor is this all. With the passage of time their early revolutionary writings became outdated by events, as they themselves occasionally admitted yet they made little attempt to restate their doctrine, and allowed it to be understood that in its main lines it still held good. The form which Lenin was to give to it, and which Stalin inherited, was naturally influenced by the problems raised by the October revolution (1917 overthrow of Tsarism), and by Communists in all countries. Yet it was a legitimate interpretation of principles, which has never been disavowed. That their application should have led to a police state is only what might have been expected, though it is doubtful whether, at the time of the revolution, Lenin and the other Bolshevik leaders foresaw this development or intended it to take place."

"The legitimate interpretation of principles" is the real point. Both Lenin and Stalin carried the theories of Marx into practice, and fitted them to the immediate and concrete situation they had created in revolutionary Russia. Their experience led them to believe that the same plan would hold good elsewhere. The classless society of Marxism is not achieved when brought about in Russia. It has to be brought about everywhere the world over. Only then is it safe and secure anywhere. Hence it can never be enough to have the Communist state in Russia alone. To be secure there it must be established in the countries on its borders—hence the Communist control of East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Yugoslavia, China. But these in turn need safeguarding on their borders, so that we have active underground Communist movements in West Germany, and above ground ones in Italy, France, etc. South-East Asia is in the picture as well as Central Europe. The world revolution is aimed at, for without it the Communist cause is nowhere confident of its permanence.

Mr. Carew Hunt's book is one of the most valuable present-day works on Marxism. Not the least important part is the study he gives of the basis of Marxist teaching in the philosophy of Hegel and Feuerbach. Mr. Hunt rejects the view that Engels, Marx's chief collaborator, and Lenin, his greatest disciple failed to understand Marx's theory of knowledge and mind. He thinks it more likely that they both defended materialism as the basis of Marx's system, but did not wish to assert too much about mind, as conclusions embarrassing to them might be drawn from it.

F. Engels, Marx's fellow-worker, wrote once "Marx has proved that the whole of previous history is a history of class struggles, that in all the simple and complicated political struggles the only thing at issue has been the social and political rule of social classes and the conquest of domination by newly arising classes." He goes on to say "To what do these classes owe their origin and continued existence? They owe it to the particular material, physically sensible conditions in which society at a given period produces and exchanges its means of subsistence."

Thus, history is identified with, and explained by the struggle of the classes. It does not mean that men always knew what they were really doing. Marx probably held that the religious interests of the Reformation acted as a veil upon the underlying economic motives; that men did not realise the inner significance of their struggles and the changes which followed.

To sustain his case Marx had to simplify, to the extent of making the situation a false one, the character of society by ignoring the various classes, and reducing them all to two, one which owns, and one which does not own, the means of production. This excessive simplification, this "Marxism analysis" of society, is faithfully followed by modern disciples. We see it, for example, in A. Leontiev's "Political Economy" (English edition, ed. Elizabeth Donnelly, Moscow, 1933). This had been the central theme of the famous "Communist Manifesto" of 1848. This little book or pamphlet rather, has expressed the central ideas of Marx for all his disciples. Indeed their writings may be fitly compared to Christian commentaries on the Gospels. For the Marxist the "manifesto" is their gospel upon which all Communist literature is commentary. How misleading this can be is shown by the definition of "proletariat" Engels gave in a note in the English translation of the "manifesto"—the proletariat is "the class of modern wage-labourers who, having no means of their own, are reduced to selling their labour-power in order to live". We may note the skilful use of the words "reduced to", as if to imply that it is a dire hardship that a man must work for a living. The bourgeois or middle-class, however, must generally work for their living or starve like the proletariat. The Victorian governess was reduced to selling her abilities in order to live. The lawyer or physician or bank-clerk, is doing exactly the same. Thus the class problem reduced so easily to two is as a result falsified. The wage-earners spread through many classes of society, and even the manual workers of the age of the industrial revolution are nowadays replaced largely by those who are technicians, and concerned with the machine. The "toiling masses" is a phrase which to-day in capitalist society is a good joke. The general standard of life in Western Europe and America has risen to a level unimagined by Marx. To turn Communist to-day and to emulate Russia is to lower the standards of "the toiling masses", not to raise them.

Also, to-day the old Marxist jibe which gulled the ignorant, that "Religion is the opiate of the poor" is exposed in all its cheap-jack absurdity. To-day Religion is the one thing, in a world which has tasted deep of Fascism, Nazism, and Communism, which puts a true value on human personality. We know too well that Communism regards man as the property of the state, and as wholly subordinate to it. We know that law, which in normal countries protects the individual, in Communist countries does not quite see itself in that rôle. It is subject to the exigencies of the state, real or fictitious. Religion inculcates self-respect, love of God, love of one's neighbour. It affirms our moral and spiritual accountability. It affirms God's righteous judgments as well as His Fatherhood. It holds out to man the hope of Immortality. These great truths ennoble and enrich the human personality. To deny them is to impoverish, to shrivel, and eventually to degrade man's nature.

What we are most conscious of to-day in looking at Communist countries is "the state", the political and juridical entity which rules at home and engages in world affairs. To us this seems the permanent feature of communist countries. But to Marx the state was the political power of the bourgeoisie, organised to protect its interest. The proletariat, he thought, must seize political power in order to do away with it. The "dictatorship of the proletariat" is a temporary measure, utilising the powers of state to crush anti-revolutionary activity. It is, we think, obvious that those who exercise the powers of government can keep them indefinitely if they assert that there is anti-revolutionary plotting, or even tendency. The temptation to say that there is such a thing must be well-nigh irresistible.

Engels taught that the proletariat, when it seizes state power, effects the revolution, ceases to be proletariat, and brings the state to an end. "When the state becomes really representative of society as a whole it makes itself superfluous."

The State was thought to coerce by means of army and police. Lenin and Stalin both agreed with the pioneers Marx and Engels that the State must disappear when classes have disappeared—What trace of tendency is there that the State in Communist countries is fading away? We may say the ideal of a classless society needing no coercive powers is a notion which results from Marx and Engels straying into the field of ethics instead of keeping up the pretence that that sort of ethics does not exist. Men will manage without a coercive authority only when they have been radically transformed and regenerated, no matter what side of the iron curtain they live on.

State ownership of means of production should be a step towards the end of the State. Now it seems to be a step to State capitalism which may be permanent. Yet here we must admit that a Communist may logically tell us that the interim between the revolution and the establishment of classless society must be lengthy—that one generation is not enough.

In spite of much which has been written to the contrary, the Communist State must vary its policy to suit its circumstances. It may be thought advisable to adopt a tolerant attitude, at one period, to religion. In another period, if religion seems to be getting a hold on the people, it may be expedient to repress it. The usual sort of accusation is that the Church is intriguing with foreign powers. Whatever be the measure of truth in the accusation—much, or little, or none, it seems that the real motive for the proceedings is to reduce the Church's influence. A policy maintained for a time may be replaced by its direct opposite. This expediency is said to be justified by the object common to all policies—the safety of the State, and the advance of its affairs. Such procedure of course, is found in democracies, as where there is a change of government. But in democracies there can be a change of government at the free choice of the people. Can change be effected on these lines outside the democracies? Can corporate, Fascist, or Communist countries allow the citizens the final word? What are they afraid of?

* * *

Communism of the Marx—Engels kind has made very substantial progress in Europe and Asia. It has now active parties in India, Central America, and elsewhere. What remedy is there? Democratic governments should seriously set about abolishing the conditions which foster Communism, not only in homelands but in the less developed continents. Christian Churches and people should shake off complacency and develop a strong social conscience, and assert themselves in the name of Christ to right wrongs, to secure good standards of life, health, freedom and culture for all. The Gospel should be preached with far greater sense of its value and importance and "loving one's neighbour as oneself" ought to be more easily seen to be the Christian way of life.

THE BIBLE AGAINST ROME.

*Intention.

Cardinal Bellarmine, one of the most famous of Roman Catholic divines, says:—"No one can be certain, with the certainty of faith, that he receives a true sacrament, because the sacrament cannot be valid without the intention of the minister, and no man can see another's intention."—(Disput. Controv., De Justific., III. viii. 5.)

Some writers, however, seeing the consequences involved in this doctrine endeavoured to place the people beyond the danger of being deceived by stating that—"It is enough for validity if the

"minister merely perform the external rite in a serious manner, even if internally he withhold his intention—i.e., even if from malice or impiety he says to himself 'I don't mean to act as the minister of the church, I don't intend to baptise, consecrate or the like, but merely to deceive the people.'"

Such is the view held by the writer of the article "Sacraments of the Gospel", in Catholic Dictionary, Addis & Arnold, Fourth Edition, p. 811. On page 812, however, the same writer says:—"It is quite true that the majority of school theologians believe that secret withholding of the intention is enough to invalidate the sacrament."

This being so, the conclusion of the whole matter is this:—

That no Roman Catholic can be sure that he himself has ever been baptised, confirmed, absolved, or given Holy Communion.

That no Roman Catholic can be sure that the celebrant at the Mass is a duly ordained clergyman.

That no Roman Catholic can be sure that his father, for instance, on entering eternity, was fortified by the Sacrament of Extreme Unction.

*Mass.

Rome teaches that every time Mass is celebrated there is offered to God, a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead, and that in this sacrifice the body and blood of Christ are offered in an unbloody manner by the hands of the Priest.

Douay Bible contradicts such teaching, since:—

(a) Heb. vii. 27. Christ needs not daily to offer sacrifice.

„ x. 14 . By one oblation. He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.

I Pet. iii. 18 Christ died once for our sins.

(b) Heb. ix. 22. Without shedding of blood, no remission.

Priest celebrates Mass in an unknown tongue. Yet,

1 Cor. xiv., 9-28 Speaking so as to be understood, directed.

Monastic Institutions.

Establishment of such not authorised by Scripture.

Matt. v. 14-16 . Christians should be lights in the world.

* Priest's intention necessary to give validity to a Sacrament, first decreed by Council of Trent, Seventh Session, A.D. 1547.

Rome contends for five Sacraments over and above the two ordained by Christ, viz.:—Confirmation, Penance, Extreme Unction, Holy Orders and Matrimony.

Seven Sacraments confirmed as an Article of Faith at Seventh Session of Council of Trent, A.D. 1547.

* Sacrifice of the Mass defined about A.D. 1563.

John xvii. 15 . Christ prayed that His disciples should be kept from evil rather than taken out of the world.

Philip. ii. 15-16 The Philippians shone as lights in the world.

"The legislation on Convents forms a large and important section of Canon Law. Among the chief regulations is the law of Enclosure, 'which 'separates the Convent from the world' 'by the prohibition or restriction of intercourse 'from without'." ("Catholic Dictionary"; Addis and Arnold; Fourth Ed., p. 246) Roman Canon Law, contrary to Matthew v. 14-16, puts the bushel over the candle.

* Penance.

"Doing penance" means enduring of a penalty or punishment, or doing a work of some kind as a satisfaction for sin.

Douay Bible contradicts such teaching, since—
(a) We cannot be saved by works. (See "Works".)

(b) Isa. lviii. Afflicting our soul, not acceptable to God.

1 Cor. Abstinenence from food does viii. 8 . not commend us to God.

1 Tim. iv. Bodily exercise, profitable to 8 . little.

(c) John xix. 30 Christ finished the work.

Acts xi. 43 All receive remission who believe in Him.

Why in Matthew iii. 2 is "metanoete" translated "do penance", and in Mark i 15 "repent" where our Lord is speaking of the same subject? Again—

Why in Mark i. 4 is "metanoias" translated "penance," and metanoian, in Acts v. 31, "repentance"? Again—

Why in Luke xvii. 3 is "ean metanoese" translated "if he do penance", and "metano", in the next verse, "I repent"? Should a man "do penance" seven times a day? Again—

Why in Apocalypse (Rev.) ii. 21 is "hina metanoese" translated "that she might do penance", and "ou metanoesen", in the same verse, "she will not repent"?

The word "metanoia" is derived from "meta", implying "change", and "nous", the mind, signifying "change of mind", "change of life", "of heart", of motive for action. "Doing penance" is not equivalent to repentance. One might do penance as a "satisfaction" for the sin of stealing his neighbour's watch, and yet not abandon the idea of further appropriation.

The words of the Psalmist, 1. 12 (li. 10), "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me," breathe the meaning of the word "repentance".

* Peter (Supremacy of).

Rome claims for St. Peter that he was Prince of the Apostles, and upon this bases her enormous pretensions.

Douay Bible does not support such supremacy in Peter.

Matt. xviii. 1-4. Question as to who should be greatest settled.

„ xvii. 18 . Same authority as given to Peter (Matt. xvi 19) given to all the Apostles.

„ xx. 20-28 . Ten of the Apostles (Peter amongst the number) instructed not to "lord it" over their brethren.

Matt. xxiii. 8-12 Apostles not to court the title "Master", or "Rabbi".

Acts. xv. 7, 13, At Council of Jerusalem 19 after there had been much disputing Peter arose. James delivered judgment.

Ephésians ii. 20. Apostles and Prophets foundation of the Church, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone.

Galatians ii. 11 . Peter reproved by Paul.

Colossians i. 18. Christ hold the primacy.

1 Peter v. 1-3 . Peter himself disapproved of the principle of "lording it".

„ v. 4 . Christ the Prince of pastors.

No such supremacy in Peter implied in Matthew xvi. 18. The Godhead of Christ which Peter confessed ("Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God") is the petra, or rock, upon which the Church is built.

1 Cor. x. 4 . The rock (petra) was Christ.

Peter (Petros) signifies a piece of rock, a stone, petra being a rock, a crag.

(See also "Church".)

Priests.

No necessity for sacrificing priests, since:—

Heb. vii. 27 . No need of daily sacrifices.

„ x. 12 . One sacrifice offered for sins.

1 Pet. iii. 18 . Christ died once for our sins.

"The words 'priest', 'priesthood' ('hiereus', 'hierateuma'); are never applied in the New Testament to the office of the Christian ministry. "All Christians are said to be priests. 1. Pet. ii. "5, 9; Apoc. v. 10." ("Catholic Dictionary"; Addis and Arnold; Fourth Ed., p. 753.)

* In the primitive Church "Penance" preceded "Absolution." In the Roman Church "Absolution" precedes "Penance."

* Supremacy of Bishop of Rome first assumed by Boniface III., A.D. 605.

* Purgatory.

Rome teaches that there is (besides Gehenna or hell) a purgatorial fire, in which the souls of the pious are tortured.

Douay Bible contradicts this doctrine.

Eccles. xii. 7 . After death, spirit returns to God.

Luke xvi. 22 . Lazarus after death in Abraham's bosom.

Luke xxiii. 43 . Thief, in paradise, day of death.

2 Cor. v. 1-8 . Absent from body, present with the Lord.

Eph. iii. 15 . Heaven and earth mentioned, but not purgatory.

Philipp. i. 21 . Death of a saint is gain.

Apoc. (Rev.) xiv. 13 . The dead in the Lord resting.

N.B.—The Purgatory disclosed in Douay Bible.

Isaias xliii. 25 . God blots out our iniquities and will not remember our sins.

Isaias liii. 5 . Christ chastised for our peace.

1 Cor. vi. 11 . Believers in Christ are washed and justified.

Hebrews i. 3 . Christ, by His passion, purged away our sins. (See note on verse 3, Douay Bible).

1 John i. 7-9 . Christ's blood cleanseth from all sin.

The Book of Wisdom, regarded by the Church of Rome as Canonical, contains a passage which completely refutes this doctrine.

Wisdom iii. 1-3.

Souls of the just are in peace.

It is interesting to note the following statement with regard "to particular texts often alleged in "proof of Purgatory. We doubt if they contain an explicit and direct reference to it."—"Catholic Dictionary" Addis and Arnold; Fourth Ed., p. 767.)

† Saints.

Rome teaches that the Saints reigning together with Christ are to be honoured and invoked, and that they offer prayers to God for us.

Douay Bible does not support such teaching.

3 (1) Kings viii. God only knows the hearts
39 of men.

Eccles. ix. 5, 6 . The dead know nothing about us.

* Purgatory adopted about A.D. 1438. Finally confirmed at 25th and last Session of Council of Trent, A.D. 1563.

† Irenaeus (A.D. 180), Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 200), Origen (A.D. 230), Athanasius (A.D. 370), Augustine (A.D. 389), condemned this practice.

Invocation of Saints adopted about A.D. 700.

Matt. xi. 28 . Come unto Me.

John xiv. 6 . Christ the way, truth, and life.

„ xiv. 13 . Ask in Christ's name.

Acts iv. 12 . Christ's name only one whereby we must be saved.

Eph. ii. 18 . Access to the Father thro' Christ.

1 Tim. ii. 5 . Christ the one mediator.

Rom. viii. 34 . Christ maketh intercession for us.

Heb. vii. 25 . Christ ever liveth to make intercession.

There is not a single instance in the Bible of prayer to a saint or angel.

See also "Angels".

did not care whether or not it destroyed intellectual freedom.

There was, she asserted, a very great similarity between the Church of Rome and the Communists whom they were so eager to destroy. She accused the Roman Catholic Church, even in Britain, of intimidation and coercion, as was shown by their treatment of her and their methods of suppressing information about her work.

"If they were in the majority in this country," she said, "and if they had all the power, then things would be very different."

Dr. Stopes expressed the view that all religious education should be taken out of the schools and should be given either at home, in Sunday Schools or in the churches.

Tolerance.

Father Christie declared that there was no such thing as a tolerant Government, and said that some Governments had to exercise restraint from time to time, as the Northern Ireland Government did by restraining co-religionists. But that was not persecution. The same thing happened in other countries.

"Nobody has yet solved the difficulties of tolerance and intolerance," he said. "If we ever succeed in this world in establishing tolerance we shall have progressed a good deal."

"There is as much skulduggery in the history of the Catholic Church as in any other school of thought in the world. We recognise that we have this in common with all men—that we are sinners."

"One of the greatest hoaxes that was ever foisted on any long-suffering public is that there is some connection between the totalitarianism of the Catholics and the totalitarianism of the Communists. Our totalitarianism is the totalitarianism of Almighty God.”—“Belfast Weekly Telegraph,” 4/2/55.

[We are not in sympathy with either speaker, but it is well to note their points of view. We have never seen it stated that there is any connection between R. C. totalitarianism and Communist totalitarianism, but there are many striking resemblances.]

Vatican Claims Freedom is Reserved for R.C. Church Alone.

The New York Times said in a dispatch from Rome that the Vatican has described as not official or semi-official but nevertheless “unexceptionable” an address by Alfredo Cardinal Ottaviani supporting the Spanish bishops’ position favouring restriction of Protestant minorities in Roman Catholic countries.

The Cardinal’s speech in support of the Spanish stand in face of criticism by some French and United States Roman Catholics was made last March 2. The New York Times said the Vatican’s statement was elicited by a request from the newspaper for an authoritative clarification of the speech in view of apparently conflicting interpretations given to it in Spain and the United States.

Caused Controversy.

The Times said a controversy has raged in Roman Catholic circles for many months over the Spanish bishop’s position that Spain, as a Roman Catholic country, should not grant freedom of propaganda to other religions.

The dispatch added that Cardinal Ottaviani created a furor by his speech siding with the Spanish bishops and some prelates in the United States were said to have sent protests to Rome against the Cardinal’s statement.

The Times also carried a dispatch from Madrid which quoted ecclesiastical circles in Spain as saying the Vatican had confirmed the Spanish bishops in what they see as the duties and obligations of a Roman Catholic state toward religion in general and Protestant minorities in particular.

The Times added that a spokesman in New York for critics of the Cardinal insisted that he had spoken only in his personal capacity.

Based on Papal Texts.

The Vatican statement pointed out, the newspaper added, that the Cardinal’s statement was based largely on papal texts, such as encyclicals and allocutions. Cardinal Ottaviani was described as a well-known Roman Catholic jurist and expert on ecclesiastical law. He is assessor of the holy congregation of the holy office. His speech was carried by L’Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper.

. According to the official text of the lecture—which is not generally known in its entirety—published by the Pontifical University last March, Cardinal Ottaviani said:

“The (Roman Catholic) Church, too, recognizes the necessity with which rulers in some (Roman) Catholic countries may be faced of granting—because of grave reasons—a degree of tolerance to the other cults.”

“But tolerance is not a synonym for freedom of propaganda (by non-Roman Catholics) which foment religious discord and alters the secure and unanimous possession of (Roman Catholic) truth and of religious practice in countries such as Italy, Spain, and others.

Links Protestants with Reds.

“... Unfortunately, in the U.S.A., where many dissident brethren (Protestants) are unaware of the situation, both in its juridical and actual aspects, existing in our countries, there are those who show a zeal similar to that of the Communists in protesting against the alleged intolerance shown in the missionaries sent to ‘convert us’.”

Since the Pope himself is the prefect, or head of the congregation, which is considered the most important of all the Vatican departments because it deals with questions of faith and morals vital to Roman Catholicism, the view of the Spanish bishops is that Cardinal Ottaviani would not have discussed without first having obtained papal assent so important and delicate a question as that of the rights of Protestants in Roman Catholic and non-Roman Catholic states.—“The Sentinel,” Toronto, 1954.

Voice of a Roman Catholic Archbishop.

“Pious Junk”. No, this is not our appellation; it is from the mouth of Archbishop R. J. Cushing, who, in a radio address, warned against purchasing “holy horrors”. As reported in The Standard-Times of New Bedford, Mass., March 23, 1954, he went on to list as “pious junk” and “pious rubbish” such articles as “crosses that glow in the dark, religious pictures with eyes that follow you around the room, water from a holy hydrant, vials of miracle anointing oils”. The Archbishop added: “It’s an insult to your intelligence; it’s money spent for holy horrors. These things belittle Catholic devotion and encourage superstition.”—“Protestant Action”, Toronto, Dec., 1954.

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

Christians Third in India Census.

According to a census issued by the government taken in 1951, Hindus form 84.99 per cent. of the population of India, Muslims 9.93 per cent., Christians 2.3 per cent., Sikhs 1.74 per cent., Jains 0.45 per cent., Buddhists 0.06 per cent., Zoroastrians 0.03 per cent., adherents of tribal religions 0.47 per cent. and of non-tribal religions 0.03 per cent.

These figures cover the present territorial limits, exclusive of Jammu and Kashmir states and part of the tribal areas in Assam where the 1951 census was not taken. Comparison of the figures for 1951 and 1931, the government paper states, shows that there has been no material change in the religious pattern, except that in 1951 more members of tribal groups professed themselves Hindus or Christians.

The census shows that out of a total population of 356,700,000, Hindus number 303,200,000; Christians 8,200,000; Muslims 35,400,000; adherents of tribal religions, 1,700,000 and of non-tribal religions 100,000. Travancore-Cochin has the largest Christian population—2,966,036 out of a total population of 9,280,425. Then comes Madras state, with 2,431,006 Christians out of a total of 54,290,000.

Criticism of MRA in Church Inquiry Report —“Defective in its Social Thinking.”

Dr. Frank Buchman's moral re-armament movement is criticised in a Church Assembly report just published. The report refers to the movement as being “psychologically dangerous and gravely defective in its social thinking.”

It admits however that M.R.A. adherents are sincere and of goodwill and have exposed the “inadequacy of the Church in our industrialised modern society.”

The report was drawn up by the Assembly's Social and Industrial Council. Among the 17 members of the council are the Bishop of Sheffield, Dr. Hunter; the Bishop of Birmingham, Dr. Wilson; Dame Marian Acton; Mr. Basil Sanderson and Sir John Woods. Major-General Sir Colin Jardine and Mr. Gerald Steel dissociated themselves from the report.

The report states that the movement's method of prayer by “quiet times” with pencil and paper when adherents were said to receive guidance from God, was a “dangerous over-simplification of what is required”.

All the more so when the guidance received by an individual could be overruled by guidance from M.R.A. headquarters.

In general, the report says “M.R.A.'s teaching on guidance conduces to a dangerous depreciation of common sense and the powers of the intellect.”

It might also lead to a claim to virtual infallibility.—“Belfast Weekly Telegraph”, 4/2/55.

Cardinal Stritch—Church Unity Talks With Other Faiths Not For Roman Catholics.

Chicago.—Samuel Cardinal Stritch urged Catholics to refrain from engaging in religious unity assemblies or conferences with other faiths.

Instead, the noted Chicago prelate said the Roman Catholic Church is ready to join with citizens of all faiths of this country and elsewhere in a united front against a “common enemy”—atheism.

Cardinal Stritch in his pastoral letter to the laity and clergy of the Chicago archdiocese stated:

“The Catholic Church does not take part in these organisations or in their assemblies or conferences. She does not enter into any organisation in which the delegates of many sects sit down in council or conference as equals to discuss the nature of the Church of Christ or the nature of her unity, or to propose to discuss how to bring about the unity of Christendom, or to formulate a programme of united Christian action.

Emphasising that the Roman Catholic Church is “the one and only Church of Christ”, the Cardinal continued:

“She does not allow her children to engage in any activity of conference or discussion based upon the false assumption that Roman Catholics too are still searching for the truth of Christ.

“For to do so would be to admit that she is but one of the many forms in which the true Church of Christ may or may not exist . . . such an admission she can never make, for she is now as she has always been, the one and only Mystical Body of Christ, the one and only Church of Christ."

There is only one way to unity of all Christians and that is through the Roman Catholic Church, Cardinal Stritch declared, stating:

"Now this unity, clear and obvious as it is, exists in the Church of Christ to-day. It is found in the Roman Catholic Church and in her alone. She and she alone is the true Church of Jesus Christ. There is only one way to the unity so anxiously sought by some men. That is the entrance into the fold of the Church of Christ, participation in her life, submission without reserve to her teaching and ruling authority."

The Cardinal asked his flock to pray for the return of all Christian sects to the Roman Catholic Church.

—"The Vigilant", Melbourne, Nov., '54.

[Cardinal Stritch wrote in connection with the invitation that some Roman Catholics should attend the World Council of Churches meeting at Chicago last August, but he lays down the recognised principles of his Church. Unfortunately, many people do not understand that Rome's attitude to Christian unity is that others must submit to her. The only R.C.'s at the Evanston Chicago meetings were journalists, as far as we have heard.

Of course there are obvious answers to the Cardinal's claims. It was better to put the claims forward, for they cleared the air.]

St. Patrick's Day in New York.

St. Patrick's Day will be observed in St. Paul's Chapel in Broadway, New York, with a guest speaker, special music and prayers, and decorations of Irish flags. The preacher will be Irish-born Rev. F. J. Vincent, rector of the Episcopal Church of the Redeemer, Pelham, New York. By permission of the Bishop of New York, the vicar of St. Paul's, the Rev. Robert C. Hunsicker, will use the Collect, Epistle and Gospel from the Church of Ireland Book of Common Prayer.

The vicar received messages of greeting from the Most Rev. Dr. Barton, Archbishop of Dublin and Primate of Ireland, and from the Bishop of Down, the Right Rev. Dr. Kerr. Dr. Barton sent the following message:

"From the Archbishop of Dublin to our fellow-Churchmen in New York, greeting. We rejoice to know that you will be joining with us in Ireland on St. Patrick's Day, in praising God for the work of our patron saint in laying the foundation of the Irish Church in the 5th century. He was one of the greatest missionaries in the history of the Christian Church. His successful work in Ireland had a profound effect in later years on the re-establishment of Christianity in England. The Irish Church sent St. Columba to Iona in Scotland, and from that settlement such men as St. Aidan reclaimed the greater part of England from the heathenism into which her people had lapsed after the Saxon invasion. From these Irish monasteries, dauntless missionaries went to many parts of Europe and established Christian centres in the northern lands, and as far south as Italy. The Anglican Communion owes its origin not only to the mission of St. Augustine but to the work of the Celtic Church.

Missionary Zeal.

"Let us pray that the missionary enthusiasm of that Church may continue to inspire us who have inherited from them the ancient faith of the Church.

"We of the Church of Ireland ask your prayers that we may be faithful in the work which God has entrusted to us. We, too, will pray for you, that your work in the great city of New York may be blessed by God to His greater glory."

The following was the text of the message by the Bishop of Down and Dromore:

"As Bishop of the Diocese of Down, I send fraternal greetings to the worshippers in St. Paul's Church, New York, for their commemoration of our national patron saint, Patrick. In my diocese is the place he landed at in A.D. 432, Saul, where his first Christian Service was held. In that, the oldest parish in Ireland, there will be a broadcast service on St. Patrick's Day. A few miles away is his burying place in the graveyard of my cathedral city of Downpatrick.

"We of the Church of Ireland hold in reverence the memory of St. Patrick. Our Primate presides in the chief church he founded at Armagh. We are in unbroken ecclesiastical succession from him, and maintain the Gospel he proclaimed as set forth in his authentic writings. Peace and blessings be with you."

Bible for Each New Australian—Memento of Oath-Taking.

The rapid increase in the number of foreign immigrants to Australia has led the British and Foreign Bible Society to offer to each new Australian on naturalisation a copy of the Authorised Version of the Bible. The Lord Mayor of Sydney, Alderman P. D. Hills, has accepted the offer and at the naturalisation ceremonies in the Town Hall, Sydney, now asks each new Australian to keep the bible on which the oath of allegiance is sworn.

Until recently the bibles, which are held in the right hand at the oath-taking have been copies loaned by the authorities. In future the Lord Mayor will say to each group of new Australians : "You may keep the bible you now hold as a memento of this significant occasion. It is a gift from the British and Foreign Bible Society." The immigrants include people from many different countries and different faiths, but it is reported that 95 per cent. of them accept the gift with appreciation.—"Manchester Guardian", 14/3/'55.

"Q.U.B." Church Ceremony.

The Archbishop of Armagh, Dr. J. A. F. Gregg, and six Bishops attended the opening recently of the new Church of Ireland Centre at Queen's University by Sir Richard Livingstone, a former Vice-Chancellor of the University.

The ceremony was held in the new Geology Lecture Theatre opposite the Centre in Elmwood Avenue.

The Bishops were: The Bishop of Connor, Dr. R. Charles King Irwin; the Bishop of Down and Dromore, Dr. W. S. Kerr; the Bishop of Clogher, Dr. Richard Tyner; the Bishop of Meath, Dr. James M'Cann, and Bishop J. Hind.

The dedication was performed by the Primate, who presided, at the opening ceremony. He said that the fact that they had had to wait until 1955 for the new Centre at "Queen's" did show some want of perspicacity on the part of the Church of Ireland. It was of enormous importance that the university authorities should be sympathetic in such a venture. There had been no lack of sympathy and co-operation on the part of the Vice-Chancellor (Dr. Eric Ashby) who had given them every possible support.

Care of Students.

Dr. Ashby said that when he was invited to become Vice-Chancellor, Sir Richard advised him: "No man should accept this office to whom religion means nothing". Dr. Ashby went on "I have often realised what good advice that was". They were charged with the responsibility of encouraging students to cultivate spiritual health alongside their intellectual and physical health. "That is what this centre is for", Dr. Ashby said, "and it is a great honour and satisfaction to us that Sir Richard has come to open it".

Sir Richard said he was delighted to see the enormous developments at "Queen's". He mentioned the "imposing scarlet skeleton on the Malone Road", and added: "But this centre is also an important part of the advance."

"Queen's" enabled people with different political and religious views to live together in amity. In a country where there were great religious differences, that was particularly valuable. There was some hope that the contacts would germinate a spirit of forbearance and good will which would profit the country in future years.

Time of Troubled Minds.

"To-day, we are seeing an immense step forward", Sir Richard said. "Some time ago, the Church of Ireland arranged that there should be a whole-time Dean of Residences, and certainly the care of 600 students required his services. This Centre will give him a place for his work. The Church of Ireland Dean will in future have what his Presbyterian and Roman Catholic colleagues have already had for some time."

He thought that sometimes the Churches paid great attention to the education of children but were apt not to do as much as they might for people in their late adolescence. Surely it was at that student stage that people were apt to drift away from their religion. "I think you can say that for many people the university is a time of great troubling of the mind. It makes all the difference in the world if there is a place such as this Church of Ireland Centre to give them help."

Britain's Spiritual Hunger.

Before sailing from the United States for Britain recently, Dr. Billy Graham, whose evangelistic campaign begins in Glasgow on March 21, stated that he was returning to Britain because spiritual hunger was even more pronounced there than in America. In a statement written for the Associated Press, he explained:

"We are going to Britain first, because Britain is the cross-roads of the Western world, a mighty fortress of freedom. What happens there reverberates throughout the world. It is an historic fact that spiritual revivals originating in Britain have invariably left their impact and stamp upon the world. . . .

"Second, we are going back to Britain because the spiritual hunger there is even more pronounced than it is in America. Many have thought that our going back so soon is ill-advised. But every indication, if visible signs can be trusted, points to even a greater response than last year."

350,000 Seats Booked.

His committee, wrote Dr. Graham, had secured the largest stadium in London, seating 100,000. Already 350,000 seats had been reserved, and it appeared that by the time the meeting began most of the seats would have been taken in advance. He went on:

"There is nothing spectacular about our meetings. There is only one way to account for such phenomenal interest, and that is the presence of a great spiritual hungering in the hearts of the people. Not only is there a marked longing for a return to faith, but it was evident last year at Haringay that the spirit of God is working in a singular way in Britain.

"It took more than a mere man to persuade 36,000 conservative cultured dignified people to answer the Gospel appeal. It took more than mere publicity to attract 120,000 people to one service, and on the same day draw 65,000 to another stadium. The spirit of God is working in Britain. Make no mistake about that."

Bombs and the Man.

Dr. Graham observed that this year weapons for mass destruction would reach the peak of perfection. The comfortable thoughts that everything was growing slowly better had almost overnight been changed into thoughts of the world's end. Sir Winston Churchill said that it was only a matter of three or four years until Russia could match our destructive potential. Mr. Bevan, more realistic, said it would be much less. Mr. Eisenhower had said, referring to the atomic arms race, "There comes a time when a lead is not significant". Dr. Graham went on:

"It is not the hydrogen bombs we are afraid of: it is the men behind them. The machines are harmless, but human nature without God is deadly dangerous.

"Does Christianity have the answer? We emphatically believe that it does. In areas where it has been tried and applied it has changed both the individual and society. So we are going back to Britain with a keen feeling of personal inadequacy.

"What happens there will be felt in the United States. Just as in World War II, when Britain was besieged by the enemy and we took heart at the least morsel of favourable news and rejoiced at the slightest advance and victory, let us hold up their hands now as they take a stand against the spiritual forces seeking to destroy all that is good, holy, and free in the world."

—"Manchester Guardian", 14/3/55.

"Priests in Overalls" in France again.

The Church is preparing to resume, with new and somewhat modified regulations, the worker-priest experiment—sending apostles in overalls into the factories in an effort to regain the faith of French working classes.

The experiment, which began ten years ago, was halted last year for re-examination by ecclesiastical authorities.

Some of the priests were permitted to continue, provided they attached themselves to a religious community.

Maurice Cardinal Feltin, Archbishop of Paris, signalled the beginning of the Church's new drive with a pastoral letter to the worker-priests defining their mission.

He said that the "priests in overalls" will have to "share the life of the working class . . . but keep a certain degree of autonomy and an objectivity of judgment."

Several of the original worker-priests were reported guilty of deviation from the principles set for their work by the higher clergy.

The new experiment will be called: "The Direct Apostolate in the Working World (L'Apostolat Direct dans le Monde Ouvrier).

Cardinal Feltin said that the new worker-priests will not be allowed "to accept all reactions and positions of the working class. They will have to detect the (doctrinal) deviations, which they

A LENTEN PASTORAL LETTER.

In the Lenten pastoral letter of one of the Roman Catholic bishops recently published we note a statement that:—

"The principal dangers to faith were attendance at non-Catholic worship or schools, marriage with non-Catholics, and books or companions hostile to the Church or its teaching."

It has always seemed to us that "attendance at 'non-Catholic' worship" on the part of Roman Catholics is so rare, being confined to weddings and funerals, that the danger is illusory. People go to weddings as social occasions, and to funerals out of respect for friends, neighbours, and relatives. If there is danger here it is surely an admission that the loyalty of adherents is not trusted, and that the depth of conviction is thought to be slight.

Mixed marriages are different, and we find that often the Protestant party wins over the non-Protestant. Of course a mixed marriage which takes place in a Protestant Church may result in severe social pressure almost amounting to boycott in some parts of the country. Mixed marriages are generally a mistake where the Ne Temere decree is admitted.

Attendance at "non-Catholic" schools is very rare in Ireland, especially in rural or provincial Ireland. We see also the perennial warning against Trinity College, Dublin.

"Where higher education was in question the danger was by no means negligible, and hence he deemed it his duty to point out once more that attendance at Trinity College, Dublin, was forbidden to Catholics under pain of mortal sin.

"'This prohibition', he stated, 'arises from a decree of the Council of Maynooth, which expressly mentions Trinity College, and from the general law of the Church, which forbids attendance at any non-Catholic school whatsoever; and it is based on the fact that, as is evident from the nature of the case, and as experience has proved, attendance at non-Catholic schools is normally harmful to the faith of Catholics.'"

You would never guess from this that there are hundreds of Roman Catholic students in Trinity College, and that most of them have received permission from their bishops. The R.C. Bishop of Cashel, whom we quote, like other bishops can permit such attendance and thus it ceases to be "a mortal sin". We never heard of an R.C. who gave up his faith through going to T.C.D.

THREE FRANCISCANS.

The death of Mr. Joseph McCabe in January last closed the career of a man who was described in a quotation in the obituary notice in "The Times" as "one of our few surviving Victorians." "He was indeed", wrote the obituarist, "a lonely survivor of the serious militant but somewhat elementary scepticism which perturbed the closing decades of the nineteenth century". A truculent, old-fashioned rationalist, he "breathed defiance to the last". He was 87 at his death. It is sometimes said that Franciscans never change their religion. McCabe did. He entered the order at 16, received its full theological training, ending at Louvain University, and was admitted to the priesthood in 1890. He became a professor of scholastic philosophy, and was rector of a theological college by 1895. The following year he withdrew from the Roman communion, and in 1897 he published his remarkable account of "Twelve Years in a Monastery". For nearly sixty years he wrote and lectured against revealed religion and the Church of his birth. He was fair enough, and did not play to the Protestant gallery, but he pulled no punches. He married, became father of a family, and never looked back. He did some pot-boiling, but no one could ever have said that he was not always in deadly earnest. If he did not remain a Franciscan all his life, he at least never forgot that he had been through the mill.

Castle Chaplain.

McCabe was not the only Franciscan who abandoned the order around the nineties. Father Richard Brome de Bary, after working in London, became an Anglican in the U.S.A. in 1901, joining the Episcopal Church. Returning to England he was appointed private chaplain to the present Earl of Shaftesbury. In that capacity he served from 1906 to 1915. In the latter year he accepted the vicarage of Imber, in the Diocese of Salisbury. Later he was vicar of Horton. He retired in 1945, and died in 1948 at Wimborne St. Giles. The account of his conversion and change of ministry will be found in his book, "Franciscan Days of Vigil". He was a very different man from McCabe, though he had no more vocation for the monastic career. He expressed the view himself that he had never been "in a canonically valid sense a member of the Franciscan Order". Like McCabe he "married a wife". He remained a Catholic, but ceased to be a Romanist, though he was never bitter. He wrote several books that are still worth reading. They are all out of print, and a little hard to get hold of—"A New Rome", "The Gospel of Worship", "Mystical Fellowship", "The Land of Promise", and others. His wife was a minor poetess, not without admirers of her muse. He lived in a house in the Belfast Castle grounds for several years. As a private chaplain to the Earl of Shaftesbury he officiated in both the Castle Oratory and the Chapel of the Resurrection.

"People's Padre."

Another Franciscan, more recently, after 26 years in the order, left it, and the Roman Catholic Church, at Phoenix, Arizona. He was Father Emmett McLoughlin. His social work, including the opening of a hospital, came under the ban of the ecclesiastical authorities, and he was charged with neglect of his priestly duties. He refused to resign and clear out of Phoenix. He felt that he was called by God to continue the job to which he had put his hands. So, in Phoenix he remains, and his work goes on. Like McCabe and de Bary he has married. His wife was, and is, associated with him in his hospital undertaking. He has written his story in "People's Padre", published a few weeks ago. His picture of the Roman Catholic community in the U.S.A. is a very strange one. He has suffered many things at the hands of his former co-religionists in one of the strongest pressure groups in the country. But he assures his readers that he has had the sympathy and support of thousands of good folk, even amongst those who have still refrained from any open breach with "The Church". He says that about 30 per cent. of the Romanist clergy in the U.S.A., sooner or later in their career, get out and "return", as he puts it, to "normal life". He reckons that, at any given time, there are, in the U.S.A., about 13,500 ex-priests in secular employment, married, fathers of families, and happy in their freedom. Of the thirteen students in his own class, four have broken away. He concludes: "I am an American again, not a foreign subject on American soil. . . I can love God and continue with freedom in the service of my fellow man. For that freedom is now my heritage also." He seems still, in very real fashion, to be working the works of the Little Poor Man of Assisi. VIATOR.

[Belfast News Letter, 12/3/'55. To the author of this article we owe our awareness of one of these Franciscans, Richard de Bary. An article on de Bary appeared in our pages a few years ago, by "J.B.S." McLoughlin's autobiography is very interesting. Ed.]

EDITOR'S CHAIR

The Church of the Living God.

As one walks along O'Connell Street, Dublin in the evening one notes at the corner of Abbey Street a handcart of pamphlets for sale. A glance shows that they are mainly the publications of "The Catholic Truth Society", and that the Legion of Mary is in charge.

Over the display is a banner with the text from which our title above comes—"Where is 'the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth'?"—These, as we all know, are the words of St. Paul in 1 Timothy, 3. 15.

The full passage is a series of practical directions to Timothy about his routine duties—the standard of conduct he is to ensure in bishops and deacons. St. Paul says that he hopes to visit Timothy shortly (plainly to exercise apostolic oversight), but if he fails to do so, what he has written is intended to guide Timothy—"that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth."

The banner we refer to is of course a challenge to the non-Roman Catholic, and perhaps an invitation to him or her to buy a booklet and find the answer. On the opposite corner of the street there are frequent evangelistic meetings sponsored by the Irish Church Missions or by the Y.M.C.A. Their supporters ought to be able to face the question and have a satisfactory answer. There are three possible attitudes to Rome's claims—to ignore them, to yield to them, or to refute them.

The first of these may do for the careless or sceptical, but ought not to satisfy the person genuinely concerned for the Christian faith. The second ought to imply study and conviction. The third ought to imply more serious study, and more intelligent and spiritual conviction.

Where then is "the Church of the living God"? Ought we not to say to ourselves first of all that we ought to be careful not to give the word "Church" the significance it has come to have in our days? When St. Paul wrote the idea of "ecclesia" was very old. It is the usual word in the Greek translation of the Old Testament (LXX) for the Hebrew word normally translated "congregation" in English, i.e. the gathering or public meeting of the Israelite people. It was not in St. Paul's time, or at any time a hierarchy, or a curia.

The Apostle teaches elsewhere that the Church is "the body of Christ". The body could not be imperfect, or incomplete, or unable to do all that God intended, or all that lay within its competence, in the first century of our era. Yet it had no central organisation; no "magisterium" located in the imperial capital city of Rome; no papacy; no elaboration of dogmas such as we find in the twentieth century; no mariology; in short, it was the body of Christ unencumbered by the accretions of nearly two thousand years. It is said of course, that all the differences between then and now are logical developments of the faith. This was the argument by which John Henry Newman more than a century ago succeeded in overcoming his scruples and doubts so that he might become a Roman Catholic. If he was right then each successive generation may claim that it is more Christian than its predecessors, and the Apostles had only rudimentary ideas of what Christianity meant. It will not do to say that if the Apostles had known the later dogmas they would have believed them; neither will it do to say that they had implicit faith. The only thing we know about their faith is what they have told us, and what the first centuries make plain to us as their teaching. The canon of the New Testament (which we do not owe to Rome) shows no sign of the sacred writers having a rudimentary grasp of saving truth. Rather, we find them expressing profound and comprehensive truths relating to the Incarnation, and the Atonement, and the Resurrection, and Justification, and Sanctification, and eternal Judgment.

We recognise adaptations of organisation and credal summaries of Scripture teaching, as inevitable and proper. But these in no way carry us upon the path to the Lateran or Trent or Vatican Councils.

Take a practical instance—Our Lord in the institution of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper directed the use of the Cup by all. The student of the New Testament who recognises the Church as "the pillar and ground of the truth" will, for that very word "truth's" sake, deny that there is in the Church a legitimate power to alter what Christ commanded, or requested. Yet it is claimed that "the Church" (i.e. the Roman Catholic Church) has authority to change the signs in the Sacrament the Lord appointed.

Further, while claiming to settle things on the ground of the Church's infallibility, it does in fact attach infallibility to a decision of the Holy Office, a single committee of the Church (see Clergy Review, Feb., 1955). This appears to us to be an unexpected interpretation of the very carefully worded definition of Infallibility accepted by the Vatican Council of 1870. We are of course assuming, perhaps in ignorance, that there are not two infallibilities, one of the Church, and one of the Papacy.

We believe that the instance we give would have gravely upset the first-century Christian. He could not have altered Christ's memorial because he could not infringe upon truth. The Church as "pillar and ground of truth" must have found such a proceeding unthinkable. Indeed, any manipulation of the sacrament of the Gospel was unheard of till centuries had passed. We understand that the first offenders against Christ's Ordinance was called to order, by a Bishop of Rome because they were omitting the use of the Cup. Pope Leo the Great declared refusal of the Cup to be a Manichaean heresy, and Pope Gelasius I wrote "Let people either receive the Sacrament in its entirety, or be repelled from the entire Sacrament". In the 12th century Pope Pascal II wrote "We know that the Bread was given separately, and the wine given separately, by the Lord Himself, which custom we therefore teach and command to be always observed in Holy Church". Yet these declarations, as infallible as any can be, because they are in agreement with Holy Scripture, were set aside when the Council of Constance in 1415 condemned priests under penalty of excommunication for giving the Cup to the Communicants.

A former Dean of Canterbury, the learned Dr. Henry Wace, has described the first century character of "the Church" thus—"In apostolic times the external union of the Church of Christ was simply that of distinct communities who believed in the same truth, and accepted the same discipline, who entered into mutual consultation on important points of difficulty which might arise, and who submitted to the decisions which resulted from such consultations as expressing the judgment of the Spirit of God for them. But they were not all subject to the administration of any single visible authority, and in that respect did not present the characteristic of the single society. There was, indeed, one authority to which they all submitted, but it was an authority ordinarily invisible—that namely, of the Lord, who, by His commission to His Apostles, had really founded the various Churches, who had promised to be with them to the end of the world, and who was believed through his Spirit to intimate His will to His representatives, when solemnly assembled in such a Council as that which met at Jerusalem."

Dr. Wace goes on to define the Church. To the question "What is the Church"? there is a two-fold answer:—

"There is, first, the one great body, of which St. Paul speaks in the Epistle to the Ephesians as the Body of Christ which is obviously not confined either to any one of such particular Churches as those which the Apostle founded, or to any single community existing on earth and at any one time, but is composed of all who in every age have been united to Christ the Head by His Spirit. They are His members; they will be found at the consummation of all things, when Christ is revealed in His full glory, with all His Saints, to form one vast organism, in union with Him, each with his place, his gift, his office, and his special blessing. But this Church—the Church in the highest sense of the word—is, and always has been, invisible. There are members of the visible Churches who do not belong to it, because they do not belong to Him; they are false to Him in belief or practice. Being as a whole an invisible body, it is not one which we can approach, to which we can appeal for guidance, or which can exercise any direct authority over us. We are in union with it, if we are true Christians, through Christ."

"But if we are to use the word 'Church' of a visible body, then, according to the New Testament, any congregation of Christians who have received Christ's word and have been baptised, and who continue in the Apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in the breaking of bread and in the prayers, is a Church of Christ; it is a congregation of believers in Christ who acknowledge the truth, and who submit to the discipline which He and His Apostles declared and appointed; or, in the words of the Church of England the visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men in which the pure word of God is preached and the Sacraments he duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same. There may be any number of such Churches and no one of them has any inherent authority over others. . . there is a real though not, for ordinary purposes, an external unity among them. . . though not forming, either individually or in combination, the one Church of Christ, they are the visible bodies out of which that one invisible body is being evolved: and in ordinary circumstances it is through union with one of them that our union with that invisible body is effected and maintained."

Another quotation from Dr. Wace may not be irrelevant to this discussion—"That ideal which has captivated and distracted so many minds of there being one single visible society, under one government, which alone can claim to be the Church of Christ, and to whose authority every individual Christian must submit on peril of his salvation, is an ideal which has no foundation in the New Testament."

We have quoted the views of Dean Wace, whose name ought to be familiar to older readers who have an interest in Christian truth (The Dean issued a well-known edition of Martin Luther's Primary Works, and was joint-editor of the monumental "Dictionary of Christian Biography"). We now turn to Calvin's Commentary on I Timothy (Calvin Translation Society, Edinburgh 1856)—Calvin on 1 Tim. III. 15 comments on the words "How then oughtest to conduct thyself in the house of God" as follows—"There are good reasons why God bestows this name on his Church; for not only has he received us to be his children by the grace of adoption, but he also dwelleth in the midst of us."

When he comes to the title "the pillar and ground of the truth" he says "Could it (i.e. the house of God) have been described in loftier language? Is anything more venerable or more holy than that everlasting truth which embraces both the glory of God, and the salvation of men?" He speaks of "the dignity of this wisdom, which alone deserves to be called light and truth, and the instruction of life, and the way, and the Kingdom of God. Now it is preserved on earth by the ministry of the Church alone. What a weight therefore rests on the pastors who have been entrusted with the charge of so inestimable a treasure!"

The grandeur and solemnity of the treasure of God's revelation is such, that to Calvin it is but trifling with truth to claim that accretions, traditions, mediaeval theories and the like should be regarded as the oracles of God because Rome says it is "the pillar and ground of the truth", and therefore it cannot err! His point seems to be this—If Rome is the Church of the living God, then its teaching should be of an august and uncorrupt character. But it is, in fact, an amalgam of all sorts of pious observances, unreliable traditions, dogmas not consonant with Scripture, and theories which have gradually been pushed forward into the realm of doctrine. Hence, for Calvin, the very nature of Latin Christianity in the sixteenth century debarred it from being considered to be "the pillar and ground of truth". That is a weighty verdict which ought to be studied in detail, but which we must leave in general terms.

Let it be remembered that the Reformers in criticising contemporary religion, and the position taken by "the Church", took the whole thing as it stood, into account. What the Church did; what the Church said; what the Church permitted; what the Church tolerated; what Church authority condoned; all went to build up the structure and view of Christian life and thought they set out to correct and amend.

We are to-day accustomed to a distinction being made between the things the Church in its magisterial office imposes on the faithful to be believed on pain of eternal damnation, and the things which may be casually dismissed as not binding on anyone. But we have to keep before us the general attitude, that though a particular thing may not have been defined and decreed as a necessary truth, yet it is temerarious to doubt it or to deny it. Through the mediaeval and later centuries many things were on their way through various grades of popular opinion, then general belief, then assent of theologians, then "temerarious to deny", then definable, and then, at length, defined! In the matter of doctrine it might be said that the first century Christian belief was but the foundation; and that development and growth of the living reality erected upon the foundation the building which we see to-day: but St. Paul says that the Church of the first century is not only the foundation, "the ground", but also what is built thereon, "the pillar". That is, the support of truth erected on the one genuine foundation, which is Our Lord Jesus Christ.

To come back to Calvin—"The reason why the Church is called 'the pillar of truth' is that she defends and spreads it by her agency. God does not Himself come down from heaven to us, nor does He daily send angels to make known His truth; but He employs pastors, whom He has appointed for that purpose. To express it in a more homely manner, is not the Church the mother of all believers? Does she not regenerate them by the Word of God, educate and nourish them through their whole life, strengthen, and bring them to absolute perfection? For the same reason she is called the pillar of truth; because the office of administering doctrine, which God hath placed in her hands, is the only instrument of preserving the truth, that it may not perish from the remembrance of men."

"It is a blasphemy to say that the Word of God is uncertain, till it obtains from men what may be called a borrowed certainty. Paul simply means what he states elsewhere in other words, that since our 'faith is by hearing', there will be no faith, unless there be preaching. Accordingly in reference to men, the Church maintains the truth, because by preaching the Church proclaims it, because she keeps it pure and entire, because she transmits it to posterity. If the instruction of the gospel be not proclaimed, if there are no godly ministers who, by their preaching, rescue truth from darkness and forgetfulness, instantly falsehoods, errors, impostures, superstitions, and every kind of corruption will reign. In short, silence in the Church is the banishment and crushing of the truth."

* * *

Calvin then directs his attention to Roman Catholic claims based on this text. He says that even if the Church were elevated above the third heaven, it has nothing to do with them. "Nay, I even turn the whole passage against them; for if the Church is the pillar of truth, it follows that the Church is not with them, when the truth lies buried. Paul does not wish that any society in which the truth of God does not hold a lofty and conspicuous place, shall be acknowledged to be a Church. The true mark of the Church is not found in Rome. The mistake arises from this, that they do not consider that the truth of God is maintained by the pure preaching of the gospel."

This view of Calvin agrees with the definition of the Church set out in the Articles of the Church of England—"Of the Church: The visible Church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure Word of God is preached, and the Sacrament be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same. The Church of Rome hath erred in matters of faith."

The Church of Scotland and other reformed Churches hold identical views. Emphasis must be laid on purity of faith and on Scriptural teaching if the Church on earth is to be the pillar and ground of truth. The identity of its faith from age to age is secured by its continuing to teach in accordance with Holy Scripture, after the model of the best and earliest days of our faith.

The true Church is neither in Rome nor in Canterbury nor in Geneva nor in Wittenberg, but in Christ.

THE BIBLE AGAINST ROME.

* Scriptures.

The Scriptures should not be withheld from the people.

- Romans i. 7 . This Epistle addressed to all at Rome.
- 1 Cor. i. 2 . This Epistle addressed to all believers at Corinth, and to all that invoke the name of Christ.
- 1 Thess. v. 27 . This Epistle to be read to all the brethren.
- 1 Peter i. 1 . This Epistle addressed to the strangers dispersed throughout Pontus, Galatia, etc.

The Scriptures to be searched and read.

- John v. 39 . Search the Scriptures, they testify of Christ.
- Acts xvii. 10, 11 Inhabitants of Berea commended for searching the Scriptures.
- Apoc. (Rev.) i. 3 Blessed is he that readeth the words of this Prophecy.

Error proceeds from Ignorance of the Scriptures.

- Matt. xxii. 29-32 Sadducees denied the Resurrection through ignorance of the Scriptures.
- Acts iii. 14-17 . The Jews, through ignorance of Scriptures, put Jesus Christ to death.

Private judgment appealed to.

- Luke xii. 57 . Why even of yourselves, do you not judge that which is just.
- Acts xvii. 11 . Inhabitants of Berea tested, for themselves, the preaching of Paul.
- 1 Cor. x. 15 . I speak as to wise men, judge ye yourselves what I say.
- 1 Thess. v. 21 . Prove all things.
- 1 Peter iii. 15 . Be ready to give a reason for your faith.

Scriptures a sufficient Rule of Faith.

- Psalms cxviii.
(cxix) 105, God's Word a lamp and a 130 light.
- Isaiah viii. 20 . The law and the testimony to be appealed to.
- Luke xvi 29, 31 Moses and the Prophets to guide brethren of the rich man.

* Bible forbidden to the laity by the Council of Toulouse, A.D. 1229.

- John xx. 31 . Gospel written that we might believe and have life.
- Acts viii. 26-39 . The eunuch, through reading the Scriptures, found Jesus, and went on his way rejoicing.
- 2 Tim. iii. 15 . Holy Scripture sufficient to instruct Timothy to salvation.
- 1 John i. 4 . These things written that our joy might be full.

Our Saviour and His Apostles always appealed to the Scriptures, never to tradition ("of the Elders").

Matthew iv. 7, 10	Acts i. 20
" xxii. 31	" xiii. 29,33
Mark xi. 17	John ii. 17
Luke iv. 17	" x. 34
" x 26	" xx. 31
Luke xxi. 22	Acts xviii. 28
" xxi. 22	" xviii. 28
" xxii. 37	" xxvi. 22
" xxiv. 27	1 Cor. iv. 6

Tradition, as proved by Christ (Matthew xv. 3-9), made void the Commandment of God. Is it likely, therefore, that a mischievous and unreliable agency such as this would have been entrusted with the transmission of Divine truth to us?

Under the O.T. dispensation the written Word was the standard authority; departure from it to tradition led to grievous error. Under the N.T. dispensation we therefore argue the same kind of authority.

NOTE.—Apocryphal Books of O.T. have no claim to a place in the Canon of Scripture, since:—

- Not one of them is extant in Hebrew—most written in the Greek language, except the fourth book of Esdras, which is only extant in Latin.
- Written subsequently to the cessation of the prophetic spirit. The Jews unanimously agree that the prophetic spirit ceased with Malachi.
- No direct claim to inspiration advanced by the writers.
- Jewish Church never received them into the sacred Canon. (Words of God committed to the Jews. Romans iii. 2.)
- No part of them quoted by Christ or by any of His Apostles. Philo and Josephus, who flourished in the first century of the Christian era, are totally silent concerning them.
- Not admitted into the Canon of Scripture during first four centuries of Christian Church.

- Never read in Christian Church until fourth century; and even then not, as Jerome informs us, to establish any doctrine. ("Horne's Introduction", vol. I., Appendix No. 1.)

Tradition.

Rome regards unwritten traditions, relating as well to faith as to morals, as of equal authority with the Books of the Old and New Testament.

Douay Bible regards tradition as mischievous. Matt. xv. 3, 6, 9 God's Commandments made void by it.

Colossians ii. 8. Beware of the tradition of men.

Titus i. 14 . Not to heed commandments of men.

The mere existence of the written word is prima facie evidence (a) against the reliability of tradition; (b) in favour of the assertion that Holy Scripture contains all things necessary to salvation.

(a) If tradition were a thoroughly reliable guide—

Why should Jeremias have been commanded "Saying, take thee a roll of a book, and thou shalt write in it all the words that I have spoken to thee against Israel and Juda, and against all the nations from the day that I spoke to thee, from the days of Josias even to this day?" (Jeremias xxxvi. 2);

Why should St. Luke write to Theophilus "That thou mayest know the verity of those words in which thou hast been instructed?" (Luke i. 3, 4);

Why should St. John write "That you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in His name?" (John xx. 31.)

(b) It being thus necessary to reduce God's word to writing implies the fact that nothing essential to salvation was omitted from the Scriptures.

Roman Catholic tradition not of God but of men—

If this tradition and the Bible proceeded from the same author their teachings ought to be in agreement. But the teachings of Romish tradition contradict those of the Bible; therefore, Romish tradition is not of God, but of men.

* Transubstantiation.

Rome teaches that in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper there is made a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood of Christ, and that in this most holy Sacrament there are truly, really, and substantially the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ.

* Transubstantiation adopted by Fourth Lateran Council, A.D. 1215.

Douay Bible opposed to such teaching.

Matt. xxvi. 29 . Contents of cup after consecration, called the fruit of the vine.

1 Cor. xi. 23-28. Consecrated elements spoken of as bread, three times.

John vi. 64 . The Spirit quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing.

Luke xxii. 19 . "Do this for a commemoration of Me." Can we Commemorate a person or event that is present?

In proof of His Miracles, Christ appealed to the senses and reason of the people, e.g.—

Mark ii. 9-12 . Sick of the palsy made to walk.

Luke xxiv. 39 . "See My hands and My feet; handle and see."

John xx. 27 . Thomas invited to place his hand in the wounded side.

Acts i. 3 . "To whom also He showed Himself, alive, after His passion, by many proofs."

Can Rome give the same kind of evidence in support of "transubstantiation"?

In the expressions, "This is My body", "This is My blood", the verb "to be" is used in the sense of "represents".

EXAMPLES OF THIS USE.

John x. 9 . Christ represents the door.

John xv. 1 . Christ represents the vine; the Father represents the husbandman.

1 Cor. x. 4 . The rock represents Christ.

* Virgin Mary.

Rome teaches that the Blessed Virgin Mary was conceived without sin.

Douay Bible contradicts this, since:—

Rom. iii. 23 . All have sinned.

" v. 12 . Death passed upon all men because of sin.

Gal. iii. 22 . Scripture hath concluded all under sin.

Luke i. 47 . "My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour."

1 Tim. i. 15 . Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.

Rome teaches that the B.V.M. is the "Refuge of Sinners".

Douay Bible teaches that Christ is the Refuge of Sinners.

Matt. xi. 28 . Come to Me, all you that labour and are burdened, and I will refresh you.

John vi. 37 . Him that cometh to Me, I will not cast out.

That no such pre-eminence in the B.V.M. is recognised by the Douay Bible, appears further from:—

Matt. xii. 46-50 Those who do the will of Mark iii. 31-35 . God—all on the same level.

Luke viii. 19-21

It is significant that Matthew and Mark, in recording this incident, represents Christ as placing His mother last ("The same is my brother, and my sister, and my mother"), while the multitude place her first, ("Behold, Thy mother and thy brethren without seek for Thee.")

Luke xi. 27-28 . "Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the Word of God and keep it," replied Christ to a woman who would extol the B.V.M.

John ii. 1-4 . "Christ refuses to permit even His mother to suggest to Him what He should do."

The following are the twenty-four passages in the New Testament where the Blessed Virgin is named, directly or indirectly:—

Matthew i. 16.	Luke ii. 19.
Matthew i. 18-25.	Luke ii. 22.
Matthew ii. 11.	Luke ii. 33-35.
Matthew ii. 13.	† Luke ii. 41-50.
Matthew ii. 20-21.	* Luke ii. 51.
† Matthew xii. 46-50.	† Luke viii. 19-21.
Matthew xiii. 55.	† Luke xi. 27-28.
† Mark iii. 31-35.	† John ii. 1-5.
Mark vi. 3.	John ii. 12.
* Luke i. 26-56.	* John xix. 25-27.
Luke ii. 5-7.	Acts i. 14.
Luke ii. 16.	Galatians iv. 4.

In favour of the cultus those marked* are quoted by Rome.

Against it those marked†.

Her name is not mentioned in any of the Epistles. (See also "Saints".)

Works.

Rome teaches that good works done by the grace of God add to the sinner's justified state.

Douay Bible contradicts the doctrine.

Luke xvii. 10 . Unprofitable, even after doing all that is commanded us.

Romans iii. 24 . Justified freely by His grace.

Romans xi. 6 . Saved by grace, not by works.

Eph. ii. 5 . By Christ's grace we are saved.

" ii. 8-9 . By grace, not by works, we are saved.

Titus iii. 5 . Not by works of justice which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us.

* Immaculate Conception of B.V.M. adopted A.D. 1854.

Titus iii. 7 . We are heirs of everlasting life by His grace.

Faith must be proved by good works (James ii. 18); yet the works springing from a lively faith do not merit salvation, as is clear from foregoing texts.

will have to excuse but also to rectify."

He noted that most of the priests will have a better background and a more polished education than the workers generally have.

"The training they received, their culture, their habits and those of the class in which they grew up should not hamper their action in the working class," he said.

Necessary.

The Cardinal acknowledged that worker-priest movement is necessary because of the present situation of the working class. He said only that necessary preparations had to be made before the new experiment starts.

The priests who will be chosen "will be free of all parish work".

"Their role", Cardinal Feltin added "will be to implement the Church in the proletarian world from which it is almost totally absent, a world which is so called and hostile that the work of the Catholic Action (a lay movement) is insufficient."—A.P.

No General Holiday on March 17.

The Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Brian Maginess) replying to a question in the Ulster House of Commons on Tuesday on the claiming of March 17 as a general holiday, said that, unfortunately, the day had been used and the name of St. Patrick invoked to inflame feeling and create bitterness and, indeed, not infrequently the passions of the crowd, roused by speeches which rarely touched upon the subject of hagiology, sought vent in breaches of the peace.

Mr. Maginess rejected the request by Mr. H. Diamond (Rep.-Lab., Falls) for a general holiday.

He added that if the day were observed in the spirit of the doctrine of Christianity preached by St. Patrick, one of which was "Blessed are the Peacemakers", Mr. Diamond's desire for its more general recognition might attract much wider support.

If Mr. Diamond could prevail on his colleagues and followers to look upon the day in a light very different from that in which they regarded it at present and to use it as an opportunity to propagate that doctrine of peace to which St. Patrick devoted his life and work, then he could be assured of more general support in the matter.

"Inhuman Treatment" in Guise of Education.

A dossier of complaints compiled by the Schoolchildren's Protection Association, showed that "thousands of children were daily suffering the most inhuman and beastly treatment that one could imagine under the guise of education," said Mrs. Constance O'Connell, secretary of the association, when she addressed a meeting of the Irish Housewives' Association in Dublin recently.

"Little boys and girls from six years of age are beaten and punished with any instrument that comes to the hand of an infuriated teacher," Mrs. O'Connell added. "Some are systematically beaten with heavy pointers and leather straps."

Mrs. O'Connell complained of the barrier raised against parents who wanted cases of brutality against children investigated. Parents were often abused by teachers and school managers and ordered to remove their children from the national schools. "Legally this cannot be done", Mrs. O'Connell said, "but in actual fact it is happening frequently, and is aided considerably by the inactivity of the Department of Education."

Girls as well as boys were treated with the same inhumanity, yet the Department of Education had published rules and regulations which clearly showed that no corporal punishment should be given to children except with a light cane on the open hand, and then only for grievous transgressions. It was strictly forbidden to punish physically a child for failure at lessons. In mixed schools, masters had been known to beat adolescent girls with their fists and even kick them.

The lecturer said that she was aware that Irish schools had many fine teachers and many of them worked in overcrowded classrooms, but she did not think that such appalling difficulties were justification for brutality against defenceless children.

She said that she could see no justification for children being beaten for failure in the religious knowledge classes, and there had been many complaints from parents of punishment being inflicted for failure in Irish.

Parents were being forced into the law courts to try to have their children protected in accordance with Government regulations while receiving compulsory education. Even in these courts the extraordinary barrier against parents still seemed evident.—"Irish Times", 24/2/'55.

[Our experience is that a great deal of investigation is required before the educational system here is condemned. School managers are almost always clergymen—Ed.]

The Roman Catholic Viewpoint — "Heretics, Imposters."

"The Protestant Bible is not the word of God. You are not allowed without very serious reasons to assist at marriages, or funerals, at which heretical ministers officiate . . . The ministers of the various sects have no authority, no commission from God, they are imposters." (The New Mission Book, pp 383, 400, 401.)

A Bible in Modern Russia.

A new translation of the Russian Bible is being undertaken by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The Russian Bible now in use in the Greek Orthodox Church is in language more archaic to Russian ears than the Authorised Version is to English. The new translation is being done into modern idiomatic Russian by émigré scholars in Paris and the first draft has been completed. It will take a few years yet before the final copy is ready for the printers. Copies will be sold to Russians in every part of the world except the Soviet Union.

The society, which celebrated its third jubilee last year (it was founded in 1804), published in London that year 1,200,000 copies of the complete Bible, over half a million Testaments, and over a million particular books of the Bible. These figures are of London publishing only and do not include printings in foreign countries for the society. All Authorised Version Bibles have to be printed either by Eyre and Spottiswoode, the Queen's printers, or by the Oxford or Cambridge University Presses, or by Collins in Scotland. The rest of this huge annual publishing order is distributed among a dozen or so big printers. The jubilee Bible has proved very popular at 7s. 6d., and the society has sold nearly a quarter of a million. It is printed in attractive type and has 500 factual illustrations.

Boy's Decision Overrules Pre-Marriage Agreement.

(From The Christian Science Monitor)

New York State's highest tribunal, the court of appeals, has held that a child of 12 years or over has a right to choose his own religion regardless of a pre-marital agreement which may have existed between his parents.

This is an important affirmation of an essential element in the freedom of worship guaranteed by the first amendment to the United States constitution.

One might wish that the court had set forth in a full opinion the reasoning on which its ruling was based, rather than in a brief court order. But the majority of five to two, by which the conclusion was reached, is expressive in itself, even as against an extended dissent.

The effect of the action, upholding the findings of a referee, was to set aside an earlier order of a lower court that the boy involved should be reared in the Roman Catholic faith because of an agreement signed by his parents before marriage.

Another Priest Sees the Light.

Mario Lorenzetti, for many years a Roman Catholic priest and during the last war a chaplain who was much decorated by the U.S. forces, has obeyed the call of the Gospel. He is the tenth priest to be baptized by the Church of Christ's missionaries in Italy. He was recently baptized in the waters of the Mediterranean Sea. — "Converted Catholic Magazine."

Presbyterian Assembly (N.S.W.) Denounces R.C. Methods.

In New South Wales, The Presbyterian Assembly recently carried the following resolution :

"That the Assembly call upon our people to give Christian leadership within the political, industrial and social life of the State and whilst refraining from all unjust and unworthy methods and having due regard to the individual Roman Catholic, to resist steadfastly every attempt to bring Australia under Roman Catholic domination.

"In order to ensure that Christian democracy shall not perish from our land, commend to our ministers and congregations the advisability of establishing in every parish a training centre in which our youth may be prepared for a full share in public and civic affairs and for positions in the Commonwealth and State Public Service."

Germany—Lutheran Protest.

The Roman Church in Germany recently dedicated the whole German nation to Mary as the Mother of God. This has no practical value of course, because Mary has no greater authority in heaven than any other sinner saved by the Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. Nevertheless, it is a studied insult to Protestantism and caused Bishop Meiser, presiding Bishop of the United Evangelical Lutheran Church of Germany, to make a sturdy declaration of the Protestant position.

"As Protestant Christians, who acknowledge allegiance solely to the Word of God, we are forced to make a definite public protest against our inclusion in this dedication. Dedication to the immaculate heart of Mary is incompatible with the Word of God.

"If a Cardinal dedicates the whole of Germany to the immaculate heart of Mary, this can only be interpreted in one way: that the Roman Curia is disposing of us Protestant Christians without our knowledge or consent, in a way which is radically opposed to our beliefs and convictions. This regrettable encroachment on our faith reminds us of the letter written to Wilhelm I in 1873, in which the then Pope claimed that everyone who had been baptised was thereby subject to the Papacy.

"Wilhelm I replied as follows: 'The Protestant faith does not permit us to accept any mediator between ourselves and God other than our Lord Jesus Christ.' That is our answer too."

R.C.'s Are Scarce in Rural America.

An official publication of the National Roman Catholic Rural Life Conference in the United States recently gave out the following information:

There are 78,177 towns, villages and hamlets in the United States with less than 2,500 population.

Of these 68,524 small towns have no Roman Catholic church.

93.1 per cent. of these small towns have no Roman Catholic priest.

... Of the 150,000 churches in country places, 140,350 are Protestant, and only 9,461 (6.9 per cent.) are Roman Catholic.

Monsignor Liqutti, director of the Conference, stated in 1950 that 80 per cent. of the R.C. population in the U.S. live in cities of 100,000 or more. He also stated in 1945 that only 5 per cent of Roman Catholics live on farms.—"The Sentinel," Toronto, Feb., '55.

Vatican Loses Grip in Italy.

The population in Italy is 45,526,750, of this number 45,349,220 profess to be Roman Catholics, which means that non-Roman Catholics number a mere 177,529.

The secular American magazine LIFE which cannot be accused of being biased religiously makes the following comment on the religious life of this overwhelmingly Roman Catholic country, the home of the Pope, and the centre of Papal power:—

"Another essential fact is that Italy is not quite so Catholic as it might seem. Polls and ecclesiastical records reveal, for example, such facts as: less than 10% of the professional class in bustling Milan regularly attends Mass; not more than one third of Rome's population goes to church on Sundays. Italy's priesthood is miserably supported by the people, and its numbers have been declining for more than 70 years.

"History helps explain why the Vatican's forceful excommunication of Communists in 1949 struck with such relatively little impact in Italy. One need only remember when Italy became a nation in 1870: Garibaldi's 'patriot' armies storming Rome's Porta Pia; the Pope becoming an angry 'prisoner' in his enclave, Mazzini lashing the Vatican as 'that gigantic ruin' and the Pope excommunicating the heroes of Italian nationhood. The lusty political war between papal and secular powers in Italy has, century upon century, been vivid and exuberant: it was almost 200 years before any Reformation when Bernabò of Milan greeted papal legates bearing his excommunication by forcing them to eat the bulls—parchment, cords, lead seals and all.

"To-day the Reddest region of Italy—Emilia

—Romagna—generally fits a section of the once powerful Papal States, which could never command lasting loyalty of the people.”—(quoted in “The Christian Irishman”, Belfast.)

Come to Rome!

There can be no church unity with out the Roman Catholic Church, and no union with that church without acceptance of its faith, its system of worship, and its hierarchy, according to an article in “l'Osservatore Romano”, official Vatican journal. The article was written by the Rev. Carlo Boyer, prefect general of studies and dean of the theological faculty of the Pontifical Gregorian University of Rome.

Commenting on a statement by a World Council of Churches' official to the effect that it was necessary to work to bring about a situation where churches would have so much in common that there would be no reason for them to remain separated, it said: “It is clear that if that result were obtained only for the communities meeting in Evanston, it would in no way be Christian unity, which will exist only when those communities will have ‘so many things in common’ that there will be no reason for them to remain separated from the Roman Catholic Church. This is a situation of fact that should make all men of goodwill reflect. It also is clear that one cannot be with the Roman Catholic Church without accepting its faith, its system of worship and its hierarchy. It follow that one cannot escape from this dilemma: either Jesus Christ did not wish unity of his church, or he wished all those who believe in him to be members of the Roman Catholic Church.”—“The Churchman”.

THE MARIAN MARTYRS.

Smithfield after 400 Years

By S. T. Bindoff

(In The Manchester Guardian, 4/2/'55).

The many who will pass through Smithfield today may include a few whose business is commemorative. For it was there on the afternoon of February 4, 1555, that John Rogers, in the famous phrase, “broke the ice” for conscience' sake, and this is a fitting day on which to salute him and those who followed his heroic example. There were to be nearly three hundred of them, besides the unknowable number who died in prison. With perhaps half a dozen exceptions they are all in Foxe's great book, and it is to him that they owe their earthly immortality.

What Foxe has to tell of them has not passed unchallenged: the martyrologist has been examined as rigorously as the martyr. Of the two grounds on which Foxe has been impugned the first, that of factual and textual unreliability, has proved less ample than it once appeared. Those—like John Marbeck of musical fame—who, as Fuller heard it said, were burnt in Foxe in the reign of Queen Mary and drank sack in the days of Queen Elizabeth would not have made much of a carousal. Similarly, while Foxe certainly took liberties with his documents, there is no reason to suspect him of deliberately distorting them. The inquiring layman may still read his Foxe without being assailed by doubts at every turn.

The other criticism of Foxe is much weightier. It is that, in the late Wilhelm Schenk's words, the “Book of Martyrs” lies like a great mountain range between us and the facts. This cumulative effect of Foxe's panorama is certainly—as it was meant to be—one not of majesty only but of unity, a unity which embraces minor peaks as well as lofty summits. But is not this unity a fiction, when all that its members have in common is that they were burnt, quick or dead, under Mary, no matter what their heresy or how they maintained or expressed it? Foxe, it is argued, nourished the roots of Anglicanism, and of Anglican hatred of Rome, with martyr blood of diverse and even antipathetic groups.

The Fathers

The argument has least application to John Rogers himself and to his twenty fellows of the cloth. To them Foxe is no barrier but an everlasting pulpit, and he will be a wondrous reader who is not satisfied—one had almost said surfeited—with, say, the 75 pages (in 8 point) reporting Archdeacon Philpot's thirteen examinations in the winter of 1555. What these men, from the Archbishop downwards, could not accept of the dogmas dangled before them, and what their rejection contributed to the English Protestant tradition, these the reader of Foxe is, and has always been, able to determine for himself. It needs no blood-count to establish Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, and their fellows as the Fathers of the Church of England.

But they were the few, the professional few, and it may perhaps be doubted without impiety whether a Marian persecution which had touched none but them would have stirred a nation never renowned for its love of priests. Common humanity, then and later, would have wept, and admiration uncovered, at great sufferings manfully borne; but might it not all have been dismissed as "priest's matter", the stake being as much the parson's occupational risk as the axe was the politician's?

This the lay victims ensured that it should never be. Outnumbering the clergy's by thirteen to one, it was their charred bodies which piled up the monstrous total. Yet in Foxe they do so by little more than enumeration. Our ignorance of them remains profound and baffling and any argument about them the argument from silence. What we do know is that it was they who gave the persecution its geographical setting, in London and the South-eastern Counties, and its social stratification, in the ranks of the "mechanick fellows", the artisans and tradesfolk of one large and many smaller towns, and of a semi-industrialised countryside. Neither background will puzzle us any more than it can have puzzled contemporaries. A dense population, the advance of trade and industry, the influence both of the capital and of the Continent, the heritage of Lollardy and its fusion with foreign heterodoxies, and a recent record of political and social disturbance—all would have helped to fertilise the dissenting soil of these counties. That religion was in turmoil there was notorious before 1553.

If there had to be a heresy hunt its victims lay ready to hand. But would it have come without the reconciliation with Rome? That the Edwardian regime, given a further five years of life, would have continued the burnings which it had begun with Joan Bocher's in 1551 is likely enough; but that it would have achieved a total comparable with Mary's—one speculation rises as high as two-thirds—is to me incredible. That total was the resultant of two forces, the will to coerce and the will to defy coercion, which not only strove with one another but—so the evidence suggests—grew rather than weakened in the conflict. Even granted, therefore, that all the lay martyrs who professed doctrines—call them Anabaptist if you will—which orthodox Protestantism condemned had yielded as little ground before Protestant bishops as before Catholic ones, they could only have been burnt by a Government as persistent in the work as was Mary's.

Responsibility

There has been much apportioning of responsibility for the burnings. Queen and King, Council, Parliament, local authorities, bishops (with special reference to Gardiner, Pole and Bonner)—all have been brought into the reckoning. Recent opinion, notably that of Father Hughes, is disposed to ascribe more immediate and continuous responsibility to the civil and less to the ecclesiastical power; and there is the inescapable fact that no one burned—not even Rawlins White, whom the Cardiff magistrates in their ignorant zeal would have executed without the writ—save on the specific order of the Council. On the civil side, if not on the spiritual as well, it rested with the Crown to regulate the pace, and I take it as proven that Mary drove the machine faster than any of the other leaders would have done. It was this unique and fatal combination of final authority with fixity of purpose which alone kept relighting the fires which the opposing resolution of the martyrs was rendering futile. That Edward VI, still less anyone acting in his name, would or could have acted with the same blind obstinacy I do not believe. The Great Persecution could have taken place under no other sovereign than Mary.

Out of that evil was to come evil, in that legacy of hatred of which we may perhaps hope that the end is nigh. In this, as in so much else, Sir Thomas More had shown prophetic insight. How many in Mary's day prayed God, as he had done a generation before,

"that some of us, as high as we seem to sit upon the mountains treading heretics under our feet like ants, live not to see the day that we would gladly wish to be at league and composition with them to let them have their churches quietly to themselves, so that they would be contented to let us have ours quietly to ourselves"?

That More's and Mary's, Church had so long to wait for that day it owed less to a man who made a Book of Martyrs than to a woman who made martyrs.

But out of that evil came also good. Clergymen who would themselves have burnt heretics died helping to found a Church which, in whatever else it failed, was to make a negligible contribution to the history of the stake. Humble men and women by their sacrifice expiated, and helped to eradicate, the bloodthirsty belief that heresy was inseparable from sedition. Freedom of conscience was to be long in coming, freedom of worship longer still, and neither, alas, has yet entered fully into its kingdom. But none of us who enjoy these things should forget that company of martyrs who, whatever they hoped or believed their sufferings would achieve on earth, served by their example to ensure that we should have freedom, and have it more abundantly.

THE DIET OF SPIRES.

The term Protestant was first used at the German Imperial Diet of Spires in 1529 and the circumstances which gave rise to it show that the word had a definite positive meaning. There had been a previous Diet at Spires in 1526, nine years after the Reform cause had been started by Martin Luther, when the two parties were so evenly divided that a compromise was agreed on, and it was ruled that until the Emperor (then absent) returned to Germany, "each state should behave in its own territory in such a manner as to be able to render an account to God and the Emperor". This ruling, it was claimed, amounted to a temporary freedom of worship, and was, as one historian put it, almost equivalent to a toleration of Luther's opinions.

Under this practical liberty the Reformation cause in Germany made great strides, creating much uneasiness in the papal party, which, by a vigorous effort, flocked to this second Diet at Spires, 1529, bent on carrying a decree which would re-establish their own supremacy as formerly. In the continued absence of the Emperor, his brother, King Ferdinand, a strong papalist, presided, and a decree was proposed by which the tolerating clause of 1526 was greatly modified, for its entire abrogation was seen to be impossible. It would penalise all further innovations and all additional conversions, while tolerating those already made if their forcible suppression was seen to be dangerous to the public tranquillity. Before the decree framed in that sense came to the vote, but while it was in debate, the reforming members of the Diet retired temporarily to a side apartment for a separate consultation, and drew up a declaration of their sentiments. It ran:

"We protest and declare herewith openly before God as well as before all men, that we, for us and for our people, neither consent nor adhere in any manner whatsoever to the proposed decree in any thing that is contrary to God, to His Holy Word, to our right of conscience, to the salvation of our souls, and to the last decree of Spires."

Such was the origin of the celebrated PROTEST made on April 19, 1529. It expressed a resolution to maintain their liberty of worship and doctrinal opinion, whereas the Diet was being asked to vote for what was in effect their gradual strangulation. On returning to the assembly they found the decree had been passed, and the president could not be induced to re-open the question.

Finding themselves thus baffled and determined not to yield the point, the reform party continued their deliberations and drew up a statement more at large, embodying their first resolution in it, but accompanying this with a fuller account of their case, with documentary evidence to support it. This was their Protest in an expanded form to go before the whole nation in print and for all time. It bore the name Instrumentum Appellationis, constituting their Appeal, which ended thus:

"We therefore appeal for ourselves, for our subjects, and for all who receive or who shall hereafter receive the Word of God, from all past, present, or future vexatious measures, to his Imperial Majesty, and to a free and universal assembly of holy Christendom."

It was their protest in a legal form for public use, and its date was April 25, 1529, on which day (a Sunday) it was solemnly signed and sealed by all the members of the Diet who were in agreement with it, and these were from that day known as Protestantes, Protestants.

REPLIES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

[We hoped to have replied to some correspondents sooner, but several circumstances debarred us—Ed.].

One writer quite rightly protests against "making a present to the Church of Rome of terms such as 'the Church' and 'Catholic'". We agree fully with him, and are always careful to use these terms in their correct historical and doctrinal sense. But we may have erred. If so, it was quite contrary to our objects and purposes.

There is, however, a use of these terms which we have not felt at liberty to upset. When we reprint extracts from outside sources or give quotations we believe that we are bound to do so accurately. Hence it may be that from time to time the word "Catholic" may really mean "Roman Catholic", and the word "Church" may really mean "Roman Catholicism". But we hope that the fact that they are extracts or quotations is made plain.

Our correspondent, Mr. W. H. Harris, points out the increasing signs of Roman Catholic propaganda in the English press. We have ourselves noted the advertisements of "The Catholic Enquiry Bureau" (or some such name), a Roman Catholic agency for supplying information on Roman Catholicism to non-Roman Catholic enquirers. It seems to be modelled on the lines of the Knights of Columbus (or Columba) in U.S.A. Why do not, the Protestant organisations in Great Britain use advertisements in the daily papers for the same purpose?

CHRIST'S RESURRECTION.

Spring-time in nature coincides with our remembrance of the Resurrection of the Redeemer. The new life surging around us is symbolic of the New Life of the Soul. We recall the triumph of Our Lord over sin and death, and recollect that He said "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die it abideth alone; but if it die it bringeth forth much fruit" (John 12. 24). We think also of St. Paul's words (1 Cor. 15. 36) "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die: and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain . . . but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body." Thus the course of the season and of nature enlightens us: the annual recurrence of awakening life in the world brings to the thoughtful mind the life beyond the grave which is assured to His people by Christ's victory—"Because I live ye shall live also". The miracle of the Resurrection is the supreme miracle revealed to us.

As it is a miracle we do not succeed in explaining how the Resurrection came about. It is sufficient for the faithful to say with St Peter "Jesus of Nazareth . . . being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken and by wicked hands have crucified and slain; whom God raised up, having loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that he should be holden of it" (Acts 2. 24). The Jews who listened to Peter might reject the Apostle's confidence that it was simply impossible for death to hold Our Lord, but we believe as St. Peter did, and know that it was the Father's will not only that His Son should die for us, but that He should rise for our justification. It is easy to believe this if we have the spiritual enlightenment which enables us to appreciate the true character of Our Lord, and if, as well, we have a grasp of Holy Scripture. Men of many races, creeds, and periods have believed in a future life. Only in the true religion which God has given us in His Son is faith in a future life demonstrated to a certainty by Christ's resurrection.

If we believe that Our Lord Jesus Christ is Israel's promised Messiah, and that His sufferings are accurately foretold in the Old Testament, we must naturally expect to learn from the same source of the outcome of those sufferings, and of Messiah's unconquerable power. We find that the Old Testament is more concerned with His death (e.g. Psalms and Isaiah), but nevertheless speaks of His rising from the dead in a positive manner—

"I have set the Lord always before Me, because He is at my right hand I shall not be moved. Therefore My heart is glad and My glory rejoiceth: My flesh also shall rest in hope. For Thou wilt not leave My soul in hell: neither wilt Thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. Thou wilt show Me the path of life: in Thy presence is fullness of joy: at Thy right hand are pleasures for evermore" (Psalm 16. 8-11).

Someone will say that it is improper and "uncritical" to take a passage from a psalm which is "Davidic", and to treat it as a prophecy of Christ. But that is exactly what the Holy Spirit has done, for He guided St. Peter to the right interpretation of the passage. St. Peter (Acts 2. 29) expounded this passage, and said that David was a prophet who "spake of the resurrection of Christ that His soul was not left in hell, neither did His flesh see corruption." Here we have the Spirit's interpretation of the psalm. Could anything be more decisive?

Again, we have in the Old Testament (in one of its latest books) the prediction "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (Daniel 12. 2). When Our Lord went to Martha, newly bereaved of her brother Lazarus, He said "Thy brother shall rise again". Martha said "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day". She knew that from the teaching of the Book of Daniel, from Holy Scripture. We need not desert that in order to enlarge upon the development of thought about a future life among the Pharisees in the century or so before the Incarnation. But Our Lord instructed her plainly that He is the true significance of the Words in Daniel—"Jesus said to her, I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die." If Jesus is "the Resurrection", it is clear that Daniel's words are a prophecy of His rising from the dead. It is well-understood that we have not to assert that the writer of a prophetic passage understood the full implications of his words: it often happened that contemporary understanding of a statement in Scripture fell far short of the full truth.

So much then for the Old Testament perception of Messiah's triumph. That stupendous event could not have been foretold in any detail, nor was it necessary that it should be, any more than it was necessary that the mystery of the calling of the Gentiles should have been fully revealed to the prophets. St. Paul called that "a mystery" which in his time had been unfolded. So we may think of the Resurrection. It had to come to the Jewish church and to the world as God's unprecedented act.

But if the Old Testament is limited in its doctrine of resurrection we have the plain statements of Our Lord Himself during His earthly ministry that "He must be raised up". Matt. 16. 21. "From that time forth began Jesus to show unto His disciples how that He must go unto Jerusalem . . . and be killed, and be raised again the third day." Note that Jesus "began to show", a phrase which seems to suggest that He repeatedly directed attention to His death and resurrection.

When they left Caesarea Philippi and returned to Galilee He again spoke of His coming death, and spoke of going to Jerusalem to be slain, and on the third day to rise again (Matt. 20. 19). On the night of the betrayal, before He went to Gethsemane He told His followers that they would be offended in Him that night: that "the sheep would be scattered abroad"—"but after I am risen again I will go before you into Galilee"—Matt. 26. 32.

St. Mark's Gospel records similar instances of Our Lord's prediction (8. 31 : 9. 31 : 14. 28).

St. Luke's Gospel records such a prediction before the Transfiguration (9. 22).

St. John has kept for us the following—"The Jews said to Him 'What sign showest Thou unto us, seeing that Thou doest these things (the cleansing of the Temple)?' Jesus answered 'Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up'." John adds "He spake of the temple of His body".

The one thing made plain to us is that Jesus was not a false prophet. Sceptical men have tried from time to time to overthrow the credibility of the Gospels, and to prove that they are concocted narrations, but all the evidence, internal character, and ancient testimony vouch for their reliability. No writings of antiquity have been subjected to such continuous examination and minute scrutiny from every angle, linguistic, historic, philosophic, theological. Their trustworthiness is unshaken, and the hostile theories scarcely find mention in the N.T. Introductions.

Our Lord said He would rise again, and He did. There are the simple facts.

We have our witnesses also to the Resurrection. We have already referred to St. Peter's declaration of his experience—"This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses" (Acts 2. 32).

In Acts 4. 33 we read "with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus". It was not a matter of saying "we believe in the resurrection of Jesus" as we do, but a matter of saying "we saw Him. We were there at the empty tomb. We were in the Upper Room. We saw the nail-prints in His hands and feet. We saw His ascension."

In Acts 5. 32 they say "we are His witnesses of these things, and so is also the Holy Ghost".

In Acts 13 a new figure appears as a witness, Saul of Tarsus who had a vision of the risen Lord on the road to Damascus. Had Jesus not really risen from the dead there could have been no foundation for such a vision, and a conversion based on it would be an illusion. St. Paul's later life, and his consistent testimony after he had long opportunity to doubt the reality of his experience, must satisfy us of the fact. In this chapter Paul gives his testimony—"God raised Him from the dead, and He was seen many days of them which came up with Him from Galilee to Jerusalem, who are His witnesses unto the people." "He whom God raised again, saw no corruption." Long after this the main point about St. Paul in the eyes of outsiders was that he affirmed Jesus to be alive (Acts 25. 19).

* * *

The Resurrection of Jesus is a constant theme in St. Paul's letters, just as it is the underlying principle of his faith, life, hope, and teaching. This may be said of all the apostles, of their converts, and of all sincere Christians from that day to this.

They and we believe that Jesus our Lord was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification, (Rom. 4. 25).

There is no need to labour what St. Paul has told us in 1 Cor. 15. 19-23. "Christ is risen from the dead and became the first-fruits of them that slept." We are linked with Him in His resurrection life—because "He lives we shall live also".

For the Christian of the present day the promise implicit in Christ's resurrection is the one hopeful thing we have. The wretched state of humanity, worse than that of the heathen world of Romans, chapter 1, because more deliberate, calculated, and skilful in its wickedness, offers no hope to anyone, and the loss of hope is perhaps the cause of much of the world's badness. More and more it behoves us who have the true faith and hope to shine as lights of the world, and to be the salt of the earth. The future, an eternal one, is ours, because it is His.

"MARTIN LUTHER" AN APPRAISAL OF THE FILM

Many of our readers, as individuals or in organised groups have proved that press notices of what is likely to be "the Film of the Year" gave no exaggerated account of the subject. In fact, if we may quote the Queen of Sheba's words on the wisdom of Solomon, "the half was never told".

A magnificent panorama of Renaissance and Reformation pageantry passed before our eyes for nearly two hours, taking us from Germany of the Princes to "Holy Rome" of the Popes, showing us Kaiser and Cardinal, Pope and Peasant, in the authentic costumes—not of twentieth century Hollywood—but of sixteenth century Europe. Here were the chilly cloisters of Erfurt, where young Martin Luther joined the Augustinian Order in order to "win heaven by monkery", and where that "safe man" Staupitz, the Vicar-General, alternately sympathised with and discouraged his "fightings and fears, within, without!" There was the Castle Church of Saxon Wittenberg at whose massive doors the infant Reformation was brought to birth on All Saints' Eve, 1517, and where the Papal Bull of Excommunication was committed to the flames beneath the "Reformation Oak".

Then we saw Worms, where the "Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation" sat in serried ranks to pass sentence on that single, solitary monk whose "HERE I STAND . . . GOD BE MY HELPER!" has won the world's regard, more than all the Councils or the Kaisers. Here, too, was Rome, where Luther sought to find salvation and found only graver doubts—Rome in the flower-time of Renaissance decadence, where priests and princes chaffered with the holder of "the See of Peter", as to who should bid highest for his favours!

So much for the places—now for the people. A magnificent full length portrait of the Saxon Elector Frederick the Wise, shows the ideal "godly Prince" of the Reformers—a loyal patron of the Cause which he championed, if sometimes impatient of theological niceties. Then there is the diplomatic Court Chaplain of Saxony, Spalatin, and two fine cameos are given us of Luther's colleagues, the most impetuous and radical of the Lutheran Reformers, Carlstadt, Melancthon, John Tetzel, hawk of Indulgences, is fixed for all time as the villain of the piece, selling pardons as a rag-man of to-day offers balloons in exchange for bones and bottles. They, too, were there in plenty as the "relics of Rome" were poured out in profusion to the disgust of Luther's honest peasant's soul, as to the fastidious taste of Erasmus, the reclusive student whose New Testament was "the egg which Luther hatched"! The fury of John Eck, defeated in debate, the disdain of Cardinal Cajetan for a "quarrel of monks", the Pope's concern on hearing that "the sales are down" will long remain with us. So, too, will the maiden modesty and gentle humility of his "Katie", the escaped nun whom our regenerated monk made the model of church-going, child-rearing, and kitchen-keeping Christian womanhood in her native land.

Above all, however, we shall remember the noble interpretation of a character and the expressive features of Niall MacGinnis who has made the Luther of Legend into "a man of like passion as we are". In particular we shall recall with gratitude his First Mass, showing us the sensitive soul that lay behind the sturdy form, and the inner conflict that made him query whether this was indeed "the Way". Another mountain peak of the film was clearly his flinging down the gauntlet to Church and Diet at Worms, when the tears streaming down his cheeks and half-heard voice, he gave to the world those deathless words, "HERE I STAND . . . I CAN DO NO OTHER . . . GOD BE MY HELPER." Then, emerging from his "Patmos" in the Wartburg and with the German Bible beneath his arm, monk's robes cast aside, he scattered like chaff those well-meaning zealots whose premature iconoclasm might well have set back the clock of Reform which he had set in motion with such pure and peaceable wisdom. The time for a Calvin was not yet.

Where lay, then, the heart of the man and the genius of his message? Surely in one of the film's quietest moments, so quiet that only those with eyes to see it saw—and seeing understood. In a moment of exultation in the Augustian Library

Luther finds, and reads aloud to Vicar-General Staupitz these words of Paul—"THE JUST SHALL LIVE BY FAITH." To make assurance doubly sure he writes upon the Bible's margin the qualifying word—"ALONE"!

So the curtain of history rings down on an era when God once more broke through the barriers of time and space and entered history through the life of one "little monk". Rightly enough the curtain of the film came down upon the crowded Castle Church of Wittenberg, a great congregation pouring in through its portals, the Reformer-Pastor at prayer before his God. Above them all, the mighty organ pours out the liberated soul of Luther in his inspired paraphrase of the 46th Psalm, in which we can still hear the majestic march of the embattled hosts of the Lord Sabaoth, who puts to flight the Prince of Hell and vindicates His slaughtered saints.

"THE JUST SHALL LIVE BY FAITH."
That is Luther's Gospel.

*"A Stronghold sure is God our Lord,
A bulwark never failing."*

That is his Gospel set to music, an international anthem of the World Church, "the Marseillaise of the Reformation." M.W.D.

NOT POSSIBLE TO CREATE RELATIONS WITH ROME, ANGLICAN REPORT SAYS.

A report of importance by the Committee on Protestant-Roman Catholic relations to the General Synod of the Church of England in Canada, meeting on Toronto, Nov. 15, stated that the word "relations" may seem to many to be a misnomer.

"So perhaps it is", says the report. "Relations are a two-sided affair and unless those with whom one wishes to establish friendly relations make some effort at reciprocation, there is little hope of success. That is, unfortunately, the situation up to the present time."

"Personal relations between individuals often are established; official relationships simply are not countenanced by the Roman Catholic church. Nevertheless, the General Synod committee on Protestant-Roman Catholic relations and the inter-church committee stand ready to do all in their power to express goodwill and friendship to our Roman Catholic brethren who are our fellow citizens in the Dominion."

"Very Intricate."

The committee on relations has Rt. Rev. F. H. Wilkinson, co-adjutor Bishop of Toronto, as chairman, and R. H. Soward, chancellor of Toronto diocese, as secretary. The report was prepared by Dr. J. H. Craig, rector of Grace Church-on-the-Hill, Toronto.

"Much has been accomplished quietly and unobtrusively," says the report. "The whole area of Protestant-Roman Catholic relations is a very intricate one. If one protests too much, he runs the risk of being called a troublemaker; if he protests too little he may wake up to find his rights and privileges seriously curtailed. The Roman Catholic believes that it is his sacred duty to bring all those outside its membership within its fold for their own soul's health. In the circumstances it is not surprising if aggressiveness without due regard for the rights and feelings of others develops."

No Ill-Will to Church.

"Let us state emphatically that we begin our work with no ill-will toward the Roman Catholic church and its people. To say that in our opinion that church makes serious errors in its statement of truth and has been guilty of unwarranted totalitarianism in its method, does not mean that we lack appreciation of its effort to preach the gospel and bring men nearer to Christ. The recognition, however, of its right within its own sphere to do its own work should not be confused with its right to act in altogether unconstitutional and undemocratic ways in this Dominion."

The report goes on to say that since 1841 the Roman Catholic church has fought for the establishment of separate schools in Canada, and for increasing concessions for them. The rights of Roman Catholics, as established by the British North America Act and other "settlements", must be observed "but the attempt to extend those rights to the detriment of the public school system causes grave concern to all who are interested in the well-being of our land. We have noted with some alarm an apparently concerted effort to secure privileges far in excess of what was originally intended and feel that the whole church should be made aware of it."

Oppose Envoy to Vatican.

"There has been unremitting pressure from the Roman Catholic church and certain of its agents, to appoint a Canadian envoy to the Vatican. To such an appointment we are unalterably opposed. We can see no value in it, except the enhancing of the position of the Roman Catholic church in this land. We will continue with the inter-church committee and the Canadian Council of Churches to exercise what influence we can against it."

The report also speaks of the eagerness of the Roman Church to make converts among the Indians and Eskimos "by whatever means they find at hand". These problems require special watching as being vital to the church's work, the report says.

"We feel that our work should continue. If we fail to give leadership to our own people and neglect the opportunity to co-operate with other non-Roman bodies, we may discover some day that we have surrendered by default much of that rich religious heritage which is ours," the report concludes.—"The Sentinel".

CORRESPONDENCE.

23rd February, 1955.

The Secretary,
Connellan Mission Offices,
5 Townsend Street,
Dublin, I.F.S.

Dear Sir,

We enclose herewith a copy of the booklet "Christ Our One and Only Priest" which we have just published.

It occurs to us that this very clear presentation of a most important truth will be of interest to members of the Connellan Mission and that you may care to handle or recommend the booklet.

As you will see, the selling price is 6d. We shall be happy to supply you with copies at 4d. each or quantities of 1,000 or more at 3d. per copy.

May God richly bless your witness to Christ Our Saviour.

Yours sincerely,
W. B. GRANT.

[The pamphlet above-mentioned is one which we can recommend. Its subject is of perennial importance, and goes to the roots of the Christian faith. Careless or compromising thoughts and teaching on this point tend to undermine the whole Christian revelation].

REVIEW.

"A Short History of the Reformation."

The Protestant Truth Society publishes this week a popular history of the Reformation covering the Centuries from Wickliffe to the coming of William of Orange.

It is a marvel of compression, and the twelve chapters are profusely illustrated. It is published at the modest sum of 2s. 0d.

COMMENT.

Cardinal Newman on Justification by Faith.

(J. H. Newman "Autobiographical Memoir" P. 125.)

"... There were four doctrines, all of which he held, as if certain truths—namely, those of the Holy Trinity, of the Incarnation, of Predestination, and of the Lutheran apprehension of Christ—the first three, which are doctrines of the Catholic religion, and, as such, are true, and really subjects of certitude and capable of taking indefectible possession of the mind, and therefore ought not in his case to have faded away, remained indelible through all his changes of opinion: whereas the fourth, which is not true, though he thought it was, and therefore not capable of being held with certitude, or with the promise of permanence, though he thought it was so held, did, in the event, as in the nature of a mere opinion or untrue belief, take its departure from his mind in a very short time, or rather, was not held by him from the first."

Note how Newman treats, after mature reflection, "the Lutheran doctrine of Justification by Faith". We think he means that the doctrine of Justification by Faith is a Lutheran doctrine, not that there is a special Lutheran theory of Justification which is false; and perhaps another doctrine of Justification which is the true one.

The fact is that no matter how a man may dislike, deride, and deny the doctrine of Justification by Faith, it is inescapable. Dr. Karl von Hase in his handbook of Controversial Theology long ago pointed out that it was a common saying in Germany that every man must "turn Lutheran" on his deathbed, because there he must finally rest upon "faith alone". The time for good works is over, and the anxious soul can have no other assurance than faith in Jesus for his hope of salvation. Newman too must have realised that at the last.

COMMENT.

J. H. Newman on the Theatre.

(Letters, Vol. I. p. 315) 1832

"I think I have made up my mind about going to operas etc. I think it allowable—as far as merely going to see the place, etc. in the same sense in which it is allowable to visit the country at all—e.g. I see no objection to going into a heathen country for the sake of seeing it, and going into a play-house is nothing more than this. If I may not go into a place because bad men are in it, where can I go? If indeed, I go for the sake of the amusement—which would be the case if I frequented it—then it would be a different matter; but I go and see, as I go and see a coffee-house, a billiard-room, or a mosque. Nor am I supporting persons in a bad way of life—that is, the actors—for if no one went but strangers as a matter of curiosity, they would have a poor living. Theatres are set up, not as objects of curiosity, but of amusement. I am only seeing what is established and supported: not establishing and supporting it myself."

The reader of this particular "Apologia" for going to the theatre will feel no doubt that it would have been better if Newman had, like the rest of us, gone because he wanted to go, and not offered this moralising defence. It savours of humbug. Perhaps that was to be expected in the attitude towards the theatre in that day. If the theatre is wrong, then it is wrong to go; Newman thought the theatre wrong, yet went. His argument would justify going to far worse places.

What interests us is the type of argument or reasoning he employs. We think some of his theological reasoning was on about the same level.

Figures.

Here are some interesting figures to think about. They are from "the latest edition of the Catholic Directory for Scotland," and are quoted from the Glasgow Observer for 4th February. There are eight dioceses of the Roman Church in Scotland, and in six of these the Roman Catholic population shows an increase. The two which show decreases are Argyll and the Isles and Galloway. Whether the increases are by birth, by immigration, or by conversion, or by all three, is not stated. What should be noted is that Roman Catholics in Scotland last year numbered 774,320, which is an increase of nearly ten thousand—to be exact, 9,489.

Eire and Education—New Protestant Grammar School.

General Mulcahy, the Minister for Education, recently said that the State's approach to education was one which unreservedly accepted the supernatural conception of man's nature and destiny, and the over-riding function of the Minister was to assist parents to educate their children in religion, the religion of the parents' choice.

General Mulcahy was speaking at the opening of a grammar school at Ashtown, Cork. He began by saying that the most important principle of all, to which we were rightly committed in the administration of secondary education, was a principle that was of very great moment to those of the religion of the minority. He said he had spoken of the function of the State in providing adequate grants for the schools and salaries for the teachers, and in ensuring that the teaching given was efficient—but important though these functions may be, they were as nothing in comparison with what was, to his mind, the over-riding function of a Minister for Education. That function was to assist the parents to educate their children in religion, the religion of the parents' choice.

The Minister went on: "In that regard our Irish secondary education system gives freedom to the schools in the highest possible degree. . . We owe to our common Christian heritage that every one of us here to-day would agree that an education which is not informed and vivified by religion is a contradiction in terms.

"It is more than appropriate because of the occasion itself and of the times in which we live that I should record that in its relation with the individual, the family and religion, the State approach to education in the Irish Republic is one which unreservedly accepts the supernatural conception of man's nature and destiny. It accepts that the proper subject of education is man whole and entire, soul united to body in unity of nature, with all his faculties, natural and supernatural, such as right, reason and revelation show him to be.

"It accepts that the foundation and crown of youths' entire training is religion. It is its desire that its teachers, syllabuses and text-books in every branch be informed by the spirit underlying this concept of education, and it is determined to see that such facilities as ecclesiastical authorities consider proper shall be provided in the school for the carrying on of the work of religious education."

It was particularly gratifying, he declared, to recall that, while one of the original aims of the Incorporated Society was to teach English to Irish speakers, for many years Cork Grammar School has also successfully taught Irish to English speakers. On this, and on the progress of the work generally, he congratulated especially the Rev. Mr. Hobson, who from 1922 to 1947 guided the destinies of the school, and the Rev. Mr. Burrows, the present headmaster. We could but hope to see further progress under the cultured patronage of "your distinguished bishop, Dr. Simms."

He concluded: "It is not perhaps for me to speak for the people of Cork; but I cannot refrain on such an occasion as this from associating myself with those who would say that you of the Protestant community of Cork may be assured of the greatest goodwill on the part of your fellow-citizens. The grammar school has played a long and honourable, if unobtrusive, part in the history of the city."—"Irish Times", 31/3/'55.

Archbishop Opposes Australian Rites.

The Anglican ceremonies which are traditional on certain public occasions in Australia have come under sharp attack recently from the "Catholic Weekly" and Roman Catholic Archbishop Mannix of Melbourne. There is a distinct possibility that a court test of the question may be attempted—in which case the Roman Catholic Church will be in the anomalous position of attacking "establishment" of religion in Australia (forbidden by the constitution) while "establishment" is looked upon as proper, just and natural in the Roman Catholic countries of the world.

Naval cadets of Roman Catholic persuasion were ordered by Archbishop Mannix to abstain from participation in an Anglican-tinged ceremony honouring the Duke of Edinburgh, although, in deference to Queen Elizabeth he gave them special permission to be present at similar ceremonies in her honour. At the same time, however, he demanded that in the future the ceremony of presentation of colours be so altered as to eliminate religious significance. Later, the Archbishop asserted that Prime Minister Menzies had agreed with this position.

Counter-blasts have come from Protestant groups in the country—notably the New South Wales council of churches, which stated that it "feels strongly that the attitude of the Roman church is one that can only bring about the paganizing of such ceremonies" and that "the dictates of this church must not be allowed to dominate our national life."—Church and State. ("Protestant Action", Toronto, Mar., '55.)

Cardinal McGuigan Accuses Canadian Church of Attacking Catholicism.

Quite an uproar has been created in Canada by publication of a 64-page booklet, "What's the Difference?" by the United Church of Canada. Cardinal McGuigan, of Toronto, called it "an attack on the Roman Catholic Church", and the Canadian press gave wide dissemination to his charge that this attack was "ill-timed, futile and even harmful". We have read the booklet and we find in it only a restrained and scholarly attempt, made after long and careful preparations, to outline in concise form the principal differences in belief which distinguish Roman and Protestant communions. Magazines and newspapers these days carry many advertisements urging the public to investigate the teachings of Roman Catholicism. This is exactly what the United Church of Canada has tried to do in this booklet. The history behind the booklet's appearance attests the sobriety with which it has gone about the task. As long ago as 1942 its General Council instructed its Commission on the Christian Faith "to prepare in simple language suitable literature on such subjects as the teaching of Protestantism as contrasted with that of the Roman Catholic faith." This mandate was renewed in one biennial meeting after another of the General Council. The 1950 session explicitly provided that the proposed publication should be "in catechetical form". Its writing was assigned to the Rev. Arthur G. Reynolds, with some of the ground work done by Professor George Caird, of McGill University. At every step along the road to publication the text was checked by members of the commission and scholars with recognised standing. It was finally approved last May by the executive of the General Council, and was jointly published by the Boards of Evangelism and Social Service and of Christian Education as this year's meeting of the General Council opened at Sackville, New Brunswick. No price is given on the copy of the booklet we have seen, but we suggest that those who wish to judge for themselves what the cardinal considers an attack on the Roman Church, send half a dollar to the United Church of Canada, 299 Queen Street West, Toronto, Ontario.—"Christian Century."—"Vigilant," Melbourne Dec., '54.

PASSING EVENTS.

Ireland's Future—The Next Fifty Years.

By Rev. F. Rupert Gibson, B.A.

To-day the Reformed Church in Ireland is facing the most critical situation with which it has ever been confronted. What will happen during the next fifty years will decide what will be the future of the Reformed faith in this land.

These are not the days when the Church can sit and day-dream, this is not a time for complacency. Ireland is at the cross roads and the Church should know the facts and face realistically up to the prospects and be prepared for the consequences.

The future hold two alternatives, either to win Ireland for Jesus Christ or to become a Papal land.

What is the grim reality, what are the facts?

Fateful Figures

The latest census reports on the population of Ireland are revealing and must give to thinking people cause for meditation and reason for alarm.

The last census taken throughout the whole of Ireland was in 1951. The 1951 reports for Northern Ireland have been published, but in order to get an overall picture it is necessary to take the Eire report of 1946. The situation for the whole of Ireland, as disclosed by these reports, dare not be taken lightly and has dire possibilities for the future.

The figures show that Ireland is slowly but surely becoming a Roman Catholic country giving allegiance to a foreign state and a foreign monarch, and that the Reformed Faith is being gradually eliminated from the land.

In 1946 in Eire the Roman Catholic Church had an overwhelming majority of 94.3 per cent, as compared with all other denominations which are a mere 5.7 per cent. Since the previous census in 1936 there was an increase of Roman Catholics and a continued serious decline of Protestants, the numbers being—Roman Catholics 2,786,000 and 169,000 other denominations as compared with 2,774,000 Roman Catholics and 195,000 other denominations in 1936. That is an increase of 12,000 Roman Catholics but a decrease of 26,000 in other denominations. It is feared that the 1951 report may show a still further decline in the number of Protestants.

In Northern Ireland the Protestant population is 65.6 per cent. of the whole, while the Roman Catholic is now 34.4 per cent. The numbers being 471,329 Roman Catholics out of a total population of 1,370,709.

Unlike Eire, Northern Ireland's population has steadily increased since the beginning of the century. Since 1937 the Protestant population in Northern Ireland has increased by 5.6 per cent. but the Roman Catholic by 10 per cent.

The "Ulster Year Book" for 1953 points out—"Between 1937 and 1951 the Roman Catholic percentage of the population rose from 33.5 to 34.4; the Presbyterian percentage fell slightly from 30.5 to 29.9 and the Church of Ireland fell from 27 to 25.7. Of the total increase in population in the Province—90,964 recorded in the First Preliminary Report 43,039 or 47 per cent. were Roman Catholics."

But the most significant figures of all are to be found in a study of the birth rate in Northern Ireland. Taking as a basis the number of children under one year at the time of the 1951 census, it is estimated that the birth rate of the Roman Catholic population in Northern Ireland is about 26 per thousand and for the rest of the population 18.5, and the overall rate 21.2. The birth rate in Eire in 1951 was 21.5 and for England and Wales 15.5.

The high birth rate in Northern Ireland as compared with England and Wales is attributed largely to the presence of the Roman Catholic section of the population.

In plain words this means that the Roman Catholics are now 34.4 per cent. of the population of Northern Ireland but of the children under one year of age 43 per cent. are Roman Catholic.

Coupled with this is another important factor. The infant mortality rate in Northern Ireland is the lowest on record and is exactly half that of 1923.—“The Christian Irishman”

* * *

France and Brazil.

A Comparison

In assessing the situation in Europe, it is apopposite to compare our nearest neighbour, France, with Brazil. France has a population of nearly 43,000,000, being four-fifths that of Brazil; of that number 800,000 are Protestants, roughly a third of the number of Brazilian Protestants. Further, it must be admitted that about 50 per cent of French Protestants are nominal in their adherence, whereas in Brazil the large majority are truly born-again Christians, and evangelical in faith and practice. The proportion of true Christians in the two countries is therefore likely to be four or five Brazilians to every one Frenchman, at a conservative estimate.

The propagation of the Gospel in Brazil is nation-wide, and every state has its evangelical representation, even in the interior. Yet the current year book for French Protestantism (“L’Annuaire Protestant”) reveals on a map that there are some French departments (or counties) where there is scarcely any witness to the Gospel whatsoever.

It is impressive to compare the progress of the Gospel in the Nord region of France—that closest to our shores—with that in Amazonas, the most remote of Brazil’s 21 states. Lille, the capital of the Nord, with 201,000 inhabitants, has three French Reformed Churches, a Baptist Church, Pentecostals, the Salvation Army and the “Popular Mission” In addition there is an Evangelical bookshop run by the Pentecostals. By comparison, Manaus, the capital of Amazonas, has a population of 137,000, yet it boasts fifteen evangelical congregations, six Brazilian pastors, at least ten resident missionaries (sometimes as many as twenty are in the town), a Bible Seminary, and a radio broadcast! Thus Manaus has twice the evangelical witness of Lille, though little more than half its size.

Northern France

In the Nord region of France there are over 25 towns with more than 5,000 inhabitants where no one is preaching the pure Gospel. In the state of Amazonas, the same Gospel is rapidly penetrating into all the most inaccessible forest towns and villages. In Parintins, a small town on the Amazon with 6,000 inhabitants, there are to-day three evangelical congregations, two of which have chapels seating 200, and one with a membership roll of 80. One may look in vain for a similar strength of evangelical witness in any town of equal size in Northern France.

The inevitable conclusion to be drawn from these facts is that France (in common with other European countries) has been greatly neglected during the era of missionary expansion. It is a sobering thought that missions have so played on the imagination and sentiments of evangelicals that missionary activity is largely associated with a tropical climate, Indians, crocodiles, and the jungle. Alas, the hard fact is that there is to-day more knowledge of the Gospel in some of those sunny lands than in civilized Europe.—D. G. Pope F.R.C.S., “The Christian”.

2 Peter 1. 20.

One of our readers would like to know the answer to the Roman Catholic argument against the private study of the Bible. The Roman attitude claims Scriptural support from the words of 2 Peter 1:20—“No prophecy of Scripture is of private interpretation.” Here, we are assured, is an Apostolic warning that it is a perilous thing to maintain “the right and duty of private judgment” and to attempt to decide the meaning of the Scriptures apart from the “official” or “correct” interpretation offered us by ecclesiastical authority. In fact, anyone entering the Roman Catholic Church is required to adhere to the Creed of Pope Pius IV (A.D. 1564), which affirms: “I also admit the Holy Scriptures according to that sense which our Holy Mother the Church has held, and does hold, to which it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Scriptures; neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers.”

Coming now to 2 Peter 1:20, the point here is a right appreciation of those Old Testament Scriptures which were prophetic of the coming of Christ. That sure word of prophecy was like a lamp shining in a murky place giving illumination before the dawn. Verse 20 must be taken in conjunction with verse 21, which gives the reason for the claim. Then it is important we should note that the meaning of the copula in verse 20 is not “is” but “comes” or “has its origin.” It has precisely the same meaning as in verse 21, where the Revised Version says: “No prophecy ever came (marg. ‘Gk. was brought’) by the will of man.” Next, there are serious objections to the word “interpretation” as a rendering of the Greek term epiluseōs, which occurs only here in the New Testament. A better rendering is “release” or “disclosing.” In the papyri it is used for the settlement of monetary transactions, and in its verbal form it is found in Mark 4:34, where, with reference to our Lord's instruction, we are told that "privately to His own disciples He expounded all things"; that is, in private He was disclosing (or releasing) "all things to them." The idea is of revelation more than of exegesis. In support of this we should note also that the word translated "private" in verse 20 is, literally, "its own" (the R.V. margin has "special"). It is never rendered "private" in any other passage, although it occurs 113 times.

Dr. W. H. Griffith Thomas has rightly said of this passage: "The meaning is: no prophecy came of the prophets' own unfolding, for prophecy did not come by the will of man, but by the Holy Ghost. The point of these verses is, in fact,

PASTOR ROMANUS

The present correspondence in the Roman Catholic weekly The Tablet should provide an eye-opener for that numerous class of persons who are unwilling to believe that men, whose true sympathies lie with Rome and not with Canterbury, are to be found within the ranks of the clergy of the Church of England. Proof sufficient that this is indeed the case is afforded by the letter which started it all, even though its author, signing himself somewhat inaptly as "Pastor Anglicanus" covered his identity with the cloak of anonymity. The writer says that there is "a really obstinate nucleus" of "Anglican Papalist" clergy in the Church of England who are so much in earnest in their opposition to inter-communion with the Church of South India that, if it is sanctioned by the Convocations, they mean to secede, since it will no longer be possible to regard the Church of England as a branch of the Catholic Church. It could no doubt be argued that this threatened secession on the part of papalistic parsons constitutes one good reason for going ahead with full recognition of the Church of South India. At least the possible loss of a disloyal minority should not be permitted to deter or intimidate the majority from going ahead with a scheme which they believe to be in accordance with the will of God.

The question facing this correspondent and his fellow-papalists is: whither shall they secede? The possibility of forming a "Free Anglo-Catholic Church", without endowments, without buildings, and "possibly without even a bishop to perpetuate her orders", he dismisses as "impractical and unrealistic". But what he would like to know is whether Mother Rome could not, "without compromising at any essential point, facilitate conversions by making some large-hearted gesture of invitation".

The Englishman of average honour and candour will wish to inquire what these "Anglican Papalists" are doing in the reformed Church of England at all. The letter in question provides the frank answer that they view it as their duty to work within the ranks of Anglicanism for the return of the Church of England as a whole to "the Catholic fold"—reunion with Rome is their objective, nothing less. In other words, they are men who have wittingly perjured themselves at ordination, and whose deliberate and traitorous aim is the overthrow and subversion of the Reformed faith and practice of our Church. In the name of all that's honest, let them go home to Rome. And let them have the decency to go without waiting for "some large-hearted gesture" from the Pope. If a gesture is to be made, we should like to see it made by our Bishops (to whom the identity of many of these Anglican Papalists must be well enough known), for have they not sworn that they are ready "with all faithful diligence to banish and drive away all erroneous and strange doctrine"?

COMMENT

THE BIBLE—DUTY OR PLEASURE

By Canon Roger Lloyd

"In the England of to-day we have all learned to rely chiefly on the Free Church scholars for pure biblical scholarship as the mere recitation of such names as Manson, Vincent Taylor, and Dodd shows. They and their like are serving, and in a way they are causing the undoubted renaissance in Bible reading. Their own research and their great skill in making intelligible to us the work of Continental scholars is showing us that the bible read in the new light is trustworthy and can be believed. But even the most attractively written pure biblical research needs to be interpreted and in this as in every other field of knowledge the original thinker has need of a populariser.

"The theologian always needs the artist to interpret him to the multitude, and if he does not find him he is condemned to write only for theological scholars like himself. Very occasionally the theologian is his own artist, as Gregory Dix was, but this is quite exceptional. The English biblical scholars of to-day have less need of popular interpreters than most other kinds of original researchers, for they have all taken the trouble to learn how to write, but even so they, like all other pure scholars need their middlemen."

The above is cited from an article in the Manchester Guardian of 8th May, 1955. The rest of the article praised a few modern books which seek to popularise Biblical learning.

What interests us is the nature of the tribute offered above to modern critical scholars. Is it not a wonderful thing that a man can write of them (as Canon Lloyd does)—"their own research and their great skill . . . is showing us that the Bible read in the new light [one supposes this new light must be the present opinion of some Biblical critics which has replaced the opinion of thirty years ago—Ed.] is trustworthy and can be believed." Wonderful indeed that the testimony to the veracity of Holy Scripture available to us in the mid-twentieth century is the word of Doctors Manson, Taylor and Dodd!

We respect these scholars and value their work, but as Christian men we are sure they would make no such claim for themselves. They can tell the unbeliever, and the faithful as well, that historically the Bible is reliable, but if our confidence in God's Word has been in doubt till now, we have been sadly deceived. Long before 1955 Christians have believed the Holy Scripture, and have not been shaken in their faith by the critics of this or the previous ages. Scholars may contribute much to the interpretation of the Bible; but we do not look to them, any more than the men of the past nineteen hundred years did, to satisfy us of the credentials of Holy Scripture.

REVIEW. A NUN'S LIFE—"SPRINGS OF SILENCE."

J. B. S.

Some time ago, I was speaking to a young man whose brother was a soldier, and enjoyed the soldier's life. I asked him whether he had any ambition to be a soldier like his brother, and he gave me an answer which has kept me thinking ever since. "No", he said "I am not a bit like my brother Jack; you see, he likes taking orders from other people, and I don't". I fancy this really differentiates two large classes of people who exist everywhere, in religion, in society, in political life—in fact in life generally. Some are totalitarian and like to have their life managed for them by somebody; some are democratic and want to run their own lives and affairs in their own way for better or worse. The little shop-keeper knows that he is not as efficient a grocer as Lipton, but he would rather run his own little shop in his own little way than let Lipton run it for him. Some like taking orders and some don't. The former join armies, religious Orders and so forth; the latter remain domestic and secular.

The writer of this book* would seem to be of French-Canadian stock, living in Spokane, Washington State, U.S.A. and her mother's great ambition for her was that she should be a nun; so from the age of sixteen as a school-girl, she was devoted to that life. No doubt she lived conscientiously and creditably, and she tells her simple story honestly and straightforwardly. But after all it is a "chronicle of small beer", consisting altogether of the trivialities of a nun's life, which seem so important to them but to most of us "in the world" seem so trifling. What interests us is not the routine of the convent but the intriguing questions which the narrative suggests. Is a nun's life really more valuable in the sight of God or more in keeping with the Divine purpose, than that of the mother of a family who feeds, clothes and educates that family? Is it more noble, more pious or more godly to stay and face the problems of life than to withdraw from them into a sort of shelter, where all responsibility is laid upon a community, which does all one's thinking and regulates every activity of one's life? In a certain way, the life of the hive is the perfect life. The ant and the bee have no individual life of their own, and only function as components of the hive. They are perfect in their way. The difference between the religious community and the bee-hive, is that the bee does its work automatically because instinctively, while the nun not having yet reached that perfect state impelled onward by authority. Both are communist in a sense. The individual is but one of the working mass, and the whole personality is shaped to the single end of furthering the community's purpose.

There are some passages in this book which give an involuntary indication that in human nature the hive ideal is never perfectly achieved. On page 111 she says "Something in us craves to possess". This reminds one of what Gubert of Nogent says (Autobiography Bk. I. Ch. XXI) "Clearly this vice of avarice is more harmful to monks as it is less natural, so that scarcely any crime can be found in which the devil ensnares man so often as that of pilfering". He points out that the desire of the monk for even the most trivial possessions of his own was unconquerable. Such men were strangled by the devil or otherwise reminded of the heinousness of their sin; they were refused burial in consecrated ground for having "so miserably broken the rule of having property in common" (Autobiog. p. 89). It was no use. Nature would not be denied.

Again she says (p. 114) "The maternal instinct is so deeply rooted that one does not efface it with a single 'I will'". "God made women to be mothers." But God can be improved upon, and the maternal instinct can be sublimated into something which is not precisely the same, but is a sufficiently good imitation, and in the nun of course something finer and better. It is true that to a great extent, the children of the married are taught and nurtured by the unmarried, but this is a social necessity, not a law of nature nor of God. The relation of mother to child still remains as fixed as the Law of Gravity. There is no substitute for it from mouse to man; and the plan of calling people "father" and "mother" who are not such is hollow indeed.

Again she says in a very striking passage (p. 119) "Obedience is perhaps the only one of the three vows (Poverty, Chastity and Obedience), that in one sense does not become easier with practice. Human nature longs for independence . . . As we grow older and become more experienced . . . we are inclined to credit ourselves with greater knowledge. We begin resenting the fancied 'interference' of our superiors in matters which, we tell ourselves we know more about than they do. This is a very human and a very dangerous tendency"—which from the hive point of view it certainly is. We must learn to "suffer fools gladly" or at least patiently when they are set in authority over us, and when discipline is the highest of the virtues.

One is relieved to meet in this rigidly uniform community a shining tho' tragic exception, the non-conformist Sister Shannon (p. 205). "Try as she would, and she had made desperate attempts to conform, she could not become the creature of clock-like regularity. Her resolutions cropped up like mushrooms in the rain and lived about as long." She died young. One hopes she went to a Heaven where there were not so many rules! I have described this book as a simple truthful straightforward autobiography. It is not blatantly propagandist as such books have a tendency to be; nor is it a warning like the books of "Maria Monk" or Miss Baldwin. To the mind of one reader at least it emphasizes one fact, namely that there are women—probably thousands of them who are congenitally fitted for such a life. They are in all denominations—Buddhist, Roman Catholic, Protestant, the Amishes of Pennsylvania and others—people who find it difficult to regulate their own lives, and would be much better off and much happier living in communities where their lives were regulated for them. Men of that sort do better in the army than in civilian life; women do better as nuns or members of some sisterhood where they don't have to plan for themselves. This writer calls attention to the fact that nuns get a good deal of deference from the general public. This is true and probably arises on the part of women from the fact that they offer no rivalry to their lay sisters, and therefore stir up no jealousy. So far as men are concerned, it is no doubt due to their apparent helplessness; but also to the blessed fact that they make no effort to impress their femininity on man; that they have in fact largely sublimated themselves, and a man has nothing to fear from them.

But in spite of all, we think that a nun, after all is said for her that can be said, has parted from her real vocation as a woman, namely to be a wife and a mother, to nurture her own children for God, as well as those of other people.

POSTSCRIPT.

Since writing this Article, I have come across a very relevant passage in a review of a book recently published; Peter Geyl on Isaiah Berlin's Historical Inevitability. (See The Listener April 14th, 1955 p. 665).

"The desire to resign responsibility, arising from a desire to flee for refuge to some vast, amoral, impersonal monolithic whole, nature or history or class or race. . .

The blessed sense of relief which many people find in acquiescence. . . But especially when the conception is reduced to some rigid system the feeling may yield to one of being supported or driven, and an inhuman and amoral energy be imparted. . .

They (the Totalitarians) have not with us succeeded, and are, I believe, a long way from succeeding in nullifying the energy that we draw from a different source altogether; from free discussion from criticism and the true scientific spirit. In Russia they have triumphed and the result is terrible enough. That triumph is a challenge to us to cultivate our own traditions and resources of belief in the value of personality."

The charge I would bring against Monasticism with its Totalitarian and Communistic techniques, is that it suppresses the individual and human personality in favour of a sort of robot or automaton; that it moulds the person in the pattern of the hive. Life is no longer a responsibility but a routine, based no longer on choice but on rule. And my fault with Romanism in this matter is, that it would seem to regard this habit of acquiescence as the ideal, that it glorifies this negation and makes the passive habit the standard of holiness.

I repeat that there are people—perhaps millions of them—who like this sort of guidance and dependence, and are perhaps the better for it. But surely that is not what God intends us to be!

B.B.C. and H.E. CARDINAL GRIFFIN.

The complaint made by the Cardinal is that the B.B.C. play (which may have been objectionable—we do not know) was based on three assumptions, “two of which have no historical or scriptural warrant, while the third is based on an interpretation of a passage from the Gospel of St. Mark that our Lord had blood brothers and sisters, and therefore that His Mother was not for ever a Virgin. This theory is contrary to sound scholarship, and the beliefs of all Christian bodies.”

The doctrine of the ever-virginity of the Blessed Mary is not to be mistaken for the true scripture doctrine of the Virgin-birth of our Lord. He was born of the Blessed Virgin Mary—hence her title, held in honour by all Christians. He was “conceived by the Holy Ghost”, not by man, so that His mother is ever remembered by the distinctive title which is hers in relation to the fact of the Incarnation as well as by prophecy (“Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son”, Isaiah 7. 14).

The doctrine of the perpetual virginity of the Mother of our Lord is that she never had any other child than Jesus, and that His birth in no way ended her virgin state. The Virgin-birth of Jesus is, therefore, a quite different doctrine from the doctrine of Mary's ever-virginity. The one doctrine we know to be true, for it is stated in Scripture. The other doctrine may be true, but it is a matter which is completely undecided on the ground of evidence. Many earnest and orthodox Christians will say that the evidence of the Gospel is that Mary had other children, younger than our Lord. This is what the Cardinal denies as “contrary to sound scholarship” and the beliefs of all Christian bodies.”

“Contrary to sound scholarship”—This is a matter which has been in question since early days. Three views (set out by Bishop Lightfoot in commentary on Galatians) at length emerged (1) Epiphonian, after Epiphanius, who said the brethren of the Lord, James, Josés, Judas, Simon, were children of Joseph by an earlier marriage: (2) Helvidian, after Helvidius, who said they were children of Mary and Joseph; necessarily younger than Jesus: (3) the theory of Jerome, that they were not brothers, but cousins. It may be noted that by the time of Jerome, virginity and celibacy had become important conditions in the Christian life, and men like Jerome did much to discourage matrimony, and to depict it as an inferior state of life.

At the earliest period of Christian history the views of Christians as a rule were either “Epiphonian” or “Helvidian”. St. Luke 2. 7—“her first-born son”, Matt. 1. 25—“her first-born son” suggested other children born subsequently, and called by the evangelist the brothers and sisters of Jesus. In the third century this view was quite widespread in the church, as it was obviously the most natural explanation. It showed that the Greek word for “brethren” was understood to mean “brothers” in our modern sense, rather than “cousins”.

The view called “Epiphonian” was also a widespread one, and was supported by Origen the third-century biblical scholar. But it is said of Origen that he recognised it as a theory founded on dogmatic grounds, and not an actual tradition of the church. Epiphanius gave his name to this view because he attacked all who did not hold it to be the correct view. The Eastern churches to this day accept this as the true meaning of “the brethren of the Lord”, i.e. earlier born sons of Joseph.

When Helvidius in the fourth century set out the belief that “the brethren” were the younger children of Mary, the sons of Joseph, Jerome put forward the opinion that they were the sons of another Mary, wife of Clopas, and sister of the B.V.M. For this theory it is necessary to hold that “brethren” means “cousins”. But this is not demonstrated by scholarship.

In passing, we may refer to a suggestion put to us some years ago (and probably well-known as an argument) i.e. that if the mother of our Lord had three younger children to nurse it would have been impossible for her to have done what St. Luke tells us in ch. 2 verse 41 "Now his parents went to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the Passover". We think, in explanation of this, that verse 41 is to be taken in connection with verse 42 which tells us of a visit when our Lord was twelve years old. It is not improper to assume that this yearly visit started some time before our Lord was twelve, but was not an annual event from the year of His birth. A practice of four or five years standing by the time our Lord was twelve will warrant the evangelist's statement that at that period Mary and Joseph were wont to visit Jerusalem each year.

If the Blessed Virgin travelled to Bethlehem when our Lord was about to be born there is no improbability in her visiting the Holy City under similar conditions in following years. This suggestion, then, throws no obstacle in the way of the interpretation of "brethren" as younger brothers.

The church in the Latin speaking West accepted Jerome's view, but not on grounds of scholarship. The reason was ascetic and dogmatic.

In the Reformation period and long after, the belief of the Latin West continued to be the belief of the Reformed churches. About the end of the eighteenth century, when conventional and traditional explanations of the Gospels began to give way to more independent interpretations in Protestant churches the "Helvidian" view reappeared, and the "Jerome" theory weakened.

To-day Reformed churches allow all of these views, for there is no way of proving or disproving any of them. In Anglican circles the same liberty of understanding is accepted. It is recognised that the Epiphany and Helvidian views are both attested in second century; so dogmatism is not called for.

It seems therefore that H.E. Cardinal Griffin assumed that orthodox Christian churches hold the same opinion as his church does. This however is not so. Private judgment is bound to operate here, for theological scholarship and biblical exegesis cannot provide a settlement of the problem. In fact, it is a problem which does not call for a solution. We can safely leave it in abeyance, for the Word of God has not given conclusive evidence.

"RELIGION IN THE MODERN STATE."

For the purpose of this article "religion" in our title must be understood in the Roman Catholic sense. We borrow the phrase from the headline of a report in the "Irish Times" of 13/4/55 of a conference held under the auspices of a Roman Catholic organisation "Christus Rex" at Killarney.

The report before us summarises a paper on "The Church and social principles" read by the Most Revd. Dr. Lucey, Roman Catholic Bishop of Cork.

In the course of his paper the Bishop said that many denied that the Church had any part to play in social life—

"Others asserted that they wanted no more than to keep the Church in her place, but the place they assigned to her was a very circumscribed one indeed. They would confine the Church to the spiritual sphere, but what they excluded from the spiritual sphere was much more relevant than what they included in it. They usually excluded any direct concern with political, social or economic matters, and any reference from the pulpit to what the faithful should do as citizens, business people or members of a secular organisation.

"In the last century the call for the Church to confine itself to religion and not meddle in secular affairs came mostly from the scientists and businessmen. Nowadays it came mostly from governments and public officials. Dictators were not necessarily opposed to religion and they will not, they say, interfere with religion as long as religion does not interfere in politics.

"In their eyes, however, religion can comprise at most only private devotions and church services. The Church was not just one group among the many groups making up the State, but had a firmer and broader basis than any of them."

"Thus it was", said Dr. Lucey, "that when the bishops in this country took a stand not so long ago on the Health Bill, they were not acting as a mere pressure group: they were not exercising the democratic right they undoubtedly had as citizens to make representations directly to the Government. They intervened on the higher ground that the Church is the divinely appointed guardian and interpreter of the moral law; and that the proposed Bill was in certain essential respects at variance with that law, so that it was their duty as bishops and officers of the Church to oppose the Bill."

"In a word their position was that they were the final arbiters of right and wrong even in political matters. In other spheres the State might for its own good reasons ignore the advice of the experts, but in faith and morals it might not.

"At the time, incidentally," he said, "certain elements not noted for their sympathy with things Irish or Catholic raised the cry that we were being ruled from Maynooth rather than from Leinster House, as if heeding the voice of the Church in a matter of ultimate principle was not in order in an overwhelmingly Catholic country such as this and as if the bishops here were constantly taking it on themselves to declare proposed legislation a matter of faith and morals and so subject to their jurisdiction.

"You have a natural duty to provide yourself for your own health and that of your dependants; you have no right if you are a Minister of State or a deputy to inaugurate a so-called free health service and make medicine in effect a State monopoly. A socialised health service, therefore, is at once a wrong to the average person and a wrong for the person introducing it."

We are not left in doubt as to the claim made for religion in these firm words. Religion is the official church pronouncing on "faith and morals." Here we are not concerned at the moment with dogma, but with morals; and the church which claims authority in this sphere naturally claims to define what matters are to be understood by the term "morals".

In Dr. Lucey's statement we see that he describes one attitude of the state or public towards the Church (i.e. of Rome)—"to keep the Church in her place" (a restricted one). This attitude is very typical in the experiences of all churches. Politicians and citizens of any or no religion often itch to restrict the churches both Protestant and Roman Catholic in their countries. It is often a tribute to the power of religion that it is an object of suspicion and dislike to secularised political parties. We must recognise that Protestant Churches, for example beyond the Iron Curtain, and, some years ago, under Nazi rule, were the objects of political animus in the same way as Roman Catholicism.

In the field of education who has not heard of efforts to limit religious influence, or at least the influence of ministers of religion? There are professing Christian school-systems which fight shy of employing as teachers persons who are in Holy Orders or are official ministers of churches. There are places where a minister of religion is not thought a proper person to be elected to a representative assembly such as a Parliament. The objection is not that representative assemblies are too rough for the delicate and sensitive temperaments of the clergy, but that in some mysterious way "clerical influence" might prevail. We know that in Ireland the clergymen of the Church of Ireland were at the Disestablishment of the Church in 1870 freed from all separate "status" and should have been eligible for election to all public bodies, but Gladstone refrained from putting a clause in the Irish Church Act relieving the "clerical disability".

No doubt in the then state of public opinion in Ireland, a land full of party interests, it was a piece of practical wisdom, but it was a disability, a denial of a right of which other classes and professions were not deprived.

We see that Dr. Lucey regarded this restriction to a circumscribed place as involving an exclusion of pulpit reference to what the faithful should do as citizens. This was and is probably the situation under totalitarian systems of government—it is not a feature of the Protestant democracies. Why? In recent years there has been some public outcry against utterances of a certain Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, London. But no one seriously tries to prevent this dignitary of the Church of England from expressing his convictions. We may deplore the outlook of the present Dean of Canterbury, but his freedom of speech will not be interfered with.

Is there then a difference between the reformed and unreformed churches here? Can they be trusted equally to show wise restraint? Are reformed churches lacking in spirit, conviction, and courage, so that they are no danger to political systems, whereas Rome has courage and conviction, and so is a danger? Some would like us to believe that, but we can see its falsity when we call to mind the resistance of the Confessional Lutheran Church in Germany during Nazi regime, and the resistance also of the Norwegian Lutheran Church to the same tyranny. The fact is that reformed churches approach the social and political problems of their countries from the standpoint of the convictions of their members as to what is in the best interests of the community. It is recognised that men and churches may conscientiously differ in their opinions. There is not a Presbyterian social-political point of view. There is not an Anglican theory of the State, or a Methodist one. But there is a system of Roman Catholic sociology, and a view of politics which tends more and more to be asserted almost as if it were revealed truth.

The Protestant can judge whether or not a proposal is consistent with the Christian faith; and he can recognise that many plans and policies are compatible with our religion but if some modern Roman Catholic spokesmen are to be heeded, the opinion of some bishops must be obeyed because it is the opinion of some Roman Catholics bishops! In Northern Ireland, as far as we know, Roman Catholics are not forbidden to avail of the benefits of the welfare state. In Eire one gets the impression that similar benefits might turn out to be, in certain particulars, theologically unsound and therefore prohibited.

As to the interference of Roman Catholic bishops some time ago when a Government Health Bill was being promoted—Dr. Lucey says the bishops “intervened on the higher ground that the Church is the divinely appointed guardian and interpreter of the moral law, and that the proposed Bill was in certain essential respects at variance with that law.”

Many people were puzzled to discover what was the matter with the Bill. For them the moral law was more or less the Ten Commandments and the precepts of the Gospel. But the weighty sound of the moral law seemed to silence all questioning. The bishops did the thinking and deciding for the ordinary man, and so the victory was won (for the time being). “Their position was that they were the final arbiters of right and wrong even in political matters”. We hear of movements in Ireland to end the political division of the country by abolishing Partition. We hear the Church of Ireland criticised in certain quarters, as the largest Protestant communion in the republic of Eire, for not doing more to end Partition; but the Church of Ireland (and the Irish Presbyterian and Methodist Churches) would have to consider very seriously indeed the question if it is their duty to urge the vast majority of Protestants (who are in Northern Ireland) to unite with a State in which the final decision in political issues rests, not with a democratically elected representative assembly, but with the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. That would be a great deal to expect of them.

The closing paragraph of the quotation of the Most Rev. Dr. Lucey's address may give rise to questionings. What is “a so-called free health service”? We have had for over a century free medical services in dispensaries and infirmaries, and the only complaints we have been aware of are complaints of their insufficiency. How does a State monopoly in medicine differ from other monopolies, if indeed a free health service involves a monopoly? A monopoly is open to many objections—even if it is only a transport one. But a monopoly may also secure better services for those in need—e.g. the Electricity Supply Board, being a monopoly for the whole country, provides power and light in districts to where it is uneconomic, but is a most valuable utility. If no one was to have it unless by paying the full cost of the service he enjoys many places would have to be content with candles and paraffin.

Is a free-health service necessarily a “socialised” one? May be we misunderstand the meaning of the word “socialised”, but it should mean a service the community provides for itself, i.e. for all who care to make use of it. We don't yet see what is wrong with such a service, any more than we see what is wrong with the free system of elementary education which the community has been providing for itself for over a hundred years. Indeed the educational system is worse, for it is compulsory for children to attend elementary schools (if not receiving education, for which parents pay, elsewhere).

“Socialised” may contain a suggestion of “Socialism”, and in that sense we readily recognise that anyone, bishop or layman, may have reason to object—but the fact is that everywhere in the world to-day the community is doing more and more for the individual citizen. Schools, secondary and intermediate schools, vocational and technical schools, and universities only keep open because the community subsidises them. Public services of many kinds depend upon everybody through taxes, etc. paying for them. Hospitals are in the same situation. It is our duty to keep up the principle of self-help. But surely the limitation is “as far as we can”. When the limit is reached, and our resources are ended, are we and others to forego further assistance in physical need? If not, then we justify the existence of every facility the community can provide for healing. Whether we like it or not, the principles of the nineteenth century do not serve the needs of the present day. Technical advances exceed individual resources, so we depend on the community more and more.

B.B.C. and H.E. CARDINAL GRIFFIN.

Sir Ian Jacob, Director-General of the B.B.C., has said in a letter to Cardinal Griffin, Archbishop of Westminster, that the corporation was in “no doubt at all” that it made a “grave error” in presenting the play, “Family Portrait”, on television on Easter Sunday. In correspondence between Sir Ian and the Archbishop, published recently, Sir Ian says:

“We try during Holy Week to reflect in a great number of ways the significance of the period for Christians. The idea that ‘Family portrait’ could properly be included in this general setting was misguided. . . . I can assure you that there is no doubt now in anyone's mind that it was a mistake.”

The letters were exchanged between Easter Sunday (April 10) and April 28, when the play was repeated. Sir Ian defends the decision to repeat the play and says that the withdrawing of a play “because it does not accord with the beliefs of many people in this country would, we feel, be contrary to sound policy and would not have a good effect in the cause which Christians desire to further."

In a letter to Sir Ian, dated April 23, Cardinal Griffin says that he was asked by the Roman Catholic archbishops and bishops of England and Wales to express their feelings of deep regret at the action of the B.B.C. in presenting the play on television on Easter Sunday. "The play", he says, was based on three assumptions, two of which have no historical or scriptural warrant, while the third is based on an interpretation of a passage from the Gospel of St. Mark that our Lord had blood brothers and sisters, and therefore that his mother was not for ever a virgin. This theory is contrary to sound scholarship and the beliefs of all Christian bodies.

"The play at any time would have been repellent to millions of Christian viewers. Placed at a peak viewing time on the greatest day of the Christian year, it must be taken as an affront to the Christian conscience of the country. . . .

"Then, on Easter Sunday when Christian unity and peace should be so much to the fore, a decision was taken to show the film of Martin Luther on the Light Programme in the morning, and then this thoroughly unchristian play at the peak hour on the television programme on Sunday night."

In conclusion, Cardinal Griffin asked that before a decision to televise such a play is taken in the future, "due regard should be had to the views of the religious bodies in this country."

In his reply, dated April 26, Sir Ian, after admitting that the presentation of "Family Portrait" was "a grave error", defends its repetition.

"We have decided", he says, "after most careful consideration, to keep the play in Thursday's programme, though we shall preface it by a statement making clear that the play is not a dramatisation or interpretation of Christian beliefs. Our reason for taking this decision is that we do not withhold from our output, at any rate on weekdays, plays which demonstrate a line of thought which is not that held by Christians. To do this would, we believe, be to set an undue limitation on the range of our services."

"Family Portrait" depicted part of the life of Christ. The Roman Catholic newspaper, "The Universe", stated after the Easter Sunday presentation: "Television shows a play that is blasphemous."—"Manchester Guardian."

SIR IAN'S APOLOGY.

The comment of the "Manchester Guardian" in this affair was as follows:—

The B.B.C. has been in trouble again about religion. Sir Ian Jacob has apologised to Cardinal Griffin for the "grave error" of having broadcast on Easter Sunday the play "Family Portrait," which shows Christ's mother and brothers though not Christ Himself. This is an American play which was performed at a London theatre in 1948 under licence from the Lord Chamberlain. Whatever its merits, it is a reverent work; the point at issue is not its tone but its theology. The play assumes a literal interpretation of Mark iii. 32 ("Behold, thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee"). This is the ground of Cardinal Griffin's complaint. The interpretation, he says, is "contrary to sound scholarship and the beliefs of all Christian bodies . . . at any time . . . repellent to millions of Christian viewers . . . [but on Easter Sunday] an affront to the Christian conscience of the country."

This is surely something of an over-statement. The literal reading of the passage in Mark is contrary to the beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church among others; it is not contrary to the beliefs of all Christian bodies. The question is whether the B.B.C. should avoid broadcasting at times like Easter, matter which goes against the beliefs of some (not necessarily all) Christian Churches. Sir Ian has decided that it should but that the prescription should not be extended to matter broadcast on ordinary days. No doubt this is a sensible compromise, though it may not be easy to apply in practice. Many things—medieval miracle plays, for instance, or the pictures in some illuminated bibles—are likely in some of their details to go against the present beliefs peculiar to one denomination or another. The B.B.C. will run the usual risk of playing safe and falling into the tedium of the lowest common denominator. It should certainly resist any attempt to make it satisfy everybody on every day of the year.

THE MARIAN MARTYRS.

The Most Rev. J. A. F. Gregg, D.D., Archbishop of Armagh, in his address to the Church of Ireland General Synod, 10th May, 1955, spoke of the Marian Martyrs:—

Martyrs' Courage

"This year, 1955, brings us to the 400th anniversary of the martyrdom of Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, burned to death at Oxford on October 16th, 1555. This judicial execution is a historic fact which we of the reformed faith do well to remember. These men died for their faithfulness to what they believed, as we do, to be the truth underlying Our Lord's words. This is no time for stirring up ill-will against those who to-day hold the same religious views as did the men who condemned to a dreadful death both the three bishops and many others—lay as well as clerical—who held to the reformed faith. The punishments inflicted in those days, which still lay under the shadow of the Middle Ages, were gross and unspeakably cruel, but were part of the prevailing order of things. John Calvin had helped to condemn Servetus to the same fiery death only two years before. Rather let us dwell on the magnificent courage of the men who knew the penalties to which the public profession of their principles exposed them and on the high price at which the religious freedom we enjoy was purchased for us.

“As I read the story of the Council of Trent (1545-1564) and of the embattled forces, ecclesiastical and civil, arrayed on the side of the mediæval Roman system, I am amazed at the fact that, both in many parts of the Continent and in the British Isles, the reformed faith found strength to stand its ground, and claimed and won its right to exist and to be lawfully professed. The freedom of direct access to God in Christ which the reformers won for us is a treasure beyond reckoning. I trust that we have not become so familiar with our privileges that we fail to prize and cherish this treasury. In this connection we do well not to let ourselves think of the doctrines of our reformers as new doctrines; rather, they are a return to the old. Nicholas Ridley gives us a good illustration of this return; in fact he was somewhat slow to adopt the reformed position. He was, of course, well aware of the movement for reform in Germany and Switzerland.

Monk's Treatise

“But what moved him more deeply than any other writing outside the New Testament was a book written by a Benedictine monk of the monastery of Corbie, in France. This book, entitled, ‘Concerning the Body and Blood of the Lord’, was written by Ratramnus or Bertram about 845 A.D., at the request of Charles the Bold. The king was perplexed by the strange and materialising views on the Body and Blood of Christ in the Eucharist put forth by Paschasius Radberti, and he turned to the most learned man of his acquaintance, to resolve his difficulties. Ratramnus wrote his book in answer to the king's request, in which he draws upon his knowledge of the early fathers, Latin and Greek, and in the light of their teaching he interprets the elements in the Sacrament as mysteries, and as effectual signs of grace. Ratramnus's book was brought to the notice of Bishop Ridley, and it impressed him so deeply that he adopted its line of thought for his own, and based upon it his defence at his trial. This book, written 1,100 years ago by a man who was consulted by both Pope and Emperor, is well worth study even to-day.”

The archbishop then referred to the proposals to come before the General Synod regarding the revised hymn book, and suggested the procedure to be followed in considering the matter. He concluded by speaking of the members of the General Synod who had died since the last meeting.—“Irish Times”, 11/5/55.

It will be remembered that in addition to the martyrs named by the Archbishop of Armagh, there were two other bishops, Hooper of Gloucester and Ferrar of St. David's. We must not forget the great number of ordinary clergymen, laymen and women who suffered death at Smithfield and elsewhere in the cause of truth. Those who have access to Foxe's “Acts and Monuments” (commonly called “The Book of Martyrs”) owe it to the memory of those brave, resolute and godly people to read the story of their sufferings, and so strengthen their faith, and confirm their loyalty to the truth of God's Word.

REVIEW.

The Development of the Papacy. By Dr. H. Burn-Murdoch. (Faber & Faber Ltd.)

This is a book which was needed, and one is glad to see it here to answer the need. A myriad books have been written for or against the Papacy, but this one claims a new method of approach, and it seems to me to make good the contention. The doctrine of the papacy is declared to be based on “the ancient and constant faith of the Church.” Now can that be made good? For if it can it means that all we who are Protestants are, and must be, shut out from the true Church of Christ, and subjected to the loss of faith and of salvation.

That is a serious matter, so it cannot be left simply as a matter of opinion. It must be investigated, and Dr. Burn-Murdoch proceeds to investigate it. The doctrine itself is first stated, and five commonly given proofs of it are set down, followed by what Holy Scripture has to say on the matter. Then, century by century, the facts are set down, whether they tell on the one side or the other. At the end of each chapter, under the letter A, for “Affirmative”, is set down all that seems to favour the doctrine, and after that, under the letter N, for “Negative”, is put down all that seems to contradict it. Now if this method seems cumbrous to you, let me say that in actual fact it does not prove so, for the result is most interesting. And in any case, some method like that must be made use of, if we are to arrive at our goal.

It is very interesting to go from Father to Father and Council to Council, and to note that, while they think the bishop of Rome a very important person, because Rome was the capital, and because. Paul and Peter were reputed to have exercised authority there, yet they had no idea of a Papal Monarchy in the latter sense of the words. The pope had become one of the great patriarchs; but that he was the supreme ruler and Vicar of Christ, that was a different matter! The process which increases the prestige of the bishop of Rome is seen also in the case of the bishop of New Rome or Constantinople. Almost from nothing he too became a patriarch, and "the General Council of 381 decreed that 'the bishop of Constantinople should hold the privilege of honour after the bishop of Rome, because Constantinople is the New Rome'". For a time, too, in the fourth century, Milan was the official residence of the emperor, and while that was so, especially under the forceful personality of Ambrose, the bishop of Milan "seemed to share a two-fold hegemony with the pope". It was Ambrose, also, and not the pope, who excommunicated Theodosius and forced him to do penance for the massacre at Thessalonica.

The title "pope", it is well to know, was not the exclusive prerogative of the papacy. The bishop of Carthage, as also the bishop of Alexandria, "was known as the pope". When the Roman See was vacant owing to the martyrdom of Fabian, the Roman clergy wrote several letters to the bishop of Carthage, in which they addressed him as "Pope Cyprian", and "most blessed and glorious Pope".

Time and again Dr. Burn-Murdoch is moved to reiterate that the "evidence of the early centuries shows clearly that the doctrine of the papacy was not part of the ancient faith of the Church". How could it be when you have a heretic pope like Honorius I, who was anathematized by Council after Council and Pope after Pope? What then becomes of the assertion that "the See of Holy Peter remains for ever free from all error"?

In various ways the burning or the execution of the heretics for heresy is dealt with. It was a thing unknown to the Early Church, and Chrysostom declared an execution for heresy to be "an unpardonable crime". Even yet Rome's policy of the stake has not been repudiated, and the author of this book finds "a startling resemblance between the cruelties and dungeon-secrecy of the Holy Office and the abomination of the Nazis and their Red rivals in this country".

But there is too much in this rich volume to find place in a short review, so we must leave unnoticed many subjects which are of the first importance—like Infallibility and the worship of Mary, and the New Dogma. All are noted, as you can see for yourself.—"The Bulwark", May.

More Persecution in Colombia.

Despite the fact that early this year the Colombian Minister of Foreign Affairs declared that "freedom of worship is a Colombian constitutional law which is observed and endorsed by the Government," and that a man may count upon Government protection in the exercise of his religious beliefs, the liberties of Evangelicals are being curtailed in various parts of that republic. Over forty years ago Evangelical work was begun in Bucaramanga, the capital city of the Department of Santander. To-day, there is an organized church of about a hundred members, a Sunday School, and other activities. Recently, it became necessary to replace the antiquated chapel in which the members had worshipped for years. Plans were approved by the city engineers, a building permit was issued, and work was begun last month. Immediately the Roman Catholic Bishop launched a campaign against the project from the cathedral pulpit. The opposition was continued by radio and press and through the public schools. The priests also organised petitions urging the civil authorities to rescind the building permit, and the President of the Republic was also urged to intervene. In the result the Mayor notified the Evangelical church members that he was rescinding the municipal building permit. The local Vicar of the Diocese thereupon published a manifesto in which he thanked the authorities for their "wise determination to sweep away the storm clouds which were crowding the limpid sky of Santander." The announcement went on: "In this hour of triumph of God and of the Immaculate Virgin, Patroness of the Diocese, they invite you to a solemn Te Deum, which in place of the public manifestation planned for the same hour, will be sung in the Cathedral Church, in all the parish churches, and in all the churches of the city, together with the Rosary of the Most Holy Virgin, with the consent of the Diocesan Prelate, to whom they credit this new triumph of which he with his prayers and advice was the soul and life." That is Romanism where it has virtually undisputed sway. Meanwhile let us pray for our persecuted brethren in Colombia.—"The Christian", 15th April, 1955.

PASSING EVENTS.

The Soviets and Religion.

In the current issue of World Dominion Sir Kenneth Grubb discusses the recent decree of the Central Committee of the Russian Communist Party on the subject of religion. He regards it as one of the most significant statements on the religious question to be published in Russia for at least thirty years. It is unusually official, for it was published with big headlines and bears the signature of Khrushchev, Secretary of the Central Committee. It strikes a new line by admitting mistakes made in anti-religious campaigns of the past. Even more significant is an admission that there is something positive to be said for the Christian Church, also that a church member can be a good citizen and loyal to the régime. Further, there is an admission that any fight against religion must be carried on, on an ideological level, and by reasonable argument. Again, it is stated, although inaccurately, that the Communist Party "has always considered it essential to avoid causing any offence to the feelings of believers." Party organizations, moreover, are blamed for having allowed anti-religious propaganda to fall into the hands of ignorant and unsuitable persons. After drawing attention to these admissions Sir Kenneth wisely says that it should not be assumed that there will be any relaxation in anti-religious propaganda. Indeed, it would seem that the intention is to give a new impetus to the campaign against belief. The decree in question, he suggests, represents "not a revision of basic policy, but a review of strategy and methods." The Soviet statement, in fact, says that "the Party considers it essential to conduct profound, systematic, scientific atheist propaganda," but "without permitting any offence to the religious sentiments of believers or ministers of cults." The Soviet leaders' experiment will be watched with interest by Christian people everywhere. We may rest assured that the new methods will be as powerless to defeat the Gospel as those that are now professedly abandoned.

"New Spirit" in Irish Methodism—Past Year one of the best in history of the Church.

The Rev. Earnest Shaw, outgoing President of the Methodist Church in Ireland, speaking at the Methodist Conference in Belfast, said he thought that the past year had been one of the best in the history of their Church. "I have a feeling that there is a new spirit in Irish Methodism—or perhaps it is a recovery of the old spirit—and as far as our Church is concerned, I believe the best is yet to be," he said.

Mr. Shaw said that he had travelled about 11,000 miles during the year attending many different functions and visiting churches. He had been impressed by the quality of their people in Eire.

Other speakers referred to the unity with other churches in connection with evangelism.

The Rev. S. H. Baxter said he believed that the relays of Dr. Billy Graham's services had contributed much to evangelism in Ireland.

The subject of evangelism in Universities was raised by Rev. R. G. Livingstone, Dean of Residences at Trinity College and University College, Dublin.

"The university is a new sphere of evangelism," said Mr. Livingstone, who added: "There is a crisis in the universities all over our islands. There is a gulf between the humanities and the sciences. We as a Church should regard the universities as a field for evangelism of the highest and most enlightened kind."

Mr. Livingstone was speaking after the adoption of the report of the Youth Department.

"Protestants in Spain live under the Cross."

Spain was at least a century behind other countries of Europe economically and industrially, and four centuries behind the rest of Europe in religious harmony, said the Rev. R. R. Davey, convener of the Continental Mission, when he spoke during Foreign Mission night at the General Assembly.

"To be a Protestant in Spain to-day means to live under the cross," he declared. "It means discrimination against your children who are taught in Roman Catholic schools, discrimination when you go to hospital, great difficulty in getting married, and great difficulty in getting a burial place and having a burial service."

Mr. Davey said that Spain was a church state. Protestants were looked upon as bad Spaniards and as likely to be engaged in un-Spanish activities. Often the charge of Communism was laid against them. That was the tragedy of modern Spain and it kept the country far behind the times.

The religious situation in Spain was a great embarrassment to many liberal Roman Catholics in other countries of the world.

20,000 Strong Church.

He added that it was a remarkable fact that a Protestant Church, 20,000 strong, existed in Spain and that it was a witnessing church. (Report of Irish Presbyterian Church Assembly—Belfast News Letter, 10/6/'55.)

Communism in North and South America— "Protestant Action's" Conjecture.

Quebec could become a communistic state because it is, like other R.C. states, fertile soil for any type of political or social transition. "The Vigilant", Australian monthly, in its issue of May, 1947, quotes the following from the "Southern Cross" of Nov. 20, 1946: "Incidentally, it is a remarkable fact that while few Catholics ever leave the Church to join other denominations, quite a number are lured into communistic circles." Mr. R. P. Walsh, editor of the "British Catholic Worker", addressing a meeting in Brighton in mail-week, said: "Recently I called on a local communist committee. All 13 members were lapsed Catholics." "The situation is the same here in Victoria, the two leading communists associated with the present industrial upheaval which has practically paralysed our State are J. J. Brown, trained for the Roman Catholic priesthood, and Mr. Flanagan of the Ironworkers' Union. Many other prominent communists throughout Australia are lapsed Roman Catholics," continued "The Vigilant".

The same is true in all Latin American countries. The "New York Times", in a survey of the situation in 16 of the 20 South and Central American republics, reported strong communist party organisation in all and membership up to 120,000 in Brazil, where they polled 16% of the total vote (almost 1,000,000) in a general election. In Cuba they hold nine legislative seats; Chile, three Cabinet posts; Peru, four seats in Congress; Uruguay, Colombia, Costa Rica, five members in Parliament,—"Protestant Action", Toronto, Feb. 1955.

Living Alongside the "Strange Monster" of Communism—Dr. Greer on Prospects of Taming It.

Dr. W. D. L. Greer, Bishop of Manchester, said in his presidential address to the Manchester Diocesan Conference in Manchester that among the poets, thinkers, and writers of to-day there was a much greater willingness to consider the Christian faith on its merits, and an increasing number were professed and practising Christians.

At Oxford and Cambridge, and, one hoped, elsewhere, interest in the Christian faith was greater than within living memory. In the intellectual world, the secularist and agnostic was on the defensive. "In the field of history, Lecky has been succeeded by Toynbee and Butterfield, and not a few of the Chairs of Philosophy in our universities are held by those who are not ashamed to call themselves Christians. I need not remind you that in the past twenty years the whole picture has altered in the world of the sciences."

Dr. Greer referred to Bertrand Russell's statement that "the new philosophy of physics is humble and stammering, where the old philosophy was proud and dictatorial," and said that this change in no way discredited physics or its methods. What it did discredit was the false assumption that a materialistic philosophy was a necessary presupposition for all honest scientists. For many a year yet, the man-in-the-street would bow down before the scientific view of the universe. The scientists had broken their own idol.

In education, the acrimonious denominational disputes which were at one time all too frequent were things of the past. The 1944 act sealed the nation's willingness to see its educational system based on Christian principles.

Dr. Greer said the Soviet State was, and probably would remain, formally committed to atheism, but the violent anti-God propaganda campaigns had largely been dropped, and although the Russian Orthodox Church was still severely fettered it was tolerated and appeared to be growing in strength. What was happening at present within the walls of the Kremlin might be anyone's guess, but it seemed not unlikely that since Stalin's removal the windows had been cleaned and more light was penetrating the gloomy recesses.

The doctrinaire fanaticism of early days seemed to be giving place to a more tolerant attitude, and if we had the patience to live alongside this strange monster long enough we might be able to tame it. "Nevertheless, it remains true that communism is in many ways a judgment upon a lukewarm and conventional Christianity which was forgetful of the apostolic injunction to remember the poor. Communism will not be fought down, nor argued down. It will only be lived down."

Rome and the Eskimo.

"Ottawa, January 17 (CP).—An elected member of the nine-man government of the Northwest Territories said to-day the Canadian North is in the grip of an educational emergency . . .

"He termed as shocking a situation at Aklavik where a number of Eskimo children of the Anglican faith could get teaching at a Roman Catholic mission school only if their parents permitted them to be instructed in Catholicism.

"He urged a single school system without discrimination as to race, religion or 'anything else', and said religion should be kept out of the classrooms".—"Protestant Action", Toronto, Feb., 1955.

Are Roman Catholics Persecuted?

Lord Pakenham, a leading Roman Catholic and a former Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Minister of Civil Aviation and First Lord of the Admiralty, says definitely that Roman Catholics are not a persecuted minority in Great Britain.

Speaking at the prize distribution at St. Thomas More School, Chelsea, on December 6, his lordship declared to the pupils:

"In England we Catholics don't get everything we feel we are entitled to, such as assistance in regard to schools . . .

"But it would be a great mistake for any of us and for other Catholics to excuse any weakness on the grounds that Catholics don't get a chance. Still less is there any excuse or justification for regarding ourselves as a persecuted minority."

[We think this distinguished Irishman's statement holds good for Northern Ireland too]

U.S.A. Quakers—Butter, Not Bombs.

The Friends Committee on National Legislation (Quakers) has given testimony before the House Committee on Agriculture regarding food surpluses in which it quoted Jesus as having said, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him", pointing out this was one way to reconcile man to man. "America has offered arms to England, France, Western Germany, Italy, Turkey, Greece, Pakistan, Indochina, Formosa, Japan and many other countries," the Quakers stated. "Why not share with the rest of the world butter instead of bombs, wheat instead of warships, cottonseed instead of cannon, milk instead of munitions, fats instead of flamethrowers, life instead of death?"

Japan after the American Occupation—Statement by Tomio Muto, ex-Propaganda Minister.

When the occupation ended, the number of Christians went down. To-day there are only 230,000 Protestants and 200,000 Roman Catholics in a population of 88 million. The only way to change the situation, says Tomio Muto, is through evangelism. "If we could use a $10 million fund for three years—using radio, newspapers, the theatre, all propaganda agencies—mobilize all Japanese ministers and all Christians, then I could convert 1,000,000 Japanese. Then Japan will change. Politics will change. Corruption, gambling and drinking will be attacked. With 1,000,000 Christians we would have 10 million sympathisers. We would create a moral foundation for Japan."—"Time".

Reformed Judaism.

In the last ten years, Reform Judaism, the liberal wing of U.S. Jewry, has more than doubled its membership. Whereas only one in 50 U.S. Jews was identified with Reform a decade ago, one in every five is affiliated with Reform to-day, and the total membership is approximately 1,000,000 (Orthodox Judaism claims 2,000,000 members, Conservative, 2,000,000). This progress report was issued at the 43rd biennial Assembly of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations in Los Angeles. Another major topic: Israel.

COMMENT (1).

CHRISTIANS' FIRST RESPONSIBILITY—PEOPLE, NOT PARTIES.

Dr. Marjorie Reeves, vice-principal of St. Anne's College, Oxford, addressing the women's session of the annual Assembly of the Congregational Union at Westminster, said that they should remember that their responsibility as Christians was first and foremost and always a responsibility to people.

The great danger to-day of getting caught up in parties and institutions and causes was that so often in their enthusiasm for these things they tended to ride rough-shod over people. They must have parties and institutions and cause, but at the same time they must remember that they were concerned with these things only in so far as they served real people.—"Manchester Guardian", 20/5/'55.

In this statement, which in general is well-intentional and true, we regret the ill-considered assertion that "their responsibility as Christians was first and foremost and always a responsibility to people". If it had been "a responsibility for people" we would recognise the Christian truth so declared. But the phrase is "to people," and it is rendered particularly emphatic by the words "first and foremost and always". The distinguished speaker, who has often shown her sincere attachment to the Christian faith, has fallen into an error of a most serious kind. No matter how old-fashioned it may be we have no option but to declare that a Christian's responsibility is "first and foremost and always to God".

We are not of course so stupid as not to see Dr. Reeves's point—the constant recognition of and acceptance of the worth of human personality, and the duty of seeing that human personality is not submerged in institutions or causes, or planning. We have often protested against the current practice of social workers referring to the people they are trying to help as "cases". It is too impersonal, too little expressive of the honour due to all men (1 Peter 2. 17). Other words of St. Peter come to mind in this connection—"Finally, be ye all of one mind, having compassion one of another, love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous." Social workers are not dealing with deserts, broken homes, poverty, sickness, etc. as if these were the facts to be considered in detachment, but with the human personalities with whom these problems are associated.

So it is also with mass organisations, and the steadily growing dominance of the State in individual affairs. The personality is threatened with extinction, to be replaced by the group or community in which each member is at best groomed into conformity: and at worst coerced into it.

Dr. Reeves, in this sense, was making a timely protest. But what a misconception she substitutes! Christianity is not first of all a social message, but a saving message. It is not a gospel of social reform but of individual repentance. Its symbol is the Cross, not the Conference Table. How often is that set out in the New Testament?—We recall how Peter and John replied to the Jewish Councillors who commanded them to cease speaking in the name of Jesus—"Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye." There the sense of apostolic responsibility was that they were answerable to God, not to men. Peter showed Ananias that his sin was not against men, but against God (Ac. 5.3). David, a thousand years before had realised the same truth, that his sin against Uriah was bad, but against God, infinitely worse, so he confessed "Against Thee, Thee only, haved I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight" (Ps. 51).

We should not, of course, separate the service of our fellowmen from the service of God too much, for we know that we serve God by loving and helping our fellows. But this is not to be confused with responsibility—there God must always be first. Our duty to Him is paramount.

St. Paul's words come to mind—"Whatever ye do, do it heartily as to the Lord, and not unto men; knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance; for ye serve the Lord Christ" (Col. 3. 23).

So we venture to raise a protest against the statement quoted; but at the same time we are sure that Dr. Reeves, a young lady whose academic eminence we respect, would readily agree with us that we owe our first responsibility to God our Father, and that He must always have the prior claim upon the Christian. Only when that claim is honoured can the right sort of human relationships exist.

COMMENT (2).

A contributor to the "Manchester Guardian" (30/5/55) who writes in the non-conformist interest, has given us his views on the evangelistic campaign recently conducted by Dr. Wm. Graham in Glasgow (we say that we regret the familiarity which permits those outside his own circle to call him "Billy Graham"). The writer generously admits that "Free Churchmen" can recognise that the Spirit does sometimes by-pass "the proper channels". What "the proper channels" are in the case of Free Churchmen, especially Methodists, is not disclosed, but we have had the impression that there was a day when Methodists gloried in the power of the Spirit, and claimed that whatever channels the Spirit used, were, by the fact that the Spirit used them, "proper channels". It is a sad decline, we think, when Free Churchmen adopt language which implies a quasi-sacramental view of church order and a hierarchical view of their ministry.

The writer, plainly a Methodist, acknowledges that Dr. Graham has reached the outsider more effectively than British Methodism did in 1954. He and we should certainly thank God for that, and every other sign of power and blessing, as well as conversion, to be witnessed in these days. We do not profess that our theology is in all respects the same as Dr. Graham's. We interpret the differences as being due to different upbringing, environment, education and temperament. If we differ as to the interpretation of some places of Holy Scripture we shall not therefore outlaw each other. Hence, while we do object to much that is done by way of preliminaries (and this sort of "warming up" process, borrowed from the lower levels of American revivalism, is nowadays an inevitable feature of the highest levels everywhere), we have nothing but thankfulness for every token of the Spirit's presence and grace in these meetings. We hope that Dr. Graham may long be engaged in the service of God and the preaching of the Gospel of Redemption.

Having said this we turn to the criticism of Dr. Graham contained in the article we refer to—

"But among the debits of the recent campaigns must be the fact that fundamentalist pietism has received the biggest boost it has had for fifty years. That is the rub of Dr. Graham, and I suspect it has rubbed most sorely many hundreds among the ministry of the Free Churches. There must be many churches in England, as there certainly are in the London suburbs, where for a generation the ministry and lay preachers have worked hard to wean their people from the pietistic pattern of late Victorian religion. They have found it hard going and in recent years have had to contend with new fundamentalist movements among the young (not least in the recrudescence of such religion in the universities of England, Scotland, and Wales in recent months). They have done so because they themselves have been trained in a theology and faith, for which two generations were in travail in the nineteenth century, but a faith which they believe to be not less but more truly a biblical theology than the reiterated 'The Bible says . . .' (which too often means the arid repetition of rigid 'evangelical' formulas—'just one clitch after another', as the lady said) of those they criticise."

There is the problem Dr. Graham has apparently created for these people. He preaches the Bible: they preach "biblical theology". In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries the fashion was to advocate the "higher criticism", and to decry a simple trust in the Bible, as though it could not comfort or instruct unless you knew the documentary theory of the Pentateuch, and which Psalms were post-exilic, and where 1st Isaiah ended and 2nd Isaiah began. We are not quarrelling with Biblical Scholarship—far from it—but protesting against the attitude which assumes that there is something naive in believing and diligent devotional study of the Old Testament and the New.

We are very tired also of the assumption that "fundamentalism" is an enemy to be fought. There must be many shades of opinion, and degrees of understanding in the study of the Bible. One result of attacking "fundamentalist" views is that nowadays more and more people know less and less about the Bible. One result of fundamentalist views is a lively interest in the Bible, and an awareness that "whatever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope", (Rom. 15. 4).

Surely the task of the ministry to-day is not to deride fundamentalism, or literalism. The field of the Christian Warfare is quite other. We have to fight materialism, communism, the world, the flesh, and the devil. The problem to be faced is not the one created by those who believe, as we reckon it, too much, but the one created by the general want of faith.

Further, the swing over to "biblical theology", characteristic of the prophets and teachers of our day, is not in continuity with the attitude to the Bible of thirty years ago (the hey-day of assured results of higher criticisms), but rather in favour of the older view, because it allows the Bible to speak for itself. The situation may be roughly expressed thus—a generation ago the theme was "what I think of the Bible", now it is "what the Bible thinks of me".

* * *

We are not always sure what is meant by "fundamentalism", or what people mean when they speak of "pietism". But we don't think anyone should belittle spiritual earnestness, and genuine love for the Bible. God does speak in it. Historical and literary criticism may enlighten us as to the environment, chronology, etc. The structure of books and the progress of revelation throw light on the message: but the message has to be there, and we have to heed it. In short, there is no substitute for the Bible. Its unique purpose and its revelation of God stand above all human scrutiny. This indeed, is plainly shown by the intense preoccupation with the Bible in every college. In the academic world Hebrew and O.T. studies flourish as they have never done before. Destructive criticism is as out of date as bustles and top-hats.

* * *

The position as we see it is that those who today advocate and expound "biblical theology" ought not to controvert the so-called fundamentalist. They should seek a rapprochement, so that they can face the unbeliever with that "sword of the spirit which is the Word of God" (Eph. 6), and in the common warfare find how near they are.

There still remains of course a view of Holy Scripture which is neither given to literal acceptance of the Bible, nor to the proclamation of biblical theology. This "modernism" lingers on, but is now rather out-of-date. In this comment we have not had it in mind at all.

"HERESY IS A VERY GREAT EVIL."

This is an axiom in Roman Catholic circles. In ages of ignorance and superstition it was easy to represent heresy in this way, and, having done so to release upon the heretics the worst instincts of orthodoxy. Intolerance, bigotry and malice exist and must have an outlet, and something to feed on. It would be foolish indeed to ignore these factors and to assume that every move against heresy was inspired by pure love of God, and that every faggot and stake were symbols of the love of souls.

Further, crusades against heresy have to be fought (or, had to be fought in the past) with carnal weapons, and the wielders of carnal weapons are not always distinguished by their disinterestedness. "What's in it for me?" is a question such men ask, and they are not to be contented with promises post-dated to the hereafter. The chivalrous gentlemen who made havoc of southern France and its Albigenses in the thirteenth century under de Montford's leadership were men of mixed motives: the opportunities of plunder were not entirely irrelevant when the recruiters sought men to serve in that holy war. No doubt the same instinct for cruelty and rapine, the same inhumanity, exist in our fallen nature to-day. Indeed, compared with twentieth century Nazism, Fascism and Communism, the Holy Inquisition displayed great restraint. But, in principle, human wickedness is not to be measured by what it succeeds in doing, but by what it wants to do, and how it sets about it.

We all know something about the crusades to conquer Palestine and to put the Holy Places in Christian hands. The Crusaders fought with unprecedented savagery, Jew as well as Saracen fell as victims, and the adventurers from Europe for a time succeeded in setting up petty principalities for themselves. The princes of Europe who encouraged the leaders to go to the Eastern Mediterranean were not solely concerned with the Holy Places—some potentially dangerous rivals were got out of the way, and once in the Levant anything might happen. Mohammedanism was and is the great heresy, for its early associations with Christianity must not be forgotten. But the crusading heroes from western Europe, fired by their Church authority, were not content to fight the infidels, or followers of the false prophet. The stories of the great wealth and the glories of Constantinople, the capital of the eastern Christian Empire brought the Crusaders there (instead of Jerusalem) and their ghastly conduct, shocking sacrileges, and revolting enormities were not equalled by the Turks when they conquered the city in 1453. In view of the booty to be had it was not difficult to treat eastern Christian as heretics, and, of course, "heresy is a very great evil."

These are but samples from the past to show how valuable it was, from a materialistic viewpoint, to declare that heresy is a very great evil:

To-day, greed and exploitation are not in evidence to any like extent. The present attitude is to continue to regard heresy as a very great evil, but to oppose it as a spiritual danger, or as an alien and intrusive force (the attitude of official circles in Spain in some degree). Only a day or two ago we read in the "Irish Times" of a Church celebration, a centenary or such, and the preacher, a Roman Catholic clergyman referred to the trials of the people of Ireland a hundred years ago, shortly after the great famine, and to evictions of tenantry to make way for "an alien race and an alien creed." Thus we see, that patriotism as well as piety may now be summoned to the stand against heresy. Nationalism also may be recruited, loyalty to the supra-national Church intertwined with the spirit of Nationalism which many a pope has regarded as an enemy. The label "alien" might quite appropriately be applied to the interference with the old Irish Church in the 11th and 12th centuries which resulted in its being subjected to the Papal supremacy and organisation. "Alien" in race is scarcely justified when applied to any group within these islands. Wales, Scotland, Ireland and England are inhabited in the main by peoples of the same racial mixture. But of course we know that the sturdiest Anglo-Saxon resident in Ireland becomes, if he is a Roman Catholic, a real Celt—it is not for nothing that the Irish word for Protestant is (or used to be) "Sassanach"—Saxon.

Another aspect of this prevalent theory that "heresy is a very great evil" is the glib phrase "error has no rights." The man who pronounces that generally does it with such an air of judicial finality that we might think he had said something original or at least true. But the obvious blunder here is the use of the word "error," for what we must be concerned with is not the rights of the "error," but the rights of the individual who holds to the alleged error. The "error" has no existence apart from the personality identified with it.

It is usual nowadays for Roman Catholics to declare the indefeasible rights of conscience: is this consistent with the assertion that error has no rights? If the individual has rights which are entitled to respect and expression then all talk about errors having no rights is rhetoric and no more.

* * *

Yet, we can imagine how effective these "axioms" are when solemnly declared, as if they were the words of God Himself, in the presence of impressionable, earnest, but poorly educated people. The more impressively they are uttered the more they have their impact upon the receptive and uncritical mind. The young student in the seminary, the young man in the sodality or praesidium, the young woman anxious to be a handmaid of the Church, will not question them. Heresy is such a comprehensive word, so ominous in sound, so persistently sustained as the bogey, that an analysis of its meaning, and a scrutiny of the many significances it may bear will not occur to those who hear the word with a shudder. The denunciation of heresy has been so successful that we could wish that the denunciation of sin had been equally so.

There are heresies and heresies. The most rudimentary definition is we suppose, that heresy is anything which divides and weakens the solid front of the Church. To foster or create a division is the sin of sins. To break the unity of the Church is heinous crime. Heresy must always be wrong and deserving of condign punishment because Christian truth cannot exist or be found outside the Church. Once you step outside the Church you are in heresy (perhaps in its near relative, schism), even if you believe the true Catholic faith of the Church's creeds which were assented to in the days when the Church was not divided. If you are within the Church, and dissent even a little from any position the Church has defined you are in heresy. You approach it when you differ from a widely held opinion even if not so far defined as binding.

Thus the safe position is to take the line popularly called the "Fides Carbonarii," that is, the faith of the charcoal burner who said he believed what the Church taught—when asked to describe it, he did not know, but was satisfied to believe whatever the Church believed. There is nothing commendable in this, and there is no supernatural virtue in being ignorant. We may be ignorant of a great deal through circumstances—but it is only pride or vanity which makes us think that ignorance is a thing to boast of.

The intelligent man, the thinking man, will want to consider the reason of things as far as he can. He will want to "approve the things that are excellent," and so must give consideration to the matters of faith proposed to him. Can "heresy" be regarded only as "a very great evil?" Can we accept the explanation, which is now put forward (and which is of course a surrender to the pressure of scholarship and Biblical learning exercised by Protestants)—that heresy is the holding of a truth of the Christian faith out of the context of the whole body of the Church's teaching? That is, in other words, to hold a truth in disproportionate relationship to all the other truths, to exaggerate, to select.

Now that sort of explanation (quite different from saying that heresy is the holding of false doctrine, but only a wrong proportion) may be satisfactory to Roman Catholic hearers. It mitigates the fault a little, and suggests that if Protestants could only be got to see things correctly, their heresies would die a natural death (unlike their upholders in earlier days). But it cannot then be described as "a very great evil" for it is commonly held that sincere Christians who remain in invincible ignorance may be saved; and indeed, that they belong to "the soul of the Church," though separate from its body.

The thinking man, as we have said, is one who considers the teaching of Scripture as God-given, and therefore authoritative in settling disputes in that "whatever is not read therein nor may be proved thereby is not required of any man to be believed as necessary to salvation." He considers the progress of dogma, and recognises that tradition is an uncertain guide, and that dogmas not defined till the nineteenth and twentieth centuries cannot claim to be true or revealed in the sense in which the Incarnation, Virgin Birth, Atonement, and Resurrection of Christ are true and revealed, and necessary. He looks at the course of Christian history and sees the progress of the Papacy and accounts for its rise and claims on grounds which call for no fictions about St. Peter. Hence his "heresy" is a protest against the Roman Catholic Church on the ground that it is the real heretic, for it has altered the proportion of faith, and multiplied doctrines and observances to such a degree that the truths God has revealed for our acceptance are obscured and distorted.

* * *

Heresy has been defined by a Roman Catholic theologian (the Rev. A. Marchand, C.S.S.R.) as "a voluntary and obstinate error contrary to a truth revealed by God and proposed as such by the Church." By this definition most of what are known as evangelical Christians are not heretics, and their Churches, Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist, etc. are free from heresy, for they hold no opinions contrary to the truths God has revealed. Of course Fr. Marchand, C.S.S.R. may believe that there are other ways and sources of revelation than the Incarnate Christ in His Word. If so, he is in error. The heresies are not ours but his.

In a short treatise on the Canon Law of the Roman Catholic Church Professor A. Villion (Institut Catholique de Paris) tells us that consecrated cemeteries are such that "only the bodies of Christians ought to be buried there: the intrusion of the body of an unbeliever, an apostate, a heretic, a schismatic, a free-mason, an ex-communicated person . . . profanes it." Thus the heretic who merely exaggerates or emphasises a doctrine too much is thrown together with unbelievers, etc. Plainly by the requirement of Canon Law heresy is "a very great evil!" This is the traditional view of the nature of heresy, and, as we know, the Middle Ages rather than the early centuries carried the search for and detection and destruction of heretics to extreme lengths.

The Albigenses in southern France are known to us chiefly through the writings of their avowed enemies. The usual account of their "heresies" tells us that they condemned oath-taking, war, capital punishment, obedience to temporal authority, marriage, the eating of flesh and drinking of milk, the veneration of crosses and images, and the building of churches. This is what their enemies said, and if that is kept in mind we can see that if a magistrate ordered the Albigenses to contribute to building a church, or to take an oath, and they declined they were at once guilty of civil disobedience. Almost anything in those days could be made a crime against authority. Condemning marriage and the union of sexes sounds pretty bad, but did not the great St. Jerome do the same? Did not the monastic institutions do the same also?

The Church piously declared that it did not impose the suffering of death on these cruelly wronged people, but "if they merited death she delivered them to the secular arm." The Church did not expect those she handed over to survive long! The secular arm, i.e., the State tribunals were requested not to shed blood, so instead of butchering the victims it burned them—hence in the 16th century, 400 years ago this year, the Marian martyrs of the Reformed faith died at the stake. A hundred and fifty years earlier John Hus of Bohemia suffered the same fate for the truth's sake.

A favourite claim is that heresy has ever been a danger to the temporal welfare of the State. History has long since falsified that claim, but it is still commonly alleged against the Albigenses because the atrocities perpetrated in the name of the Church need every possible pretext to palliate them. The probability is that the allegations had little or no truth in them. Even if the Albigenses held to notions we do not share, or approve, the treatment they received is not to be justified by specious argument.

The remedy for heresy is not fire and sword, but love, gospel truth, and patient display of the authentic example and imprint of the Saviour in heart and life.

THE STORY OF A PRIEST.

(told by Rev. Mariano Rughi)

My conversion from Roman Catholicism to Christ was not just an act, but the result of a very long and painful process, which lasted several years; and this goes back to my college life in Assisi (Italy). At that time, I felt led to ask my professor how he could reconcile the practice of Pope Honorius with the official teaching of the church. My professor, in answering, said that this pope did teach the error, true, but he did not speak or teach as a pope, i.e., "Ex Cathedra", but as a private theologian. The answer was far from convincing, and I had to express my dissatisfaction. I wanted my doubts to be banished; but my professor tried to twist my words and read into them a desire, on my part, to uphold heretical teaching. Of course, I was shocked that heresy should have been mentioned in reply to a reasonable enquiry, as I had no thought of heresy in mind when putting the question to him. But there it is: Rome dislikes the questionings of an independent mind, and always discourages or suppresses them by the demand for blind belief and acceptance of the Roman dogma.

But God was awakening me to rise and prepare for my journey, though I did not realize it at that time. For it was during that period of anxiety that I began to be greatly concerned as to the certainty and foreknowledge of eternal salvation.

Once more I could see how the church was contradicting itself, but I dared not say a word to anybody; and so for a time I went on fighting my doubts single-handed, till a day came when I, feeling so deeply concerned had to speak to my Father Confessor. The reply came very quickly, a simple "Oh! my boy, these are temptations of the devil!" I was far from being convinced: I knew John 3.16, which I quoted to prove my doubts were founded on something, but soon I realized that mine had been a bold temerity, for my Father Confessor gave me a terrific lesson on humility and blind obedience to the church—you notice to the church, not to the Lord Jesus Christ.

At this stage I must make a digression, though much to the point. By this time I had ceased to go regularly to the confessional though I had never been an enthusiast for auricular confession, a practice which I observed more by an external compulsion than by an inner desire. At times I found it a real burden and, nearly always, a cruel torturing of conscience.

I want to stress this point, because one of the pet arguments of the Roman Catholics in favour of auricular confession is the sense of comfort the penitent is promised to find by pouring out his sins into the ear of the priest, whose absolution will remove the burden of sin and its guilt. I am quite prepared to admit that a kind of comfort may be found there; but how futile it is in effect and how brief in its duration! Surely it is nothing but the result of a passing emotion.

During my five years of priesthood in the Church of Rome (five years may seem rather a comparatively short period; yet it was long enough for me to learn a good deal about confession and the confessional) I heard the confessions of a great many people: many I knew personally. In some of them there was sincerity and earnestness, which one could see through their anxiety and longing for freedom from that besetting sin or from that particular vice; and yet, week after week, these same people had to come back, much to their distress and grief, to confess the very same, often shameful and hated sin. "But why ought this to be so?" was the question of those anxious souls, and I, the Father Confessor, whose duty was to bring peace to them, could never give a convincing answer; nor could any other have done so in the same position.

Yet the priest will tell the penitent that he is lacking sincerity or that he is not fulfilling the required conditions for a valid confession, and because of that he has often to utter a threat to deny the sacramental absolution of those habitual sins. Here I leave it to you to imagine the awful effect this method always causes in the minds of those thirsty and yet blind souls.

I cannot help thinking of that lovely incident in the life of Christ when He met with the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well. Indeed, here we have the answer to the thirsty souls who are continually deceived by being compelled to go to the priest for the quenching of their spiritual thirst. How true are the words of the Lord to this woman: "Jesus answered and said unto her, Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again." The Romish confessional is just like Jacob's well, whose water does satisfy, but only for a time. "But whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life" (John 4. 13, 14).

Here is the true source of a lasting satisfaction, even our Lord Jesus Christ, Who knows the secret need of every sinner and for each has the living water. "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." This invitation comes from the very heart of God; and no priest, no bishop, no pope in the Church of Rome, will ever give anybody peace of heart which they themselves lack. Man remains thirsty, heavy laden and helpless until God satisfies him. Just as a stream or spring fills a well, so the gift of God brings blessing until we have all we need, even Eternal life: "but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

I suddenly felt an inward perplexity. The idea of giving up the vocation for the priesthood came into my mind, but I soon repelled it as a heinous temptation. I was doing my last year of theological studies, and was almost ready to receive ordination. I thought immediately of the family honour to consider, for in a Roman Catholic country having a priest in the family is a wonderful privilege and a great honour. I was thinking of my parents and friends, who were looking forward to seeing me as a priest celebrating mass. I know they were not very worthwhile thoughts, but, not knowing the Lord Jesus Christ as my Saviour and Lord, I felt weak and powerless in my convictions.

I had to go through my ordination, and thus it was that I became a priest. Sent to a parish as curate in charge, I started my ministry with zeal and enthusiasm, and soon scored even some successes by which my old doubts and perplexity were removed. But was this a sign of sound conviction, or rather the result of a passing emotion? In my parish work I felt a new atmosphere and different surroundings, namely, a certain freedom, once denied during my college life. I took the liberty of reading the Bible and other books and literature forbidden by the church. As a parish priest, later on, I came into contact with many people and entered into religious discussion with them.

One day I received a shocking revelation during an intimate conversation with a Franciscan monk. I discovered he was going through the same painful experience about the assurance of salvation. I began to question myself: if this Church of Rome is the true church of Christ, how is it that one of her best followers, one of her sons, a man of integrity and of strict life, is most doubtful about his salvation, dissatisfied with himself and suffering great spiritual perplexities? My doubts revived once more, and again I was in yet another spiritual crisis, but this time leading up to a climax. The reaction was that the mass, the confessional and other priestly duties became a terrible burden.

For a time I sought diversion in amusements. I found that I began to lose my sense of duty; much to my personal shame, I saw myself falling gradually lower in a worldly standard of life. What did I really need? I needed not diversion but cleansing, not excitement but spiritual repair, not amusement but Christ.

Was the church then ready to point me to this One who could take me out of this degenerate situation? No, Rome was there to apply canonical punishment, namely, a week's retreat in a monastery. But the cure was not adequate to the disease.

I was still alone, fighting what then appeared to be a lost battle, when one day a flash of Divine Light revealed the darkness of my soul. What was I to do? Finally I decided to leave the parish and my parents, and I went to Rome.

There was no fixed plan in my mind, nor had I any acquaintance in the city to whom I could turn for aid. Yet during my first day in Rome my search was rewarded by a casual discovery of a Methodist Episcopal church. I was able to contact the minister, to whom I opened my heart and presented my desperate situation; but soon I had to learn that leaving the Church of Rome was not as easy as I thought. The Lateran Treaty of 1929, with its fifth Article, paragraph 2, was the great obstacle, for it reads:

"In any case apostate priests, or those subject to censure, cannot be appointed or continued as teachers, or hold office or be employed as clerks where they are in immediate contact with the public."

That meant choosing between retiring from any kind of public life or leaving behind everything dear to me—parents, friends and country. The sacrifice required by the latter was terrific, but I was given strength to bear it and God opened the door in a most remarkable way.

The Methodist minister introduced me to Prof. E. Buonaiuti, an ex-Roman Catholic priest, who also as a result of the Lateran Treaty had to give up the "Cathedra" of Comparative Religions in the State University of Rome for being himself subject to canonical censure. He at once made contacts with Protestant societies in Switzerland, France and Strasbourg, to find me an exit from Rome.

Weeks and months passed by, but there was no good prospect in sight, when at last God sent into the picture the Rev. M. Casella—another expatriate, who was already working in a parish in Northern Ireland.

The "Priests' Protection Society" sent the lifeboat to rescue me. This enabled me to have a thorough training in the evangelical reformed doctrine. I take this opportunity of paying a tribute of deep gratitude toward the Priests' Protection Society for enabling me to come out of Roman Catholicism into the light of the Gospel.

Of course it has cost me very much to leave my parents, my friends, my country and everything dear to me in Italy; but, when I thought to obey the voice of God rather than the voice of the flesh and the world, all my hardships had been changed into sweetness, especially when I completed my spiritual journey from a sinful life to a personal knowledge of a living Christ.—In "The Converted Catholic Magazine", N.Y., U.S.A.

MUSLIMS MARCH ON AFRICA.

Three Muslims met in Mecca early in August. There in the sacred city of the dominant faith of the Middle East the rulers of Egypt, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia reached a momentous decision. While hundreds of Christian leaders were converging on Evanston to discuss the hope of the world, Premier Gamal Abdel Nasser, Prime Minister Mohammed Ali and King Saud acted to determine the future of Africa, a continent that forms a considerable part of the world and one essential to its future. It is not impossible that in the perspective of history the meeting of the three may be given a larger place than any other in recent years. For here was proclaimed the first open declaration of Islam on the march. The leaders of these three countries decided to launch a missionary crusade to save Africa from Christianity and Communism. In the first interview he gave on his return from Mecca, Premier Nasser of Egypt said, according to the "New York Times" for August 22: "I hope the Western powers won't take any untoward steps against us in this missionary campaign, because the establishment of Islam in Africa will be a shield against Communism." Other statements issued on the project indicate that the growing influence of Christian missions provides another incentive for the new missionary movement.

The seriousness of this threat against the Christian missionary movement is indicated by the nature of the indictments the Muslims intend to bring against Christian missionaries. Premier Nasser was quoted as saying that the Bishop used missionaries in an attempt to dominate the pagan tribes of the southern Sudan and to drive a wedge between them and the Muslims in the northern part of the country. In the bitter struggle between Egypt and Great Britain for control of the Sudan, such charges have been an effective weapon in the Egyptian arsenal. But it is not only concerning the Sudan that such charges are made. There is a general claim by the Muslims that Christian missionaries are the "vanguard of imperialism". Of course, this is also charged by Communists, and an item of propaganda on which two such forces agree is likely to drive deep into African consciousness and do great harm.

According to the interview in the "Times", the Egyptian leader said the resources and graduates of El Azhar would be used to carry Islam into the hinterland of Africa. This thousand-year-old university has students from more than thirty countries. If it receives the financial support which the three governments are in a position to give it, it can do a far more effective job than it has been doing in recent years. At present neither its facilities nor its methods of teaching are impressive...

The Pakistani premier may see in African missions an opportunity to divert the energies of young Muslims who form a restive element in the huge population of Pakistan. King Saud may see in such a missionary movement an opportunity to put to good use part of the enormous income now coming to Saudi Arabia (which means King Saud) from prodigally flowing oil wells. With his fantastic income, he is in position to finance a mighty enterprise of Islamic expansion.

What that country needs, said Rabbi Herbert Weiner (Temple Israel, South Orange, N.J.), is a relaxed form of Judaism like Reform. Rabbi Weiner urged a three-year experimental religious programme there, including a "pilot" Reform synagogue in Haifa. Israelis, he said, should have some other alternative. "The tragedy of religion in Israel is that (it) expends so much passion on the dietary laws that it seems to have little time left over for concern with the laws which deal with the problems of man living with man."—"Time".

China.

Chinese Christians were the most conspicuous and regretted absentees at Evanston. But while they stayed away from the assembly of the World Council, which they have called a "tool of Anglo-American imperialism" ever since its Central Committee condemned the communist invasion of South Korea, they were holding a sort of "Evanston" of their own. At Peking from July 22 to August 8, 232 delegates from 62 denominations and church organizations moved a long way toward a united Protestant front for China. The "First National Protestant Church Conference" reorganized the old "Three Self-Reforms Movement" and the "Oppose America—Aid Korea Movement"—the two main interests of the Chinese churches since the communists took over—into a "Patriotic Protestant Chinese National Movement".—"The Vigilant", Melbourne, 15/3/55.

Difficulties in France for the Clergy.

Not many have realised that the Vatican has undertaken a double-barrelled purge of reform movements in the French Roman Catholic priesthood. A good deal of attention has been given the efforts to rid the "worker-priest" crusade of any Marxist tinge and to bring its members under a discipline which would suppress unwanted innovations. But interest in the fate of the worker-priests has obscured the stern treatment dealt to the other wing of the evangelistic Mission de France—the wing devoted to work in rural regions where the Abbe Godin and other pioneers of the movement declared the population had become almost completely dechristianised. This movement also had its seminary for training priests closed and its 300 priests told that their vocation was under Vatican scrutiny. On August 15 the Pope issued a new constitution for these rural priests. This confirms their status and aims, but they are taken out of the control of the French bishops and put under a special "prelate nullius"—an office with episcopal authority but answerable directly and only to the Pope. Evidently Roman church authorities mean to guard any further possible experimentalism on the part of the rural priests. Meanwhile, what has happened to the worker-priests? They were ordered to give up all jobs in industry and positions in labour unions by March 1. A few of them, members of tightly disciplined orders (especially the Jesuits), obeyed without a murmur. But the well informed Swiss Evangelical Press Service states that of the approximately 100 worker-priests less than half had bowed to the Church's command. Of the 78 who publicly refused to obey, only 18 have done so to date. Only two, however, have been punished; the bishop of Marseille placed an interdict on them. Rome and the French hierarchy are proceeding with extreme caution in the cases of all the rest.—Christian Century.—Quoted in "The Christian Irishman", Apl., '55.

Theological Training in U.S.A.

The following comes from the Late News Column of the "Glasgow Herald" of 12th January, 1955. "Rockefeller Religious Fund. Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jun., has set up a twenty million dollar fund to 'strengthen and develop Protestant theological education in the United States. The gift is probably the largest single grant ever made for religious training.' John Davison Rockefeller, sen., died in 1937 at the advanced age of 98, was in his day the richest man in the world. He began as an assistant book-keeper, and though his salary was small he managed to save enough to buy a share in a produce farm. Taking advantage of the oil-boom in the United States, he and his partner backed an inventor who invented a new oil cleaning process, and all of them made immense fortunes. In his lifetime the father gave away to charities and educational institutions the huge sum of five hundred million dollars. The son, John D. Rockefeller, jun., entered his father's business, and soon became his chief assistant. When the father retired all his affairs were put into his son's hands. He not only supervised the business, but looked after the various Rockefeller foundations, as well as making lavish gifts of his own. For example he gave a large sum towards the restoration of Rheims Cathedral, and he handed over to the United Nations a site in New York for its buildings which was worth about two million pounds."

Plans for the use of this seven million pound gift are now being discussed in New York. The aim of the donation is, of course, to strengthen theological education in the United States. The money was handed over in the form of investment securities "to the Sealantic Fund, which will negotiate schemes with the hundreds of seminaries which train for the ministry of all Protestant denominations. One of the chief aims of the Rockefeller plan is to attract able young men into the Christian ministry, and to place the possibilities of service in the ministry before young graduates in the universities. A start has already been made with this scheme by the offer of 'student fellowships' to graduates so that they may reside in a theological college for a period and study the claims of the Christian ministry as a possible life 'calling' . . . Another part of the plan includes the invitation to the United States of younger religious leaders from Europe, Asia and Africa to study theological problems in the United States, and to be effective links in the growth of world Christianity."—"The Bulwark", April, 1955.

You may be a "Communist!"

Since Congress unanimously adopted the Communist Control Act of 1954 under hectic circumstances in which, as has been admitted, the members themselves did not know for what they were voting, it is hardly surprising that the ordinary American is uninformed concerning a measure that constitutes the most serious infringement yet of our constitutional liberties.

One glance at the actual text of this legislation is enough to indicate that the many warnings regarding the scope of its application are fully justified. Americans who tend to consider any anti-communist bill a good thing should study the fourteen points established as the criteria for the courts to adjudge an individual to be a "communist". There is hardly a person who has participated in any liberal organization, or any churchman who has taken part in Christian social action, who has not done something that brings him within the "tests" a jury is to consider as evidence of "communism".

Though the preamble to the labour section of the bill indicates that labour unions are the main target of the legislation concerning "communist infiltrated organizations", the simple fact is that the word "any organization" appears throughout these sections without that qualifying adjective, "labour". If a person, including a bishop or other clergyman or a layman, has been active in a peace or civil rights organization which comes to be adjudged a "communist front", however unjustly, any organization, be it a parish or other church group in which he becomes active, is rendered liable to definition as "communist-infiltrated".

This is not a laughable matter. A formula has been written into the basic law of the land which could be put into operation eliminating all freedom of dissent. It has been said many times before but it must be said again and again that freedom is indivisible. A defence of the rights of people, rights of the people with whom we do—if it is not already too late.—"The Churchman", U.S.A.—Quoted in "The Protestant World", Sydney, Feb., '55.

PASSING EVENTS.

The Fallacy of "Unity."

A report has come to our desk concerning an unprecedented three-day conference in Berlin between Catholics and Lutherans under the auspices of the (Catholic) "Una Sancta" (One and Holy) movement. In an apparent effort to reunite with Rome a church whose founder was unequivocally in protest against Rome, approximately 150 Roman Catholic and Lutheran theologians, laymen, priests and ministers discussed problems of alleged mutual interest, considering the possibility of eventual unity of all Christians "in one flock, under one shepherd". In view of the Vatican's unalterable stand on the heresy of Protestants, it is easy to foresee that the movement, if any, will be toward Rome and her "shepherd", the Pope.

This startling event, if true, should shock the Protestant world out of its complacency, particularly since it comes only a month after the assembly of the World Council of Churches (with which it has no connection). It will be remembered that there were those at Evanston who regretted the fact that the Roman Catholic Church was not represented at the Council.

As for us, we would desire the union of all who profess to be the sons of the light, but if that union would imply the sacrificing of truth, we would rather remain alone. Bishop Charles P. Anderson, of Chicago, forcibly expressed our feelings when he said, in 1910: "Better have five hundred churches, each one with its own tenets and its own spiritual convictions, than one united Church at the sacrifice of a single truth or of a single spiritual reality."—"Converted Catholic", 1955.

Persecution Continues in Italy.

That the persecution of Protestant churches in Italy still continues with government approval is evident from the following dispatch in "The New York Times" from Rome, dated December 12:

The police removed a sign Saturday from the Rome headquarters of the Church of Christ, a U.S. Protestant denomination. The sign had been replaced only the day before on the assumption that an Italian court had permitted the church to replace it.

Missionaries of the Church of Christ, most of them Texans, have had difficulties with the local authorities ever since they arrived in Italy at the beginning of 1949.

Most of the trouble was caused by an unpretentious sign Chieso di Cristo (Church of Christ) put near the entrance of the sect's meeting place in the Via Achille Papa, a quiet street not far from the Vatican.

The police repeatedly asked the Church of Christ to remove the sign because it had not yet obtained legal recognition from the Ministry of Interior and thus had no right to operate a public place of worship.

The missionaries failed to comply and last February the police tore off the sign.

The Church of Christ brought Court action against the police chief of Rome on the grounds that he had overstepped his powers by ordering forcible removal. Last week the public prosecutor

THE NEW TESTAMENT,
PETER, AND ROME.

Was the Apostle Peter the founder of the Roman See and the first Pope of the Catholic Church? Peter was first stationed at Antioch, even if it be admitted that he went to Rome, and so Antioch is justly entitled to the primacy over the other churches. And if honour be due to every church according to the dignity of its founder, the second and third places of honour are due to Ephesus and Jerusalem, for James and John are mentioned as those "who seemed to be pillars", along with Peter (Gal. 2:9).

According to Eusebius, Peter presided in Rome for twenty-five years, but according to Galatians 2, about twenty years after the death of Christ, he was at Jerusalem, and from thence went to Antioch, where he remained some time. But from the death of Christ to the end of the reign of Nero, under whom they affirm Peter to have been slain, there were only thirty-seven years. Deducting the twenty years at Jerusalem leaves a total of seventeen years, which must be divided between two bishoprics, if Peter went to Rome.

More important yet, Paul's letter to the Roman saints, and his long catalogue of pious persons in that church to whom he sends salutation, contain no mention of Peter, who ought on no account to be omitted, if he were presiding over that church. Afterwards, when Paul was a prisoner at Rome, he wrote to several of the churches, giving the names of several of the brethren who were with him, but there is not a single word to imply that Peter was there at that time.

Calvin is conclusive on the conferring of the keys, proving that Peter received nothing that was not communicated equally to the other apostles. Concerning the rock on which the Church was to be founded, Paul makes Christ the Chief Cornerstone (Eph. 2. 21-22), and Peter himself points to Christ as that "Cornerstone, elect and precious". (1 Peter 2. 4-5). Peter was but one of the twelve, equal with all the rest, and later in his ministry was corrected by Paul, and accepted his reproof (Gal. 2. 11). It is obvious that Peter was neither at Rome, nor in the place of leadership which is claimed by the papists, and without which their whole empire is without foundation.—"Converted Catholic".

"IF GOD WEARIED OF HUMANITY . . ."

Sir Winston Churchill, speaking of the dreadful potentialities wrapped up in the hydrogen bomb, is reported to have spoken movingly of "watching little children at their merry play and wondering what could be before them if God wearied of humanity." The mere thought of the sudden destruction that hangs over our world chills the blood with sudden fear that may be dissipated for a while, only to return again with new terror. It fills us with foreboding to think of such lethal weapon in the hands of a power hostile to our way of life and to contemplate the possibility of our city, our nation, and even our entire civilization, being wiped out without warning. Secondly only to that dread thought of doom is the fearful necessity that has been thrust upon us of holding a like threat over the heads of our potential foes.

Sceptics who have mocked at the Scriptural doctrine of the final punishment of the impenitent have now been compelled in the name of science to believe in another form of future woe to be inflicted not only upon the wicked but upon the helpless and innocent. Those who have scoffed at the Biblical prophecies of the end of the world and the last judgment, now have no other alternative than to envisage the awful possibility of misguided human genius writing a sudden horrible finish to the history of the race. Will God weary of humanity and permit men to work out their own damnation, more dreadful than the flood in Noah's day? It would not be the first time that God has allowed men to have their own way, granting them their own evil desires. It is a principle of divine judgment that when men give up God, He gives them up to work out their own doom: "Even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient; being filled with all unrighteousness."

Notwithstanding, God has not wearied of humanity. The Gospel assures us, on the contrary, that "God so loved the world . . ." The history of redemption testifies to His "long suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." Time and again in the long story of the ages, God has intervened in His sovereign grace to save men and nations from the bitter fruits of their own evil doings. With the Book of books in our hands, we should not be surprised, though we ought to be grieved, at the present propensity of the human race to rush headlong to its own destruction. That is what the Bible calls sin. What should surprise us is that God still loves wicked men: "God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

Neither scientists nor statesman have any solution to the problem that this new weapon poses for us all. Yet there is a solution. It is not one that can be initiated either by inventors or political leaders: it must come from the ordinary man, from the individual, from the reader of these lines as well as from the writer. It is this: that each one for himself first and then for his people, we should all confess our shortcomings and turn to God casting ourselves upon His mercy: "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon him while he is near: let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts: and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

If there were a genuine spiritual revival, a turning from the sin of selfishness and materialism to the God of justice and of mercy, it would bring a solution to this pressing problem and to all others that confront us to-day. Then we should no longer lean upon the broken reed of carnal weapons, but upon those spiritual weapons which are mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strongholds. When the best human wisdom leaves us in blank despair, it is not high time, yea, past time, for us to turn to God and cast ourselves upon His unfailing mercy?—"Protestant Action", Toronto, 1955.

THE CHRISTIAN AND THE TRUTH.

The Christian is not at liberty to dispute the basic facts of his faith. He must believe that there are certain mighty and righteous acts of God which affect the temporal and eternal interests of men. Without conviction, and acceptance of the truths which are characteristic of our faith, there can be no real religion.

There is Truth: belief that there is truth is not an illusion. Holy Scripture exalts the idea of truth in a fashion which is, we believe, without parallel in other religions.

Jehovah is "a God of truth"—Deut. 32. 4. He is addressed thus in Psalm 31—"O Lord God of truth".

The Redeemer said of Himself "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life"—John 14. 6. He spoke of the coming of "the Spirit of Truth"—John 16. 13. In prayer to the Father He acknowledged "Thy Word is truth"—John 17. 19. St. Paul declared, and had no doubt of "The truth of the Gospel"—Gal. 2. 5, 14.

The truth God has given us is full and final. We have no right to diminish it, or to augment it. The saving truth of the first century cannot be inadequate for the twentieth. God's truth "endureth to all generations"—Ps. 100. "For ever" His Word "is settled in heaven"—Ps. 119. All created visible things may go out of existence, but "my words shall not pass away" said our Lord—Mark 13. 31. * * *

"Every Word of God is pure . . . Add thou not unto His Words"—Proverbs 30. 5 & 6. The same warning had been given earlier—"ye shall not add unto the Word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it"—Deut. 4. The writings of the Old and New Testament subsequent to Deuteronomy do not violate this precept for it is man, who is forbidden to add or diminish. God did not inhibit Himself from communicating more of His will to men.

The matter to be preached (as the message from God to men) is in the Word, and is not to be sought outside it. We have the commands—"Preach the Word" 2 Tim. 4.—"Preach the Gospel" Mark 16. We have the task—"The Word of faith which we preach" Rom. 10. We have the warning—"Woe is me, if I preach not the Gospel" 1 Cor. 9, also—"though we, or an angel from heaven preach any other Gospel . . . let him be accursed" Gal. 1. 8 & 9.

* * *

Having got the truth, it becomes our duty to continue in it—"Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned" 2 Tim. 3.

"Hold fast the form of sound Words" 2 Tim.

1. "Brethren, stand fast, and hold the tradition which ye have been taught" 2 Thess. 2.

Equally, we are warned to avoid errors which lead to apostasy and heresy. Warnings are numerous; and their existence in Scripture is proof of the absolute conviction of truth in the minds of all the inspired writers. One example will suffice—"The time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine . . . they shall turn away from the truth . . . but watch thou in all things . . . make full proof of thy ministry" 2 Tim. 4.

The spirit in which we are to hold the truth is not to be captious, or complacent, or vainglorious. It is to be humble and loving. We are to meet those who are in error in the spirit of peace and brotherliness, "the servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves"—2 Tim. 2.

NOTICE.

"THE LAYMAN"

The object of this journal, published on the 1st of each month, is Linking Christianity with Citizenship.

One of the main features of "The Layman" is the publication of selected talks, broadcast in the Religious Programmes of the B.B.C., both in the journal itself and as separate pamphlets.

The June issue contains the "Lift up your Hearts" talks given in March by BILLY GRAHAM, whilst talks are also included by T. L. Westow and L. B. Greaves. Many more such talks by lay men and women are booked to appear in forthcoming issues.

Articles in "The Layman" are contributed entirely by lay men and women, from varying walks of life, who bring their knowledge and experience to bear on a wide variety of subjects. The reader is constantly being challenged to think constructively for himself about the things that matter. This is one of the greatest needs of our time.

Finally, "The Layman", is inter-denominational, non-sectarian and non-profit making, with no special "axes to grind".

REVIEWS.

"History & Character of Calvinism."*

This is another exceptionally fine contribution to recent historical volumes on the Reformation. It is divided into four parts.

* "The History and Character of Calvinism" by John T. McNeill, eminent Church Historian. Published in New York by The Oxford University Press. 466 pages. From our Book Saloon, 184 Fleet Street, E.C.4. 38/- net. Postage 1/1.

Part 1 covers ground not so frequently traversed, as it sets out the background of the Swiss Reformation and the notable part played by Zwingli.

Part 2 sets forth the life of Calvin and the Reformers in Geneva.

Part 3 reviews the spread of Reformed Protestantism in Europe and early America. Whilst

Part 4 is entitled "Calvinism and Modern Issues."

The picture of Geneva as a spiritual commonwealth is related in well balanced detail. John Knox said:—

"It is the most perfect school of Christ that ever was in the earth since the days of the Apostles. In other places I confess Christ to be truly preached; but manners and religion to be so sincerely reformed, I have not yet seen in any other place."

Was Calvin a Dictator?

To the question whether Calvin was a dictator our author supplies a clear answer. He was certainly not a Hitler, Mussolini or Stalin. Calvin used lawful means, went unarmed and unguarded, lived modestly and without display, sought advice from many, claimed no authority save as a commissioned minister of the Word, assumed no title or distinction or political office. There were undoubtedly stringent laws, yet these related to outrageous sinners, but as a medieval City it is shown how fully necessary they were.

Notwithstanding the repressive discipline, the positive and constructive elements of Calvin's system became more and more effective. The people of Geneva listened to preaching several times weekly. A new generation was arising, trained in Calvin's Sunday School, instructed by his sermons, they were able to recite his catechism, to sing the Psalter, and to read the Bible with understanding. Possibly no community has ever existed so well indoctrinated and broken to discipline. Praise in worship received full attention to which Clement Marot contributed not a little. Bourgeois was received to citizenship. The Old Hundredth (1551) first sung to a text by Beza is unsurpassed as a musical treasure of the Reformation. Education naturally had splendid provision made, and it was right back in those days that a school for all the children was established. So it may be said that Geneva was at once a Church, school, and a fortress. It was the first stronghold of liberty in modern times.

His Impact on Europe.

Calvin's impact upon Europe is vast. He wrote numerous letters to kings and queens and other rulers, urging reform measures in their domains. His theological battles on the Eucharist, predestination and other issues had reverberations over all Europe.

Chapter 13 gives an adequate review of Calvin as writer and theologian, and this is followed by a chapter on his personality and historical importance. He spoke with a sense of authority on the course of the Reformation, believing it to be instituted of God, he was confident that it could not fail. The Institutes became for three centuries the essential textbook of theology in the Reformed Churches.

The third part supplies a study on broad lines showing Calvin's system of doctrine and polity has shaped more minds and entered into more nations than that of any other Reformer.

Of the Reformation period in France, it would be easy to turn this history into a "book of martyrs", for a mounting toll of burnings for what was usually called "Lutheranism" marks the late years of Francis and the reign of his son Henry. Amidst the abominable cruelties which were practiced by the new inquisitorial court, the tongues of victims were cut out to silence them at the stake. Yet their silent testimony proved even more than vocal.

The horror of the St. Bartholomew Massacre is graphically told. On the Eve of St. Bartholomew's Day, 24th August, 1572, the savage butchery began, in which in Paris and other centres of Protestantism, about 70,000 Huguenots were put to the sword. Whether the Romish contention that politics were a contributory cause, the language of Pope Clement VIII makes plain the true spirit of the papacy for the edict declared that if liberty of conscience is granted to everyone, it is the worst thing in the world. Our author has this verdict to pronounce:—"The tragedy of the Huguenots was the tragedy of France. The nation lost their service and their moral strength. The triumph of their enemies was the triumph not of faith but of intolerant power."

Passing Across Europe.

From France we pass to the Netherlands where Calvinism by common consent was a powerful formative influence in the National existence and has continued to be a distinctive factor in the life of the Dutch Nation.

Calvinism in Germany did not have such a free field, for Lutheranism was firmly in the saddle, and some twenty pages suffice to cover its history.

It is a very different story in Scotland, where the figures of Patrick Hamilton, George Wishart, and John Knox, stood out as veritable heroes of the faith. The state of Ecclesiasticism was deplorable in the extreme, and the indictment does not rest upon the satires of William Dunbar (d. 1520), a friar turned court poet, or of Sir David Lindsay (d. 1555), and it is plain that these writers did not exaggerate the "profane lewdness" and "crass ignorance" charged against the clergy in a national synod (1549).

Patrick Hamilton was tried and burned under Beaton's eyes, 27th February, 1528, affirming in the slow fire with heroic constancy his scriptural faith. He was only twenty-four years of age. But the reek (smoke) of Patrick Hamilton infected all that it blew upon. This martyrdom was a prelude to the mighty influence of John Knox, whose voice could put life into them more than 500 trumpets, but there were many who formed a chorus round Knox led notably by the six Johns.

In England there was a stubborn contest between Presbyterians and Episcopalians, particularly in the reign of Elizabeth, but the Queen was anti Presbyterian.

American Modernism.

In America the Calvinistic position as it developed is sketched in great detail, and it has become so tinged with modernism that the Calvinism of Dort and Westminster was being discarded or altered almost beyond recognition.

The title and character of this volume has to be interpreted in a very wide sense, for in the last section of the book we move away from history to watch the spirit of Calvinism in the world to-day. From the original fundamentalism it is seen that Calvinists maintain their faith in the sovereign of God with a feeling for the cause of human liberty and public justice, and a strong preference for representative and responsible government, and the author asks the pertinent question, "What would Calvin say if he could see Geneva now, or Knox if he could revisit the Scottish cities?"

Karl Barth is discussed, but what Barthianism may ultimately mean for Calvinism is not easy to guess. It is, however, helping to bring Calvin's half-forgotten teachings to close attention in theological education and in the ecumenical exchange of thought.

The author confesses that we ought to speak guardedly of the revival of Calvinism. The Calvinism that is being revived is nowhere a replica of Calvin's time or of any other generation.

The Scottish Character.

Finally we are called to consider the influence of the Reformation on Scottish character producing an unusually happy people as well as intelligent industry, the honest doing of daily work, with a sense that it must be done well—through the week, and at the end of it the "Cotter's Saturday Night"—the homely family gathering reverently and peacefully together and irradiated by a sacred presence. This was, of course, Froude's description of the Scots, but one fears not too universal to-day. Calvinists are conscious that God commands His will and deed as well as His thought and prayer. They have been troublers of Israel, assailants of the evils countenanced by the majority. We might almost say that this has been their trade and that when we find them acquiescent in a bad society they have given up working. Calvinism has a message, if it could be heard in our time, not only for the distressed, but also for the prosperous. It reminds every man who will hearken to reflect that always, in good or evil circumstances, he has to do with God.

The Protestant Truth Society, 184 Fleet Street, London, E.C.4., has re-issued Father Chiniquy's booklet "The Gift of God".

Personal testimony carries much weight in Evangelism, and this publication will be found of real value amongst Roman Catholics in particular, and in individual witness for Christ in general. Father Chiniquy's conversion after fifty years in the Church of Rome was remarkable and many turned with him to Salvation by personal faith in Christ.

The booklet is priced 2d. It is attractively printed, and likely to prove valuable indeed.

"The Exaltation of the Blessed Virgin Mary" by the Rev. S. G. Poyntz, B.D. A.P.C.K., 37 Dawson St., Dublin. 35 pp. 1/3 net.

This tract has a foreword by the Archbishop of Dublin which emphasises the necessity for correct information in historical matters, and commends Mr. Poyntz's useful study as a means of "strengthening the faith of many in the sufficiency of the teaching of the Church of Ireland".

We welcome it as a sign that one of the younger clergymen of our Church recognises that the differences between us and Roman Catholicism are not slight. We say this, not because we rejoice in controversy or mere anti-Romanism, but because candour requires that we should not conceal from ourselves or others the dogmatic gulf between ourselves and Rome. Our archbishops and bishops, on the occasion of the publication of the doctrine of the Assumption in 1950, declared plainly that we must repudiate the new dogma on Christian grounds. Scripture, tradition, reason, are against it, and Anglicans hold fast to these principles in the pursuit of truth.

Mr. Poyntz in his survey of the growth of Marian dogma follows good examples, and has assembled much valuable information. We hope his booklet will be read in every household, especially by the younger members. It is sound in its affirmations, and in its criticisms, and he has gone to reliable sources for guidance especially to a publication of the Archbishop of Armagh (The Primitive Faith and Roman Catholic Development, Most Revd. J. A. F. Gregg, D.D.). We bespeak for this publication a ready sale, and hope that it may be followed by others.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE RISE OF CHRISTIANITY ACCORDING TO GIBBON.

It was said long ago that the only great work on church history written by an Englishman is Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire". It was one of the works prescribed by Bishop Lightfoot for the Lightfoot Scholarship at Cambridge and had as one of its companions Milman's "Latin Christianity". The choice of these books suggests that Lightfoot believed that the history of the Church is best studied from the standpoint of the historian rather than from the standpoint of the theologian. This approach, which has the approval of Foakes-Jackson, is likely to secure a more dispassionate and scientific outlook; though we may recognise that the sceptical historian is as capable of oblique vision as the man of faith. We cannot therefore take for granted Gibbon's impartiality and must make due allowance for his 18th century Deism, while reading with profit his entertaining and instructive pages.

Dr. J. B. Bury says that while "Gibbon had not the advantage of the minute critical labours which in the following century were expended on his sources of information, his masterly exposure of the conventional history of the early Church remains in many of its most important points perfectly valid to-day." Of course we recognise that Gibbon's literary gifts rather than interest in the details of the dreary Byzantine centuries keep his work alive; though it must be admitted that the Eastern Empire is nowadays treated with more respect by historians than it used to be, a change of attitude partly due to the studies of Freeman.

We are constantly reminded of Gibbon's irony; and it is interesting to note that this was an acquired habit, carefully cultivated in imitation of Pascal whose "Provincial Letters" the historian tells us he read every year. From Pascal, he says, "I learned to manage the weapons of grave and temperate irony, even on subjects of ecclesiastical solemnity."

* * *

Gibbon's first volume appeared in 1776. It placed him in the front rank of historical writers, and everyone applauded him. But when volume II appeared in 1781 chapters 15 and 16, which treat of the rise of Christianity evoked a storm of indignation.

Gibbon begins by stating that "while the Roman Empire was invaded by open violence or undermined by slow decay, a pure and humble religion gently insinuated itself into the minds of men, grew up in silence and obscurity, derived new vigour from opposition, and finally erected the triumphant banner of the Cross on the ruins of the Capitol." But there are difficulties in explaining this, first, "the scanty and suspicious materials of ecclesiastical history, and secondly, the imperfections of teachers and believers in the gospel."

"The theologian may indulge the pleasing task of describing religion as she descended from heaven arrayed in her native purity. A more melancholy duty is imposed on the historian. He must discover the inevitable mixture of error and corruption which she contracted in a long residence upon earth among a weak and degenerate race of beings." Perhaps the only churchman who has taken these words of Gibbon as his text is the pious and excellent evangelical Milner whose "Church History" is a sustained effort to separate the pure gospel wheat from the tares of worldliness and popish perversities. Many Church writers have sneered at Milner's work, but it is surely legitimate to assess the worth of the professing Church in each age by the standard the Church itself has accepted, i.e. the New Testament

Recognising the fact of the spread of Christianity, Gibbon sets out to suggest explanations. He propounds the orthodox answer that "it was owing to the convincing evidence of the doctrine itself, and to the ruling providence of its great Author". Then with becoming submission he asks "not what were the first but what were the secondary causes of the rapid growth of the Christian Church?" These secondary causes seem to have been all that Gibbon needed to account for the phenomenon of Christianity; and they do away with the necessity for postulating a revelation from God as to His will and purpose.

* * *

The causes given by our author are five :—

I The zeal of the Christians, derived from the Jewish religion but purified from the narrow and unsocial spirit which, instead of inviting, had deterred the Gentiles from embracing the law of Moses.

II The doctrine of a future life, improved by every additional circumstance which could give weight and efficacy to that important truth.

III The miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive Church.

IV The pure and austere morals of the Christians.

V The union and discipline of the Christian republic which gradually formed an independent and increasing state in the heart of the Roman Empire.

* * *

In his account of the Jewish or Old Testament faith under Cause I, Gibbon appears to be quite unconscious of the truly Catholic spirit of the great prophets, as he is unconscious of the beauty of the Psalms, and of the lofty social science of the Law. He is, however, right in his realisation that Christianity offered itself to the world "armed with the strength of the Mosaic Law and delivered from the weight of its fetters". He gives an interesting and learned account of the rise and disappearance of the Jewish-Christian Church; and under the guise of describing what he calls "the vain science of the Gnostics" gives a picture of Old Testament religion in which the sneers are palpable and the distortions deliberate.

It is also worth mentioning that he perceives the latitude of doctrine and practice in the first Christian century; and how, as time advanced, there was a narrowing and hardening of dogma, or, better, more precise and exclusive definition.

* * *

In its attitude to paganism Christianity was inflexible; but if paganism meant as much to the pagans as Gibbon seemed to think, it is difficult to understand why it gave way at all, or why Christians by retreating from a pagan society should have conquered it!

Probably few more gracious pictures of paganism have been drawn than those in this section of Gibbon's work. But the reality (as St. Paul in Rom. ch. 1 shows), was sadly different for the majority.

Cause II is a discussion of the doctrine of a future life. Gibbon suggests that pagan writers who believed in immortality did so from a certain vanity. They could not conceive that beings like themselves, for whose dignity they entertained the most sincere admiration, could be limited to a brief duration of existence. They conceived of the human soul as a pure substance incapable of dissolution, so "from these specious and noble principles the philosophers who trod in the footsteps of Plato deduced a very unjustifiable conclusion, since they asserted not only the future immortality, but the past eternity of the human soul, which they were too apt to consider as a portion of the infinite and self-existing spirit which pervades and sustains the universe"

"Since, therefore, the most sublime efforts of philosophy can extend no farther than feebly to point out at most the probability of a future state there is nothing except a divine revelation that can ascertain the existence of the invisible country which is destined to receive the souls of men."

Gibbon perceives the insufficiency of the Old Testament as a guide in this matter. He speaks of the opinion of the Pharisees, "formed under the influence of eastern religions", but says that their zeal added nothing to the evidence, so that it was still necessary that the doctrine of immortality "dictated by nature approved by reason, and received by superstition, should obtain the sanction of divine truth by the authority and example of Christ."

This very naturally brings up the question of miracles. About them he is sceptical though, he considers the question with delicacy and circumspection. He says "since every friend of revelation is persuaded of the reality and every reasonable man is convinced of the cessation of miraculous powers, it is evident that there must have been some period in which they were either suddenly or gradually withdrawn from the Christian Church." I wonder what Gibbon thought of miracles in his Roman Catholic days, or what he would make of the claims of present-day miracle workers who assert that they have the "charismata": perhaps he would give the same answer as the illustrious Mommsen who when asked about the miracle of miracles, the Resurrection, replied that he must wait till we recovered the lost ending of the gospel of St. Mark! In other words suspend our judgment permanently.

In Gibbon's day the defenders of orthodoxy used miracles as evidences of the Christian revelation, and this gave Gibbon opportunity for one of his most scintillating flights. Assuming that the gospel miracles took place as recorded, he asks "How shall we excuse the supine inattention of the pagan and philosophic world to those evidences which were presented by the hand of omnipotence, not to their reason, but to their senses? The lame walked, the blind saw, the dead were raised, and the laws of nature were frequently suspended for the benefit of the Church. But the Sages of Greece and Rome turned aside from the awful spectacle, and pursuing the ordinary occupations of life and study, appeared unconscious of any alterations in the moral and physical government of the world. Under the reign of Tiberius the whole earth, or at least, a celebrated province of the Roman Empire was involved in a præternatural darkness of three hours. This event passed without notice in an age of science and history. It happened during the lifetime of Seneca and the elder Pliny. Each of these philosophers has recorded all the great phenomena of nature. Both the one and the other have omitted to mention the greatest phenomenon to which the mortal eye has been witness since the creation of the globe."

This passage is a very good example of Gibbon's way of building up an exaggerated picture, so as to heighten the improbability of the event, and thus to cast doubt upon the fact in which it is the merest incident. Why should it be expected that the pagan world would concern itself with the details of the origin and progress of the Christian faith? There are religious movements in Ireland with international associations of which we are in deep ignorance. Why expect that attention should be paid to what was for long enough an underground movement among the depressed classes of the Empire?

The darkness at the Crucifixion need have been no more than a local one. Seneca and Pliny were not in Judæa and were not as encyclopædic as Gibbon suggests. Much ancient literature has perished and what survives says little of our faith though it existed in the time of many surviving writers.

On the other hand, Gibbon's irony may be dulled if we accept the following—a Byzantine Chronicler, George Syncellus quotes Julius Africanus to the effect that one Thallus "in the third book of his history calls the darkness an eclipse of the sun". This at third hand, is not, of course, conclusive, yet it cannot be ignored.

Cause III the miraculous powers assigned to the early Church need not detain us as we have touched upon them, except to say that many things, both pagan and Christian bore the appearance of miracles in an age of defective understanding of the powers of nature. But we also know that the assumption of the uniformity of nature is doubtful, and that the idea of natural law can be used to conceal ignorance of many unexplored higher aspects of nature. Also, the need for miraculous powers was not in fact a feature of the Gospel.

Cause IV is "the pure and austere morals of the Christians". Gibbon rightly saw that character and personality always count, and that nobility and spirituality are infectious. Gospel ethics broadly speaking do ensure "the greatest good of the greatest number", though the Utilitarian principle is not itself a Christian one. It cannot be supposed however, that "Puritan" ethics dominated the Christian community, otherwise the Novatianist Church cannot be accounted for. It is probable that Gibbon depended on the theory of Montanism too much, and saw early Christian life as reflected in ascetics like Tertullian rather than in the third century bishop Paul of Samosata who is said to have anticipated Socinus in his doctrine, and Pope Alexander VI in his life.

Of course there was a general elevation of life under gospel influences, and a refinement of morals, and a graciousness of Christian service attractive to the better elements of paganism. The gospel was then, as now, the power of God unto Salvation; but Gibbon as an historian declined to discuss "the power of God".

Cause V was "the unity and discipline of the Christian republic". Probably in a general sense this is true, but it can be exaggerated, for constant divisions took place long before the Peace of the Church. Gnostic movements, Montanism, Novatianism, Manicheism, and other disruptive influences existed, in violation of unity and discipline. But it is true that all these, while conflicting, possessed a common urgency and zeal to spread the faith. For each of them Christ is the Redeemer, the Resurrection and the Life, and the discipline, though it was not that of the army, was the higher discipline of persons sworn and baptised to be Christ's faithful soldiers and servants.

In his "History of Western Philosophy" Dr. Bertrand Russell faces the same necessity as Gibbon—the necessity of accounting for the influence of the gospel as a factor in the development of human life. He states the five causes of the growth of Christianity and says "Broadly speaking Gibbon's analysis may be accepted."

On the first cause he comments "we have seen in our own day the advantages of intolerance in propaganda. Christians believed that they alone would go to heaven. Other religions had not that character." Russell ignored Clement of Alexandria!

On the belief in immortality he reminds us that the popular Greek religion Orphism, which taught immortality, influenced Jews and Christians as well as pagans—"I think", he says, "that the doctrine of immortality must have had less to do with the spread of Christianity than Gibbon thought. Elements of the mystery religions entered into Christianity, and the belief in a Dying and Rising God was common."

Miracles play a large part in Christianity, but miracles were very common in antiquity. It is not easy to see why in this competition the Christian miracles came to be more widely believed than those of other sects. He believes that Gibbon omitted a very important matter, the possession of a Sacred Book in which there was a consistent history of miracles from Creation onward. It was natural to accept the O.T. miracles and they supported the Christian ones.

On the moral influence of Christianity, Russell properly points out that prominent ecclesiastics continued to be men of inflexible moral principles. The effect of character is again incalculable.

On the political side Russell regards Gibbon's fifth cause as most important—the Emperor Constantine saw the value of Christianity as an organised bloc, and possibly a large part of the army was Christian and so influenced Constantine.

Russell then is not prepared to suggest any deeper reasons than Gibbon for the success of the faith down to the Peace of the Church in the early years of the fourth century.

Chapter 16 of the History deals with the conduct of the Roman Government towards Christians. It is Gibbon's account of the persecutions and martyrdoms. He suggests that pagans on conversion "dissolved the sacred ties of custom and education, violated the religious institutions of their country, and presumptuously despised whatever their fathers had believed as true or revered as sacred." When reproved they displayed "an inflexible obstinacy deserving of punishment", and resisted every effort made to coax them to deny the faith. It may be that the evidence of ancient Christian writers on the persecutions is sometimes exaggerated and that the vivid anticipation of heavenly joys encouraged some to seek the martyr's crown, but we shall be unworthy of the cloud of witnesses and of our inheritance with the saints in light if we fail to honour the profound integrity of the martyrs who endured "as seeing Him who is invisible".

Yet the student of history may agree with Gibbon that "Christians in the course of their intestine dissensions have inflicted greater severity on each other than they had experienced from the zeal of infidels". That is the tragedy of a Christianity whose kingdom, unlike that of its Founder, is of this world. In contrast, the pagans let much time pass before they took notice of Christians, when they did take notice, they proceeded temperately and cautiously. In general they tended to try persuasion rather than violence, and in the long intervals between the periods of persecution the Church grew numerous and rich. Nothing in the ancient world exceeded the Spanish Fury in the Netherlands, or the Thirty Years' War in Germany. The "Crusades" in Provence and the Dragonnades under Louis XIV in France are further instances.

We cannot follow Gibbon into the history of the conversion of the Northern invaders of the Empire, but may note the characteristic irony when he comments on the victory of the gospel over Paganism "then came the triumph of Christianity and Barbarism". The great historian stuck to his last to the end, and lived and wrote as though Christianity were but an idle form; yet while he penned his pages in Lausanne, Whitfield and the Wesleys and many others were renewing the spiritual life of his country. I may be mistaken, and I may read more into the matter than I ought, but there is a little group of Gibbon letters written to Dr. Priestley in which he severely reprimands Priestley for some of his views on Christianity. Possibly in his later years Gibbon came to understand the Christian faith better, and to think more of that first cause of the spread of the gospel than of the five secondary ones.

A fair criticism of Gibbon's explanation of the rise of Christianity is that he does not seek to account for the original impetus, and does not say why some Gentiles should have taken up and increased the zeal of the Jews; nor why they should have been sure that "as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive". Still less does he attempt to account for the choice by Christians of an arduous moral conflict. We know that the Stoic philosophy won adherents, but it may be reasonably supposed that the reasons for being a Stoic were not identical with the reasons for choosing the narrow self-denying path of Christian virtue. The personality of Jesus is a subject which he wisely refrained from discussing. Newman properly asked "what power had a code of virtue, as calm and enlightened as that of Antoninus to generate a zeal as fierce as that of Maccabæus?" He suggests that unless Gibbon could account for the coincidence of the five causes he had better have left the problem unanswered.

In conclusion, we shall not be far astray if we agree with Dr. Alfred Plummer that we can best account for the rise and progress of our faith by saying that it had, 1st., "incomparable sublimity of doctrine", 2ndly., "inexhaustible adaptability to ages, races, classes, individuals", and 3rdly., "an origin recognisable as divine".

submitted his conclusions, which fully supported the Church of Christ's stand.

Assuming they had won their case the Protestant missionaries put the sign in its old place. Shortly afterwards Rev. Cline R. Paden of Brownfield, Tex., who holds the lease to the Church of Christ building, was summoned to police district headquarters and ordered to take the sign off. He argued for two hours with the officials and produced a copy of the prosecutor's conclusions. Nevertheless, he was given an ultimatum to have the sign removed by 2 p.m. Saturday.

At that hour the police district commissioner and 15 policemen appeared and broke the metal letters composing the denomination's name off the wall. An Associated Press photographer was warned his camera would be seized if he attempted to take pictures.

Mr. Paden said later: "We shall of course go to court again, although we are concerned about the great expenses to which we are put by all these legal actions."

A government spokesman said the police were fully justified because the court had handed down no ruling yet authorizing the sign.

Mr. Paden said he had been told that objections to the sign had been made to the police by priests of the Roman Catholic Church of Cristo Re—Christ the King—which is near the Church of Christ.

"The trouble is," said Mr. Paden to-day, "the judiciary has ruled in our favour, but the police refuse to accept the decision."

He said the police had assumed the attitude that the sign was not a religious sign, but the same as any commercial sign.—"The Sentinel."

Roman Church in France.

Very important reports from opposing sources agree that the religious situation of the Roman Catholic Church in France is precarious.

"The Tablet", official organ of the Roman Church in England, and the "Manchester Guardian" world-famed organ of political liberalism, have both carried surveys of the state of the church in France. As is to be expected the Romanists themselves try to place the figures in the best possible light. Nevertheless they are forced to admit that there are at least twenty per cent. of un-baptised people in France—six million out of thirty. Of the remaining twenty-four million who have been baptised "The Tablet" confesses that only seventeen per cent.—about four million—go to Mass at least once a month. Another four million go "more than once a year". About three million go on Easter only. "The Tablet boasts that these figures mean that over forty per cent. of the population of France take their Roman Catholic religion seriously. The question rises, of course, that if this is serious religion, what would non-serious religion be?

"The Tablet also boasts that 85 per cent. of the twenty-four million classify themselves as Catholics without reservation. Yet, in another part of the article they confess that 48 per cent. of the baptised considered that one can be a good Romanist without practising one's religion at all. "A further 29 per cent. said that irregular practice did not mean that one was not a good Catholic." Almost 50 per cent. of the baptised said that they could not practice because on some matters they could not agree with the dogmas of the church. Twenty-six per cent. agreed that "the church is for the rich."

"The Tablet's" survey also shows that only 8 per cent. of the men and 17 per cent. of the women admit to having a spiritual director (a father confessor). Only half the baptised people of France know a priest personally.

"The Tablet" also confesses that a large majority of the baptised people say they would send their children to parochial schools. Finally, these figures are all the more astounding when they are broken down regionally. The vast preponderance of Romanists in Brittany (91%) reduces the proportion in the rest of France considerably.—"Protestant Action."

Romanism and Illiteracy.

The republic of Colombia provides an example of the length to which the Church of Rome is prepared to go, even in this mid-twentieth century, in order to defeat if it can the advance of Protestantism. It is estimated that 44 per cent. of Colombia's adult population is illiterate. Yet Colombian officials, under pressure from the Roman Catholic Church, have carried on a six-year campaign in which more than 160 Protestant schools have been put out of operation completely. Schools in the mission territories were closed because of the 1953 Concordat with the Vatican, which gives the Roman Catholic Church complete control of education in those areas. Other Protestant schools, outside these mission territories, have been closed down through the simple expedient of biased enforcement of various educational regulations. Even when the most stringent rules have been met, the schools have been refused permission to reopen. Protestant attendance at public schools in Colombia presents an even greater problem, since the Roman Catholic Church dominates public education. All children attending public schools are forced to receive instruction in the doctrines and dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church. Evangelical faith is often ridiculed and misrepresented. All pupils are required to attend Mass as a group on Sundays and holidays. In some cases Protestant students were excused from attendance at Mass, but later pressure was brought to bear and the children were exposed to punishment for not attending Mass.

Peter's Bones.

In his Christmas broadcast in 1950 the present Pope startled the listening world by a statement that the grave of St. Peter, "the Prince of the Apostles" had been found as a result of excavations at Vatican Hill, in Rome. In the June issue of "The Churchman", Professor R. K. Harrison, of the University of Western Ontario, discusses the question in the light of historical records and the latest reports of archaeologists. The Pope's announcement was immediately qualified by the admission that certain bones recovered could not be identified beyond doubt as those of the Apostle, and nothing has come to light since to identify the grave as that of Peter. Dr. Harrison's conclusion is that on the factual evidence the problem seems to be no nearer a solution than it was before the excavations commenced. "We are still unable to identify the burial place of Peter, and we are in ignorance as to its precise location. The larger question as to whether or not Peter resided in Rome for a time is also left unanswered, and the Roman claim is no nearer unquestionable demonstration than it was before archaeological excavations began." The world still does not know where the Apostle was buried, or whether he ever lived in Rome. There is certainly not a shred of proof that he was Bishop of Rome for twenty-five years, and the first Pope.

Hungary—Progress of the Church.

Recently Bishop Imre Varga, of the Christian Reformed Church in Slovakia, visited Hungary. There he met leading figures in the Calvinist and the Lutheran churches. At the District Convention in Budapest, Bishop Varga, said, in part:—

"The past decade has brought huge changes not only in political and social life, but also in the internal life of Protestant churches, both in Hungary and in Czechoslovakia. After many long years the Lord has faced the Reformed Church in Slovakia with the living Word in judgment and mercy: 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself'. In practice this denial of oneself meant for us everything which we had been carrying, such as the heavy burden of the past world wars the border territories of the Czechoslovak Republic were a constant focal point of national hatred and political uncertainty. The Lord of the Church charged us to settle accounts with the past which will never return and, in humble faith, to set forth on a new path. On this path we have settled quarrels between Hungarians and Slovaks in the Reformed Church. We have returned to the old and good path which our forefathers followed for more than three centuries after the Reformation."

On this occasion Bishop I. Varga thanked Bishop A. Bereczky and all Hungarian Protestants for aid which had been proffered others in the years after liberation, through their exemplary and courageous pointing out of new paths: "This testifies to the fact that it is not we who are building the Church, but the Lord of the Church Who, with His Word and Holy Spirit, leads His people from the creation of the world to its end."—From "The Christian Irishman", July, '55.

French Worker Priests.

The French worker-priests have now published a book of documentation and discussion ("Les Prêtres Ouvriers", Editions de Minuit) which carries this significant word in its introduction:

"This book . . . is limited to bringing together the first elements of information in view of a true dialogue which it has not yet succeeded in having either with the Hierarchy or with public opinion. It is not intended as a manifesto but as an instrument of a frank and patient discussion . . ."

This is a new note for Roman Catholic priests to strike. It is not usual for men under orders to suggest, as gently or as firmly as these apostles do, the necessity of discussion, adding that hitherto it has not been possible. Perhaps when they wrote these lines they were aware that their superior officers would reply by a terse ultimatum in the spirit of the Inquisitors: "Believe or die!" The hierarchy wrote the worker-priests in these terms:

"Your sufferings is too great for us to hope that we can appease it by presenting you with reasonings. It is to your spirit of faith that we make appeal. You believe that the pope and the bishops have, through Christ, the right and the duty to intervene whenever they esteem it necessary to do so in order to keep their priests faithful to the requirements of their sacerdotal character . . . Therefore you find yourselves before this alternative: either to trust in your own judgment and refuse obedience to Christ, or to believe in Christ with your whole soul, even if your life should seem to you to be broken, your labouring brothers abandoned . . ."

The sketch of events leading up to the present crisis as given in the worker-priests volume is most revealing as to their attitude of mind and also as to the state of Romanism in France. These rebel priests point out that the Church, turned toward the long past of Christendom is scarcely prepared to understand the prodigious revolution that social conditions have wrought. "All this boiling activity seems to it (The Church) in guilty contradiction with the order established by divine law. On its side the common people became strangers to the Church: she seems to them to be fundamentally bound to the régime which oppresses them, indeed its defender and guarantor in the name of God. Its doctrines, its prescriptions, its liturgy, its undertakings, its clergy, in a word its whole life move in a world that is different from that of the ordinary people. The workers no longer understand the language of the Church.

"In France . . . a solid tradition of hostility to the Church has grown up. There is a great repugnance on the part of Catholics to rally to the republican régime, and the fear of socialism is required to push them toward it. There are some, it is true, who aim at reconciling the Church with the modern spirit, with democracy, with the workers. But whoever these intellectuals may be . . . they meet fierce opposition; they themselves do not escape giving rise to criticism and have been successively disavowed. Other directions carry the day . . . Catholics organized among themselves seek to rally others to their socio-religious position and to 'conquer' them . . . Efforts were made to render the life of parochial communities more living, less routine in their liturgical manifestations. Militant Christians asked to be given a larger hearing in their Church, to carry there a greater share of responsibility just as they do in the nation."—"Protestant Action", Toronto, June, 1955.

D. L. Moody in Dublin in 1874.

(S. W. Murray in "The Christian").

Their mission in Dublin commenced on Sunday, October 18th. An audience estimated at between 10,000 and 15,000 gathered in the large hall at the Exhibition Palace. The services continued on week-nights with attendances of 7,000 to 8,000 such was the eagerness of the people to hear the evangelists.

"I have not come to Ireland", said Moody, "to make people Protestants but Christians." A Roman Catholic author who was often present remarked, "I began to weep as soon as that wonderful man Sankey began to sing." "The Nation", a Roman Catholic journal, said, "the deadly danger of the age comes upon us from the direction of Huxley and Darwin and Tyndall, rather than from Moody and Sankey. Irish Catholics desire to see Protestants deeply imbued with religious feeling rather than tinged with rationalism and infidelity."

In mid-November there was arranged at the Exhibition Hall, Dublin, a "General Convention of ministers of the Gospel in Ireland" covering a period of three days. Even larger numbers were present at the Convention which drew largely from the south of Ireland. The ministry of Moody and Sankey was thus blessed to Christian leaders and Christian workers from widely scattered communities.

During the American evangelists' second extended tour of the British Isles, they came to Dublin on December 31st, 1882, and on the following February 11th commenced their mission in Belfast. They met the workers of the mission in Fisherwick-Place Church at 8 o'clock on the Sunday morning. In the afternoon the service in the Ulster Hall was for women and at 8.30 for men in the same hall. During week-days, Bible readings were held in the afternoons, and at 6.30 in a central church the service was for women and at 8 o'clock in St. Enoch's for men. They could only spend a week in Belfast on this occasion. Other centres in Ireland were also visited.

Mr. Moody's last visit to Ireland was in 1892. On this occasion, the Committee responsible for the Belfast mission secured a large temporary hall seating about 12,000 which had been erected on a site near the Queen's University of Belfast. The hall was designed specially to accommodate the Unionist Convention which met in June of that year to protest against projected Home Rule legislation.

A choir of 500 had been formed to lead the singing and it was conducted by Mr. J. H. Burke in the absence of Mr. Sankey who had to leave for a Christian Endeavour Convention. The Mission commenced on Sunday, August 28th. The opening service was advertised for 8.15 p.m. but the hall was filled to overflowing at 7. The services continued with large attendances in the evenings while Mr. Moody spoke at afternoon Bible readings in St. Enoch's Church.

After two weeks, Mr. Moody had to leave and Rev. John McNeill, then thirty-eight years of age, took his place. Mr. Burke remained on in Belfast to lead the praise and the mission continued for a further two weeks with the building crowded each evening.

Meantime, Mr. Moody continued his journey to the South and the places visited included Armagh, Dundalk and Cork. It would be difficult to assess the influence of his ministry and work in the out-of-the-way places in Ireland, carried out as it was under great physical strain. It was shortly after this that he first learned of the heart trouble which led to his death seven years later.

PASSING EVENTS.

President Peron Attends Revival Meetings in Argentina.

More than six million attended the revival campaign conducted some time ago by Evangelist Tommy Hicks in the capital city of Buenos Aires.

The "Buenos Aires Herald" reported that crowds of 200,000 attended nightly the meetings in the Huracan Stadium. One night it was officially estimated that 400,000 people were present! At least twice during the campaign President Peron sat on the platform and listened intently to the glorious message of salvation from SIN through faith in Jesus Christ. One night he came incognito—without his uniform which he invariably wears when moving in official circles—and at the close of the service came forward, threw his arms around the Evangelist and kissed him on both his cheeks.

Incredible though it may seem, the fact remains that three-and-a-half million people sought Christ for salvation during the 62 nights of special services in Buenos Aires. In one never-to-be forgotten meeting, out of a congregation of 200,000 people, about 190,000 of them dropped on their knees and publicly asked God to save their souls.

The only regrettable feature in the campaign was the amazing sight of the Roman Catholic Church joining hands with the Communists in an attempt to drive Evangelist Hicks out of Argentina. Thanks to President Peron and his government officials, the attempt failed and the Protestant Evangelist was given perfect freedom to preach the old-time Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Note:—The "Dallas Times Herald", "Los Angeles Times", "Christian Century", "Christian Life", as well as the "Buenos Aires Herald", have confirmed the statistical report given above. —"The Christian Irishman", Belfast, June, 1955.

Two Statues of Madonna "Weep."

Rome, Sat. (Kemsley).—Thousands of devout pilgrims are swarming by bus and train and on foot to the Southern Italian town of Caserta to kneel in prayer before two "Weeping Madonnas."

A plaster copy of the famous "Crying Madonna of Syracuse" is reported to have begun weeping last week in a village near Caserta.

Within 24 hours, a similar mass-produced 2s. statue at a house in Caserta is said to have begun dripping tears.

As word of the "double miracle" spread like wildfire through fervent Southern Italy, extra police were drafted to the village to handle the ever-growing crowds.

Local authorities confirmed that liquid was steadily dripping from around the eyes of both statues.

A plaster expert called in by a priest said after examination that the tears were not caused by sweating, but in his opinion were supernatural —(Truth), quoted in "Protestant World", Sydney, April, 1955.

An R.C. Pilgrimage—Thousands Worship on Croagh Patrick.

By a Special Representative.

Yesterday was the 50th anniversary of the opening and the blessing by Archbishop John McHale of the little chapel of St. Patrick on top of the mountain which bears his name. The building is the successor to the old hut where Mass was celebrated for hundreds of years on Garland Sunday. The pilgrimage to Croagh Patrick goes back many centuries before the dawn of Christianity, when the mountain was called Cruachan Aighle (the Eagle's Mount) and when homage was paid there to the chief god, Crom Cruach, Pagan gods were worshipped there as late as the seventh century. About that time the legend of St. Patrick's 40 days fast was given great prominence and so the pagan festival gave way to the Christian one. According to local people the crowds that gathered into the tiny hamlet of Murrisk on Saturday night was the largest for many years. Special trains from all over the country started to arrive at Westport with their packed loads of pilgrims, young and old. The number of young men and women was surprisingly large. Not many children were to be seen which was not surprising, as strong, hardy men from Connemara—people used to hard work both at home and in the coal mines in Wales—were almost exhausted on reaching the summit.

Old Friends Meet.

In Westport many public houses began to fill up shortly after six on Saturday. By nine there was hardly breathing space left in any of them. Old friends were meeting again. Some had met there this time last year, others had not been there for maybe two years. Veteran pilgrims met, and as it got later and 10.30 p.m. approached they started drifting out of the pubs and on to the Murrisk road on foot or else down the street to the bus terminal from where C.I.E. was running an excellent service to the bottom of the reek. All along the road to Murrisk cars drove bumper to bumper through the night from 12 o'clock onwards. There was no break in the traffic. Thousands walked along the side of the road, and many of them especially young girls were barefoot, so that even before they got near the mountain their feet were covered in blood and dirt.

As they walked along on their weary journey they said the Rosary aloud. One could hear thousands saying it at the same time, but, as different groups had started it at different times, it was impossible to distinguish the words, especially since many recited it in Irish.

First Casualty.

The first casualty was from Galway. He had walked all the way from Galway, climbed the mountain, and fell on the way down. His injuries were not very serious, but as he was carried down the reek on a stretcher he became a reminder of danger ahead to experienced pilgrims and a warning to the pilgrim making his first Croagh Patrick journey.

Stalls that sold everything from an orange for 1s. 6d., a glass of water for 6d., a cup of tea for 2s., were erected at the foot of the mountain and also up the path for at least 60 yards. Climbing these 60 yards was difficult. One was told, however, that this was easy, and that really it was not hard to climb until one came to the last 200. This had no encouraging effect on young people there for the first time. Many wondered whether they would have the strength to reach the summit. In between decades of the Rosary they discussed whether they should continue, or would they not get the same spiritual good if they climbed as far as the first station? But someone with a stronger will, or maybe stronger faith, persuaded them all ways to carry on.

On and On.

So they went on and on and on, walking three to four abreast—a long line which at 2 o'clock on Sunday morning stretched from the summit to the bottom, 2,510 feet below—no looking back, no desire to see magnificently beautiful Clew Bay in the half light of early morning, no impulse to watch the bewitching lights of the cars and buses that were still covering the road to Westport, no curiosity to look down below to see how far one had climbed. The goal ahead was all that mattered. The tiny light on top of the reek was the only magnet that attracted the eyes of the tired, footsore travellers. As they got higher the path became stonier. Some people, especially the old, barefooted men constantly slipped and fell. Few of them were seriously injured, but their cries and groans were painful to hear. I said to one old man: "It's a tough journey. It's a long way to the top." "It is only a short way and a pleasant journey compared to eternity, son," was the answer.

Dangerous Plateau.

Those who started off at midnight reached the summit at about 4 o'clock. All of them were weary and worn out but still delighted that the goal had been reached. They started immediately to make the Stations of the Cross which are represented by 14 blackboards around the edges of the little plateau that forms the top of the mountain.

This has its dangers, too; for one may be pushed over the side by the crowd which keeps pushing all the time. One man fell 15 feet from the top, broke his leg, fractured his skull and had to be carried to the bottom and then rushed to the hospital at Castlebar.

Masses started at 3.30 a.m., and went on continuously until 12 noon. Forty priests were in attendance, some of whom had climbed in their bare feet. Among them was a Chinese priest, Father Peter Lu, who is studying at U.C.D., and the Rev. Patrick Cumiskey, from Westport, New Zealand. Two sermons were preached, one in Irish and one in English.

The descent took 2½ hours. When the pilgrims arrived back in Westport their first thought was again of Mass. St. Mary's, the local church was crowded all morning. It was only when this second Mass was over that most people began to see about getting themselves a meal, even though they had not eaten for nearly 12 hours. They then drifted out of Westport in their thousands, their bodies tired, their souls at peace, but many of them will be back again next year to make another arduous declaration for God.

Irish Roman Catholic Bishops on Emigration from Ireland—A Pastoral Letter Read in R.C. Churches July 1955.

You will have read in the Trinity Sunday Pastoral of His Eminence, Cardinal Griffin, as well as in the daily Press, that it has been arranged by the Irish Hierarchy with His Eminence and the Hierarchy of England and Wales that the missions, given by Irish missionaries, to Irish born Catholics in England and Wales be further developed and co-ordinated. In this way members of all the Irish mission-giving Orders will share in the work.

Our warmest thanks are due to His Eminence and the members of the English and Welsh Hierarchy for their immediate and whole-hearted acceptance of the mission scheme. We also heartily thank the Provincials of the Orders for their practical and generous response to our call.

The missions are being organised on a long term basis and it is hoped that they will be continued from year to year. His Eminence, Cardinal Griffin, who has long shown a real and practical interest in the welfare of our people, has suggested that, for this year, they be confined to the Archdioceses of Westminster and Birmingham, in which are found the greatest concentrations of Irish-born Catholics. But they will be later extended to all the dioceses of England and Wales, so that the voice of Catholic Ireland may through Irish missionaries, reach our people wherever they may be.

Next year, 1956, will be the tercentenary of the death of James Usher, Archbishop of Armagh. It is probably not an exaggeration to say that no predecessor of his, no contemporary, and no one since, equalled him in learning. In his lifetime a Roman Catholic scholar called Usher "the most learned of non-Roman Catholics," and he is still venerated as Ireland's chief savant whose reputation was European, and whose accomplishments constrained even Oliver Cromwell to overlook his "malignancy" as a prelate of the Church of England (into whose episcopate he had been translated by King Charles I).

We propose, God willing, in these pages to give a series of papers on Usher's career, and the following is a rough outline of the plan—The first paper will summarise Usher's life; the second will consider his educators and general theological outlook; the third will indicate his work on church antiquities; the fourth will relate to his Biblical studies; and the final one will show something of his labours as a controversial theologian.

(1) USHER'S LIFE.

James Usher was born in the region of High Street, Dublin, near the corner of the present Nicholas Street, across the way from Christ Church Cathedral, in 1581. His family had long lived in Dublin and counted among its members several eminent persons. Some of these were Roman Catholic—his maternal grandfather, James Stanihurst, had been Speaker of the House of Commons in Ireland, but was thought to be at heart Roman Catholic. Stanihurst's brother Richard was a vigorous Roman Catholic theologian, and a cousin of Usher, Henry Fitzsimons, was a learned Jesuit and an early opponent in controversial matters of his young relative.

Religious differences in families in Ireland must have been common in the days of Queen Elizabeth. Sincere convictions existed on both sides. In addition, there were many who were unsettled in their faith, and no doubt many who temporised until they saw which side was likely to prevail. We need have no uncertainty about the genuine convictions of James Usher as a member of the reformed Church of Ireland, or about the genuineness of Henry Fitzsimons either.

Usher's family was prosperous, his father being an official of the Court of Chancery, so the son was sure of the best education available. It was a propitious time for a promising boy because two Scots university men had just come to Dublin to teach in a grammar school founded by the city corporation. They were James Fullerton and James Hamilton. The fact that later on King James VI of Scotland and I of England ennobled Hamilton with the title Viscount Clancuboy and gave him large estates in Co. Down suggests that the two Scots had other purposes in Dublin than teaching Latin grammar to the city lads—they were political agents, it is believed, who worked to secure the support of the Anglo-Irish for the peaceable succession of the Scots king to the throne of England and Ireland.

A dozen years after James Usher was born a charter was granted by Queen Elizabeth for the founding of Trinity College near Dublin. Earlier efforts to establish an Irish university failed, but this succeeded and is proud to count Usher "the great boast of our university" (Dr. Salmon).

Usher entered the college in 1594. One of his uncles, Henry Usher, was at the time Archbishop of Armagh, and had been active in obtaining the college charter, so the nephew began under very favourable auspices. It is plain that his merits, apart from family and civic influences, would ensure a successful career as a student.

Trinity College, Dublin, was intended to be a centre of instruction in arts and divinity so that the Church of Ireland might have an educated Irish-born clergy. It should not be forgotten that this was its primary object and the reason for its endowment. In its early days it had many vicissitudes, and it was never easy to secure the best men for its management. Possibly the first provost who brought right ideas to the task was William Bedell, a graduate of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, who was appointed in 1627. But if the management was careless, the instruction seems to have been sound, and James Usher became an accurate and versatile scholar. He received the master's degree in 1600. As a sample of his courage, confidence, and knowledge, we may refer to the fact that when his Jesuit cousin Henry Fitzsimons, then a prisoner in Dublin, invited discussion on Cardinal Bellarmine's defence of Roman Catholicism, he accepted the invitation (or challenge) and acquitted himself well, though only nineteen year old.

In 1600 Usher was one of the college proctors, and catechetical lecturer. It is interesting to note that the college still has its catechetical lectures for Church of Ireland and Presbyterian students.

The following year, though under canonical age, Usher was admitted to Holy Orders by his uncle the Archbishop of Armagh who had power to suspend the canon laying down the minimum age for receiving Holy Orders. Six years later he was appointed Professor of Divinity. He had had good teachers, men of the Cambridge school of reformed divines, but men with a Puritan inclination. Ireland in that day received several scholars of Presbyterian views on Church government; men of the non-conforming temperament, and Usher was not hostile to their influence though he always was an upholder of episcopacy. It is not generally remembered that Cartwright (who had lived in Ireland) was put forward for appointment as Archbishop of Armagh. To-day he is chiefly thought of as the pioneer of Presbyterianism in England. Travers the first acting provost of the college was a theologian of distinction, but quite opposed to the established order in the Church. We may regard this anomaly in an episcopal church as an abuse due to the confusion of the times, or we may more wisely recognise that there was little in Ireland to attract eminent scholars who were assured of a place and prospects in England. Men of learning whose views were not approved in England might well come here as a venture, and Loftus the Archbishop of Dublin who was of the Puritan school welcomed them.

During the early years Usher was an enthusiastic collector of books and manuscripts. As a student he had the use of such books as the Dublin divines owned, and he probably learned a good deal about collecting a library from Dr. Challoner, the vice-provost whom he accompanied to London to buy books for the College library (he later married Dr. Challoner's daughter). In London he rapidly made friends among the learned, including Dr. Thomas Bodley (founder of the Bodleian Library, Cambridge), and the antiquarian students, Selden, Cotton, and Camden. He had an ever widening circle of literary correspondents scattered over Europe from Dublin to Constantinople. His letters (two volumes in the edition of his works published by Dr. C. Elrington) show us the variety of his interests and the extent of his friendships.

For some years Usher was one of the State preachers in Christ Church Cathedral. Later he became Chancellor of the other Cathedral in Dublin, St. Patrick's. This office gave him the only experience he had of parochial life as it carried with it the position of vicar of the parish of Finglas then a few miles north of Dublin, but transformed recently into a populous suburb with a substantial Church of Ireland population.

In 1613 he published his first printed work, an historical explanation of the church situation in Western Europe. This was meant to be a sequel to the well-known "Apology for the Church of England" by J. Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury. He carried on the story of church development from the sixth to the thirteenth century, but did not bring it down to the Reformation.

Two years afterwards the clergy of Ireland met in Synod and adopted as a confession of faith a series of Articles of Religion of a more thorough and detailed "Calvinistic" character than the Thirty-nine Articles then in use in England. These Irish articles incorporated the series known as "the Lambeth Articles," and it has always been accepted that Usher was the man responsible for this. He was of course the chief theologian in Ireland, and the views of the Professor of Divinity in Trinity College were received with great respect (as the views of his successors are to-day).

But by this time King James I was not as Calvinistic as he had been, and when he heard of the proceedings of the Irish Synod, and of Usher's part therein, he was concerned, perhaps at some derogation of his royal prerogative, or perhaps at failure to consult him as a distinguished, if amateur theologian. However, Usher, equipped with testimonials to his orthodoxy, was summoned to an interview with the King and made a favourable impression.

The result was that he was nominated to the bishopric of Meath, the premier bishopric in Ireland. He was consecrated bishop in 1621. The chief memorial of his episcopate in Meath is the report on the state of the diocese called for by a royal commission on the church in 1622. This report (app. 5 in Elrington's Life of Usher) gives a rather depressing picture of the religious condition of the diocese and of the inadequacy of its clerical staff. Usher did not remain long enough in Meath to accomplish much, for he was advanced to the archbishopric of Armagh in 1625, but even if he had been much longer in Meath it was doubtful if his settled habits as a student would have permitted him to be a diocesan reformer. We do not receive the impression that he had the qualities requisite in that day to enable a bishop to fulfil his duties. When compared with his friend William Bedell who was transferred from the provostship of the College to the bishopric of Kilmore in 1629 he seems to be ineffective. But we must remember the general state of the country, and the fewness of clergymen of education who could preach in Irish, and the pillaging of church property by laymen. The difficulties were serious indeed.

About the time of his consecration Usher published his "Discourse of the Religion Anciently Professed by the Irish and British." This soon became famous and led to his being sent for by the King to continue this work. He therefore spent more time in England, and in 1639 published "The Antiquities of the British Churches."

It will always be a cause for regret that Usher did not agree with his friend Bedell who sought to teach the faith of the Church of Ireland to his Irish-speaking flock by means of the Scriptures and prayer book translated into Irish. Usher who soundly condemned Rome for discouraging vernacular Scriptures was singularly inconsistent in this. The explanation (neither an excuse nor a justification) is that he thought the use of the Irish language retarded the Anglicisation of Ireland. It is to be remembered of course that Usher belonged to the small professional and commercial class in the very English town of Dublin, and was closely associated with the government of the country. Bedell was instrumental in providing an Irish translation of the Old Testament, which, with O'Donnell's translation of the New Testament already available, completed the first Irish version of the entire Bible. It was not printed until some fifty years after Bedell's death in 1642.

The year 1634 is a memorable one in Church of Ireland annals, for in it the Convocation of the Church was prevailed on to adopt the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England. It was thought by some that the Irish Articles of 1615 continued in authority and that the others were additional, but in fact the Irish Articles were quietly laid aside though Usher regretted the change as they were largely of his own creation. One independent position was maintained by this Convocation. It refused to accept the canons of the Church of England, and enacted a series of its own which remained in force for centuries. The pressure to adopt the English canons and articles came from the Lord Deputy, the Earl of Strafford, advised by Archbishop Laud. Both were, according to their lights, sincere friends of the Church of Ireland.

In 1640 Usher went to England, chiefly to pursue his scholarly interests. The Irish rebellion of 1641 broke out, and made it impossible to return. His books were fortunately kept safe, and eventually reached him. As his revenues could no longer be received, King Charles I appointed him to the vacant bishopric of Carlisle. He never went to Carlisle, but discharged his episcopal duties by commission. The state of the border probably made it very difficult for episcopal administrations during the Civil War.

In 1643 the Westminster Assembly of Divines met under parliamentary sanction to remodel church matters in England. It was obvious that the Episcopal order and the Liturgy of the Church of England would be swept away, and Usher declined to take part in the Assembly. This so angered the House of Commons that it was about to order the confiscation of Usher's library in revenge, but the intervention of his friend Selden averted this unworthy action. The archbishop retired to Wales. He returned to London when elected Preacher of Lincoln's Inn. Soon after he visited King Charles I in the Isle of Wight and assisted him in the abortive discussions with the Parliament on the issue of episcopacy. He received flattering invitations to settle in Holland, and courteous letters and a decoration from Cardinal Richelieu, but preferred to stay in England. During his last years there he published a scheme of Bible Chronology, and a book on the Greek Old Testament.

He died in 1656, firm in the faith of the Church of Ireland, Catholic, Apostolic, Reformed and Protestant.

WHY THE BIBLE?

It is possible to attempt an answer to this question by studying the religious consciousness of the Semitic races. It is also possible to construct an answer by a comparative study of the religious literature of the ancient peoples of the East. We talk to-day of "Buddhist Scriptures," of "Hindu Scriptures," of "Islamic Scriptures" as if the phrase "Hebrew Scriptures" referred to some writings of similar character and value. By comparing them it is hoped to reach an understanding and an explanation of the Bible.

But no Christian can be content to accept the Bible as the literary record of man's religious consciousness, or as the expression in Hebrew and Greek modes of thought of ideas and hopes which are equally expressed in Sanscrit or Hindi or Pali or Arabic. The Bible is not, for the Christian, what man has thought out about the great issues of life and death: it includes that of course, but it is what God has made known to man. So we speak of "Revelation"—what God has given as truth "for our admonition." Revelation claims for the Bible a divine source of knowledge, not only a human. It calls for a rich and comprehensive doctrine of inspiration; for holy men, the writers spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.

The Bible justifies its origin as inspired and revealed because it treats of historic facts. It is history as well as morality and religion. As history it concerns itself with a chosen race. Plenty will dismiss this as an absurdity, but we know that the path of sceptical criticism is strewn with "absurdities" which turned out to be not absurdities at all! It is odd that there are people who accept that the Greeks had, as a race a special contribution to make to human culture, and also that the Romans had a special contribution to make to world experiments in law and administration, but are ready to smile at the suggestion that the Hebrews had something special to give mankind, something much more important than "culture" or "law." If we can hold that a particular vocation belonged to Greece and Rome it ought not to be hard to hold that a very significant and sublime vocation was given to Israel.

However, human nature among the sophisticated is such that the scepticisms are reserved for religion and the credulities are reserved for the "sciences." The reason is, perhaps, that religion is too personal; it is disturbing, and involves obligations as well as an examination of conscience, and admission of sin. The "Sciences," or the "scientific outlook," are impersonal, and external, so little is done to create spiritual dissatisfaction, and nothing is done to raise the mind to the level of sonship with the Tri-une God.

"Why the Bible?" calls them for a different sort of answer, and we shall most effectively find it within the pages of the Book itself. Our enquiry is not "what is the Bible?" but "Why?"

* * *

Purpose is what we want to explore, and we have abundant answers, especially from new Testament writers who had before them the complete Old Testament, and were, unknown to themselves, writing what was to be "the New Testament of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The purpose then is:

(1) To make known to us "the law of God." We read in Exodus 24 that Moses "told the people all the words of the Lord and all the ordinances." That has continued as God progressively revealed His will for man. It culminates in Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Word Incarnate.

(2) Spiritual blindness is characteristic of men, and the more widespread a malady is the more normal it appears to be. When all men are afflicted with indwelling sin it is not to be expected that they will all be aware of it, or of their lost condition. That needs to be brought to their notice, and not superficially, but deeply into heart and conscience. So the purpose of the Bible is to show us our hopeless spiritual state. This is put by St. Paul in Galatians 3. 22. "Howbeit the Scripture hath shut up all things under sin, that the promise by faith in Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe" (or as the S.R.V. gives it "But the Scripture consigned all things to sin, that what was promised to faith in Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe.")

Awareness of sin, leading through the Holy Spirit to conviction of sin, is insisted on as an essential degree of self-knowledge. From that the Bible goes on to reveal the remedy.

(3) The Remedy—the revelation of Christ as Saviour. We have this purpose set out in the words of Our Lord Himself (John 5, 39) "Ye search the Scriptures because ye think that in them ye have eternal life: and these are they which bear witness of me; and ye will not come unto me that ye may have life." This is emphasised in St. Peter's words in Acts 10 "To Him bear all the prophets witness, that through His name everyone that believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins."

* * *

(4) This truth is put a little differently by St. Paul in 2 Tim. 3. 15, where the apostle refers to Timothy as an actual example of one who has found the remedy—"From a babe thou hast known the Sacred Writings which are able to make thee wise unto Salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus." Christ Jesus is the way of Salvation—no other name or way has been given to us.

* * *

(5) A further purpose of the Bible is to produce faith. It is not any kind of faith, or faith as an attitude of mind, but specifically faith in God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost—Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier. John 20, 31 tells us "These are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, and that believing ye may have life in His name." "Belief cometh of hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ"—Rome. 10, 17.

* * *

(6) Deuteronomy 8, 3 brings to us another aspect of the Bible by declaring a truth about God's Word at the time of the composition of the book of Deuteronomy. As God's Word increased greatly since that time the words of ch. 8, 3 apply with greater force—"Man doth not live by bread alone, but by everything that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live." Our Lord Jesus Christ in His temptation in the wilderness quoted these words in His contest with Satan. God's word supports spiritual life just as bread supports physical life.

(7) Similarly, we consider that spiritual illumination conveys much the same meaning as "spiritual life," so we find the purpose expressed thus in Psalm 119, v. 130—"The opening of Thy words giveth light: it giveth understanding unto the simple." Life is well-nigh impossible without light. Enlightenment is life brought to awareness of self and of God.

* * *

(8) As we need guidance and teaching in all activities of life if we are to advance, so in the spiritual life the same needs are manifest, and the Bible exists to meet them—1 Cor. 10, 11 "These things . . . were written for our admonition."—2 Tim. 3, 16. "Every Scripture inspired of God is profitable for teaching for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness"—Rom. 15, 4 "Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning that through patience and through comfort of the Scriptures we might have hope." Growth is a necessary condition of the spiritual life. No Christian reaches the full stature in a moment. The old heathen legend of Minerva springing fully mature out of the brain of Jupiter is no model or parallel for Christian development. Our Lord grew in stature and in favour with God and man, and so must we. St. Peter expresses this plainly—"As newborn babes long for the spiritual milk which is without guile that ye may grow thereby unto salvation"—1 Pet. 2, 2.

* * *

(9) As God's word is "educational," it must do what is best for those who come to it to learn. The sort of school which fills the students' heads with facts and techniques of scholarship with complete disregard of character and moral development is an instrument of evil as well as of good. The divine school which is Holy Scripture is primarily concerned with the purifying of the soul and with the regenerating of the whole personality. Hence it is a school of sanctity. This we can see from John 17, 17 where Our Lord prays to the Father for His disciples. His words are these—"Sanctify them in the truth: Thy word is truth." St. Paul in Ephesians 5, 26 speaks of the Church of Christ being loved by Christ who gave Himself for it "that He might sanctify it, having cleansed it by the washing of water with the Word."

(10) Let no one suppose that the purpose of Holy Scripture necessarily makes people abandon the joy of life, and forces them to be wet blankets whose attitude to nearly everything is a disapproving one—a melancholy caricature of the Christian life as it ought to be. The fruits of the Spirit St. Paul tells us include joy as well as many other wise and wholesome and cheering things. We condemn sin because we know that it is the enemy of happiness as well as affronting God. You can enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season (Heb. 11, 25), but not for eternity, and not even for very long in earthly life. But you can enjoy superior pleasure, the pleasure of being "in tune with the Infinite," to use a half-forgotten phrase, here and now, and for ever as well if you are reconciled to God. His word is the guide to that reconciliation, and unfolds that happiness. Psalm 19, 8 tells us "the precepts of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart." If the heart rejoices seeing heaven and earth in new beauty, and being at one with God in nature and in grace, that is an experience which is a transformation and the renewing of life. What can drink, gambling, lust, worldly ambition, and so forth, offer to equal that?

Only God's lessons can make us rise above environment, heredity, handicaps, trials, crooks in the lot, and our own shortcomings. Earthly things by themselves may be a temporary solace: heavenly things, and earth's joys in the light of them, bring abiding joy.

(11) "Why the Bible?" calls also for a reference to this fact, that most parts of the Bible, at the various stages of composition, take account of the future: consider it, and make promises regarding it. We call that "prophecy." Prophecy, in the sense of foretelling events in the light of certain contingencies, is to be expected, for it is the intelligent observation of the relationship of cause and effect. We might prophesy by saying "it will not rain to-day," because the wind is blowing steadily from the east, and we have noted that in our situation east wind means dry weather. But Bible prophecy is not like that. That sort of foretelling is of course to be found in Scripture, but the real prediction of the future is vaster far; indeed cosmic. Beyond the rise and fall of nations is the promise of Redemption: beyond that there is the dissolution of all created things—the new heaven and earth—the glorious appearing of the great God and Saviour Jesus Christ. Great prophecies have been fulfilled; and greater await fulfilment.

Thus the Bible provides us with the best answers as to why we have it, and what is it for. In these answers lie the reasons for the supreme importance of Holy Scripture. In them too will be found the secret of its supreme authority.

REVIEW. FATIMA.

"The Lady and the Sun," by Elizabeth Dockman,
London, Peter Davies 12/6

Much has been written about the alleged apparition of the Blessed Virgin at Fatima, Portugal during the Summer of 1917, but it pretty well all goes back to the testimony of a little girl, Lucia de Jesús Santos who was ten years old at the time. Of her family the author says (p.35) "They had the most tender scruples but were unaware of the falsehood in the exaggerated tales they told to impress a stranger . . . It would not matter to them to be caught in a lie but it would be acutely embarrassing if someone were to witness it"—that is to say they would not like to be found out. This is the evidence of a lady who is most sympathetic to them, and doesn't at all wish to find them out.

This book is a novel, what the Publishers describe as "a successful blending of fact and fiction": to us it seems a case of fiction based on fact as most of these Mary-tales are. It is a striking fact that nearly all these apparitions of the Blessed Virgin appear only to the most ignorant and superstitious children—as at Beauregard, Lourdes, La Salette, and Fatima. There is evidence of a certain amount of hesitation in the fact that the vision while appearing on the 13th of each month from May till October, kept promising to reveal at the final interview a great "Secret" thus rousing and maintaining a growing curiosity. She warned the children not to tell; but I daresay she knew children well enough to know that they would tell, as of course they did. But they made a great point of not revealing what the real secret was, as she herself chose to do so, and this she did at the final seance in October. Your heart is in your mouth with curiosity to learn it, and when it comes on page 254 the great and marvellous revelation is a bit of an anticlimax:

"Then the Lady delivered her message, 'There must be prayer. Men must amend their lives and ask pardon from God for their sins . . . They must no longer offend our Divine Lord. He is already offended too much.' " And that is all. Very important no doubt, but certainly not as new as to need a special message nor a new revelation. One is reminded of the ear of wheat which was the great secret of the Eleusinian Mysteries. It may be mentioned in passing, that Lucia has an iron trunk too in her convent, which is supposed to contain one more final and sweeping revelation from the Virgin—another ear of wheat, one fears!

This is all very humiliating when one thinks of the real Virgin Mary who was the honoured Mother of our blessed Lord. But for these Virgins of popular devotion, nothing is too trivial. Hear her on p. 87: "My Immaculate Heart will love you always" and "in the palm of her right hand the Lady held a heart—thorn-pierced: the heart of Mary pierced by the sins of mankind and demanding reparation". This reminds one of the late St. Denys of Paris going down the street holding his severed head under his arm! The language is not the language of any genuine vision of the Virgin outside of an Infant class.

Cousin Maria Carreira had a son who was a hunchback, and she naturally thought that here was a good opportunity to get him cured. But the Apparition would only cure him on condition: he must be converted—which apparently he was not inclined to be. But his mother was in deadly earnest "Gracias a Maria Santissima. He'll be converted. You'll see Senhora. He'll be converted if I have to break every bone in his body." We regret to add that whether he was converted or not by this drastic treatment, he wears his hump to this day. And he is sexton of the little chapel built on the scene of the apparitions, so he should have every facility for a cure. But humps may not be the Senhora's speciality.

What does it all amount to? Largely ecclesiastical politics. The devil and the Freemasons and the Carbonarios and the Republican government must be wiped out, and to this end Russia was to be converted. This last item was a first-priority secret only revealed by Lucia a couple of years later (p. 263). This is not the only point on which Lucia is not very lucid—which is not surprising. Perhaps Miss Dockman knows more about the matter than this little girl did. Did those three children see anything unusual? Probably they did. In these days of Flying Saucers and the Lough Ness Monster and the Abominable Snow-man, one can make allowances for atmospheric phenomena. Ignorance and superstition could do the rest, and the pre-supposition of a people to whose minds the Blessed Virgin was ever familiarly present. Then came mass hysteria fostered and defined by religious and political interests. The crowds came at once as soon as the news got around—not, it would appear, from the immediate neighbourhood, but

"From many parishes and regions

Of different manners, speech, religions".

Propagandists were not slack. Dupes who were only too willing to be duped trooped in. God has perhaps concealed these things from the wise and prudent, but He has revealed them to those babes, and to those who can develop an opportunity.

And so we have (on her own testimony and description) "the Immaculate Heart of Mary" and the advantages, financial and otherwise, of Fatima.

But how any sane person can believe this will always remain a mystery, only qualified by the well-known Latin tag:—Anser non vult velle, sed populus vult decipi (a goose doesn't like to be plucked, but the people like to be deceived).

ROMAN MISREPRESENTATION ABOUT COLOMBIA.

Reprint from The Gospel Witness, by kind permission of the Editor.

Some time ago in the United States a certain politician released for public consumption a "composite photo". This picture showed his political opponent engaged in conversation with a prominent Communist official. Later it was shown, however, that the picture was a fraud, for the unscrupulous politician had simply taken two separate photos and made them one. Actually the two men in the picture had never met. The public was rightly indignant at such a dishonourable action. Such tricks are not confined to the realm of politics, however, for we have word of a similar act in the realm of religion.

For some time the religious press and the secular news agencies have pointed out that Protestants in Spain and Colombia have suffered persecution at the hands of the Roman Catholic Church. Evidence has piled up to prove the existence of such persecution, but the Church has persisted in denying the charges even in the face of plain facts. In desperation, apparently, the Church news sources in Colombia announced that a Protestant leader, Dr. Hanns Lilje, president of the Lutheran World Federation, had declared that charges of Roman Catholic persecution in Colombia were false. The Catholic source added:—"This affirmation from such a distinguished Protestant personality corroborates in every point the investigation that has been made in Colombia for many months, as a consequence of unreliable information from certain news agencies which have alleged that the Catholic Church has organised a persecution of Protestants in Colombia."

The Church then rested its case upon the "statement" of Dr. Lilje, a Lutheran leader. But what was the reaction of Dr. Lilje on hearing such a statement attributed to him? He said on August 30, 1954, after hearing this Roman Catholic report of his "statement":—"The National Catholic News Service (SNNC) of Colombia, in its edition of August 14, 1954, quotes a dispatch from KIPA, the Swiss Catholic news agency, that I had 'declared that it is false that the Catholic Church persecutes Protestants in Colombia'. This is exactly the opposite of what I said."

"I want to state in no uncertain terms that this is a most regrettable misquotation. For me, being in possession of very reliable information, it would have been unthinkable to make a statement to the effect that there was no persecution of Protestants in Colombia from the Roman Catholic side."

The Bishop proceeded and showed the true condition in Colombia:—"To date the religious persecution of the past six years has produced the following tragic effects: 53 known Protestant martyrs; 43 Protestant churches and chapels destroyed by fire and dynamite; and over 120 Protestant primary schools closed by violence or government order. The financial loss suffered by the Protestant community runs into millions of pesos."

Surely such behaviour is despicable. If the Catholic News Service intentionally misquoted Bishop Lilje, then that news agency cannot be condemned too strongly. We cannot see that such a misquotation could be other than deliberate. The Roman Catholic Church likes to fight in a condition of low visibility and so such a misleading statement attributed to a prominent Protestant could contribute to disseminating even more mist over the scene.

Let all ponder Rome's black record in Colombia—53 martyred Protestants; 43 burned or dynamited churches, over 120 schools closed. Let us hear no one say that there is no persecution in Colombia! Let us hear no more of these spurious denials!—L.K.T."

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 99

Prayers for Missions.

We exhort all our people to pray for the success of these missions and for the spiritual and temporal welfare of our boys and girls, our men and women, who have made their home or their sphere of labour beyond the seas.

The late Holy Father, Pius XI, in his zeal for the welfare of all who have had to seek employment in another land, has authorised a special prayer for emigrants. A copy of this prayer is appended. We request the heads of families to have this prayer recited at the Family Rosary. We ask the teachers kindly to teach it to the children and have it recited by them in school.

We hereby prescribe that, this year, the Feast of the Assumption of Our Blessed Lady be a day of special prayer for our emigrants. The clergy are requested to take this notice as official intimation.

The names of the parishes in England and Wales in which these missions are to be given, during this and subsequent years, will be published, with the dates, in the daily and provincial press. We request parents to bring these missions to the knowledge of their children abroad and to urge them to attend.

In the providence of God, Irish emigrants have played a notable part in building up the Catholic Church. This was especially true in the countries of the New World, to which they went after the Famine. They held firmly to their Faith, married Catholics, raised Catholic families, contributed generously to the building and support of Catholic churches and schools, and were always happy to give a son or a daughter to the service of the church. They helped in no small way to build up Catholic communities, with a living practical faith.—(To be continued).

Baptists in U.S.A.—New Mexico Invasion.

In the land of enchantment

Near old Santa Fe

You'll find Glorieta

In wondrous array.

In the midst of the mountains

God's presence you'll find.

At our Glorieta

Rich friendship will bind . . .

Thus, to the melody of Red Sails in the Sunset, a chorus of little girls hailed a Baptist camping ground now abuilding in New Mexico. It is just about big enough (2,000 acres) to hold the twelve tribes of Israel, and it sounds, from the description of its boosters, like a land of milk and honey. From all over the U.S., some 3,000 Baptist Sunday-school teachers converged on Glorieta for seminars and steak fries, lectures and horse-back riding, hiking and hymn-sings. It was their first glimpse of the camp, which, when it is finished in 1956 at an estimated cost of $7,000,000, will boast gardens, an artificial lake, hotels, dining halls, cottages and cabins to house half a million Baptists each summer.

Perhaps the most interesting feature about Baptist Glorieta is its location—right in the heart of traditionally Roman Catholic New Mexico. It is the latest and biggest sign of a Baptist invasion of New Mexico which has the invaders themselves surprised. In 1912, when the largely Spanish-speaking state was admitted to the Union, it contained 13 Baptist churches with a total membership of a little over 2,000. To-day New Mexico has 225 Baptist churches and over 60,000 members. New Mexico's Roman Catholic Church is officially unconcerned, but at a Catholic conference in Albuquerque, Archbishop Edwin V. Byrne declared in his keynote address: "The concern of this conference is to find ways and means to keep our Spanish-speaking people faithful children of the Holy Mother Church . . ."

Much of the Baptists' mustard-seed growth has come from immigration, mainly from Baptist-heavy Texas, drawn by oil booms, defence centres (notably Los Alamos) and tourist folders. But an incalculable amount is the result of the Baptists' aggressive evangelism. Sparkplug of this go-getting gospeling is up-and-doing Dr. Harry P. Stagg, 55, a minister who came to New Mexico from Louisiana in 1930, and has been executive secretary of the New Mexico Baptists for the past 15 years. Rotarian Stagg has pushed mission work and evangelistic camp meetings, to harvest a bumper crop of conversions from ranchers and cowboys, Indians and Spanish-Americans: about 20 New Mexican towns now have "Spanish Baptist" churches.—"Time".

Unity is His Plea.

The Pope hopes that the division existing between the Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox Eastern Church may soon cease and that the two Churches may unite in a single fold.

This expression was contained in a letter addressed recently to the Archmandrite (Abbot) of the Monastery of the Greek Order of the Basilians, situated in the small town of Grottaferrata, south of Rome.

In his letter to Archimandrite Isidore Croce, the Pope recalled that the Monastery was celebrating the sixth centenary of the death of St. Bartholomew, the Christian martyr.

"It is on such occasions", the Papal letter said, "that our soul eagerly searches for that which during the misfortune of long centuries has been lost: we intend to refer to the ancient union, by virtue of which the Greeks were not separated from the Roman Church but under the Vicar of Christ were united in a single fold."

How May We Obtain Remission of Sins?

How may we obtain remission of our sins? Paul answers: "The man who is named Jesus Christ and the Son of God gave himself for our sins." The heavy artillery of these words explodes papacy, works, merits, superstitions. For if our sins could be removed by our own efforts, what need was there for the Son of God to be given for them? Since Christ was given for our sins it stands to reason that they cannot be put away by our own efforts.—Martin Luther.

Persecution.

How does a persecution end? Does it just suddenly stop, or like the old soldier does it simply fade away? The answer is that it may end in either of these ways, since that depends upon circumstances. The persecution under Mary Tudor, which we are celebrating this year, ended abruptly with the death of Mary, and then with that of her Archbishop of Canterbury, Reginald Pole, in the same day. But as a rule they generally just fade away. Many of the persecutions of Pagan Rome simply faded out. Men were weary of blood, or found that the policy was a mistake, and quietly let it slip into desuetude. The Church of Rome, which, as has been said, is the ghost of the Roman Empire sitting on the grave thereof, was more thorough than her pagan counterpart. Like the Bourbons she learned nothing and she forgot nothing. Having embarked on a policy of persecution against those who differed from her, she invented the Inquisition to be the instrument of her persecuting purpose. The Spanish Inquisition, which "has come to be regarded almost as a synonym for religious bigotry coupled with gross inhumanity," was suppressed by Napoleon in 1808, was revived by the Bourbon king, Ferdinand VII in 1814, and went on till it was abolished by the Cortes in 1834. The Roman Inquisition still exists, and still meets under the presidency of the pope, only now it is called the Holy Office, and deals mainly with ecclesiastical offences, church law, and the censorship of books. Only, the organisation is still there.—"The Bulwark".

Serbian Orthodox Launch "Anti-Protestant" Drive.

According to Reuters, the British Press Service, the Serbian Orthodox Church is aroused by the growth of certain Protestant groups in Yugoslavia. It believes that Marshal Tito and his Communist government are, behind the scenes and in indirect ways, encouraging these groups as a means of putting pressure on the Orthodox bishops and clergy. Outwardly, relations between the government and the Orthodox Church have been fairly good, though the recent imprisonment of Patriarch Arenije of Montenegro has created new strains. But the truth is that the government does not fully trust the clergy, nor the clergy the government. In launching its latest anti-Protestant drive, the Orthodox bishops say they have no objection to the presence of Anglicans, American Episcopalians or Lutherans in Yugoslavia. Adventists and Nazarenes seem to be the chief targets. Adventist growth from a handful before the war to a present membership of 50,000, with a new theological seminary near Belgrade, is particularly resented.—"Christian Century".

Need of the Bible To-day.

The following testimony to the value of the Bible in meeting the needs of to-day was written by the Duchess of Hamilton and is taken from Life and Work, the record of the Church of Scotland, April, 1955 :

"If modern problems are completely different from those experienced by the people with whom the Bible deals, how relevant is the Bible to us? This is a burning question. It is true our problems are new; it is true that they are different; and it is true that they are so complicated that the issues of right and wrong are not easily discernible. But it is also true that our task in equipping ourselves to meet these problems is the same as it has ever been; for it is to know God and follow Christ.

We will not find in the Bible a ready-made solution to the latest economic problem or political impasse; we will find the knowledge of God and of Christ Who has overcome this world and everything that this world can do to us and to any future generation.

I believe it is essential that we should not let our inevitable bewilderment at the problems which confront us cloud for one moment our vision of the Word of God as the foundation from which Christians must go forth in faith to seek and to find in every field of social, political, and economic work, and from which they must approach every aspect of evangelistic endeavour.

The Bible is not out of date. It is as relevant to us now as it was for the first Christians; and it will be in the last days. What we need as laymen is a better knowledge of it; and those of us who are parents, in particular, are deeply conscious of our need to impart it to our children. We are thankful for the Sunday Schools and the Bible Classes, but if we are honest with ourselves, we know that they are not enough. We are talking much about Evangelism in Scotland. Let us remember to give the Bible a central place. I am quite sure to do so is an absolute necessity.

Lutheran Church Gains Strength In Canada, U.S.A.

The annual statistical summary compiled by the National Lutheran Council reveals that in 1953 membership in all Lutheran bodies in the U.S. and Canada was 6,869,066—an increase of 195,121, or 2.9 per cent, over the previous year. The Canadian total was 202,885. This makes the Lutherans the third most numerous general Protestant group in the nation, exceeded only by Baptists and Methodists.

Is Italy "Roman Catholic."

From time to time the Roman Catholic Press

in South Africa takes satisfaction in the decline of organised religion in Great Britain, particularly England, and regards it as an inevitable result of Protestantism. Protestantism, they declare, with its emphasis upon the right of private judgment, is bound to lead to religious indifferentism because it lacks authority. The implication is that only an authoritarian form of religion, which denies the right of private judgment, such as Romanism is, can possibly retain the loyalty of the people. We are entitled to ask if there is any bastion of Roman Catholicism in the world which can be cited as an example. Certainly Spain is not. Cardinal Spellman admitted during a visit to Spain, that if it were not for the Spanish Army (note, he did not say the Spanish "Catholic" conscience) Roman Catholic prelates would be murdered in their beds. That does not say much for the loyalty of the Spanish people towards the church from which they have never been permitted to disagree.

What about Italy? Well, we could say a lot about that country, but perhaps it would be better to allow the American magazine Life to give its opinion :

"Another essential fact is that Italy is not quite so Roman Catholic as it might seem. Polls and ecclesiastical records reveal, for example, such facts as : less than 10% of the professional class in bustling Milan regularly attends Mass; not more than one third of Rome's population goes to church on Sundays. Italy's priesthood is miserably supported by the people, and its numbers have been declining for more than 70 years.

History helps explain why the Vatican's forceful excommunication of Communists in 1949 struck with such relatively little impact in Italy. One need only remember when Italy became a nation in 1870 : Garibaldi's 'patriot' armies storming Rome's Porta Pia, the pope becoming an angry 'prisoner' in his enclave, Mazzini lashing the Vatican as 'that gigantic ruin' and the pope excommunicating the heroes of Italian nationhood. The lusty political war between papal and secular powers in Italy has, century upon century, been vivid and exuberant : it was almost 200 years before any Reformation when Bernabò of Milan greeted papal legates bearing his excommunication by forcing them to eat the bulls—parchment, cords, lead seals and all.

To-day the most Communist region of Italy—Emilia—Romagna—generally fits a section of the once powerful Papal States, which could never command the lasting loyalty of the people."—30-8-54.—Quoted in "Protestant Reveille", South Africa, Apl. '55.

Living Example.

Our emigrants of the present day have even a greater opportunity in countries where so many are without faith but would follow the truth, if it shone forth in a living example. In these days when successive Popes have made the lay apostolate the dearest wish of their hearts, when so many lay men and women of every country are helping to advance the cause of Christ and to defend it against organised attack, our people should also try to give this living example. By Confirmation they have been enrolled as soldiers of Christ. They should be active soldiers, showing that they appreciate the truth of their faith and its power to influence their lives. They should be proud to stand fast by it and to defend it against attack.

Need not Preach.

To be apostles abroad, our people have no need to preach. They will be apostles by living up to the teaching of their faith. Their actions and examples will speak louder than any words. Their faith will be respected by non-Catholics if it is seen to have a good influence on their lives, in making them sober, industrious and self-respecting. Their faith, and indeed their country, will be judged by their conduct, respected if their conduct deserves respect, despised if it is evil or disorderly.

By the practice of their faith, our emigrants can be apostles also to the young men and women of their own country, who have just arrived and who are inclined to follow the example of those who are there before them. The first duty of our emigrants is to help one another in their spiritual and temporal necessities.

Our people at home and abroad are capable of an active and zealous lay apostolate, whenever they are persuaded of its necessity. If proof be needed, we see in the Legion of Mary one of the most active and successful forms of the lay apostolate. Its influence has spread over the five continents, and its spirit has given strength to people, young and old, of every race and colour.

Terrible Danger.

We are confident that our emigrants will give a warm welcome to Father McGrath and his assistants who have suffered for the Faith in China and who now come to their country men and women as envoys of the Legion of Mary. We hope that, through their inspiration, many will enrol themselves under the standard of Our Blessed Lady.

Each year many thousands of our young men and women go abroad. It is our duty to help them. The first and most important help we should give them is to prepare them at home for a truly Christian life wherever that life is to be spent.

Warnings of danger to faith and morals have not hitherto moved intending emigrants or their parents, for the reason that they cannot visualise conditions of which they have no experience. There is one warning, however, which all can understand. We refer to the truly terrible danger confronting young girls who go to the cities of Great Britain without having employment already arranged or a good friend to meet them. Evil persons are on the watch to meet them and to drag them down to the depths.

Grave Obligation.

If parents themselves fail to realise these dangers, they should at least heed the warnings given by those who have actual knowledge of the sad histories of some of our girl emigrants. Parents should realise that they are under the gravest obligation to consult for the spiritual and temporal welfare of their children abroad as well as at home, and to ensure that inexperienced girls should not rush blindly into deadly danger to soul and body.

The peril to the ordinary adult arises from a widespread indifference to religious faith and worship, a disregard of Christian moral standards in theory and practice, an atmosphere in places of work and amusement indifferent to religion and often opposed to Christian morals. This atmosphere, making itself felt in conversation and outlook, is more dangerous than hostility or bigotry to our young people, who come from a country where positive influences favour religious practice, where it is often easier to go to Mass than to stay away without sufficient reason. Our people are not easily driven, but they are often easily led.

Archdeacon of the Seychelles — Protest in Commons.

Mr. E. G. M. Fletcher (Lab. Islington E.) asked the Colonial Secretary in the House of Commons whether it was with his authority that consultations took place between the Governor of the Seychelles and the Bishop of Mauritius as a result of which, after the refusal of the Archdeacon of the Seychelles to resign his post he had now been informed, on behalf of the Governor, that he would not be allowed to return to the Seychelles.

Mr. H. Hopkinson, Minister of State for Colonial Affairs, said the Colonial Secretary was aware that the Governor had corresponded with the Bishop of Mauritius on this question. Mr. Roach's return as archdeacon was for the decision of the bishop.

Mr. Fletcher: Is this not a monstrous interference with freedom of speech in the Seychelles? Is it not scandalous that the Governor should use his influence, or attempt to use his influence, with the Bishop to prevent the return to the Seychelles of the Archdeacon merely because he saw fit to criticise the Administration of Government in the Seychelles? A petition is being widely signed in the Seychelles asking for the return of the Archdeacon.

"Lacking in Wisdom."

Mr. Hopkinson: I do not think there is any question of criticism of the administration. Mr. Roach has criticised a number of individuals and the allegations have not been well founded in many cases. No formal request was made by the Governor to the Bishop for the Archdeacon's removal. What the Governor did was to make it clear that, in his opinion, it was in the interests of the colony and the Anglican community that Mr. Roach should not return. Everybody will agree on many of the Archdeacon's good qualities, his sincerity and his courage, but he has certainly at times been lacking in wisdom and tact in a Colony where the situation is one of great delicacy.

Mr. G. Nicholson (C. Farnham): How does the Governor come into the picture if the

JAMES USHER.

(2) EDUCATION AND OUTLOOK.

Continued.

The career of James Usher as a churchman was distinguished by high office, and by many contacts with public life in Ireland and England. He was favourably received by King James I and Charles I. He was chosen for the Westminster Assembly of divines (even those who do not sympathise with the aims of that Assembly do not deny its eminence and persisting influence). In Ireland he was constantly associated with the King's Deputies, and had a part in deliberating policies. But we do not think that we misrepresent him when we say that Usher's public career was not the part of his life he valued most. He was almost exclusively a theological student by temperament and inclination. Circumstances brought him into the world of politics and ecclesiastical administration. He was probably valuable enough in his official duties there, but the other side of his life meant most. The early seventeenth century produced cosmopolitan Protestant scholars as distinct from theologians, and the field of Biblical scholarship was enriched by the international character it rapidly attained. In this field Usher was at his best.

We know that Usher was one of the earliest students to enter the newly-founded university of Trinity College, Dublin, and that it was staffed mainly by men of Puritan opinions. This in effect meant that they were disciples of Calvin in their theology (like many of their contemporaries at Cambridge), and inclined to be his disciples in their views of church order.

Those who read anything about Richard Hooker, the author of "The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity," that triumphant vindication of the Anglican settlement, will be familiar with the name of Walter Travers, his colleague in the Temple Church, London. Travers, an excellent and learned man, took a different view of the church order then established, and believed that the Church of England should abandon Episcopacy and become Presbyterian like the Church in Scotland or the Reformed Churches in the Netherlands or France or Switzerland. He and others avoided receiving episcopal ordination and received their ministerial commission at the hands of a Reformed Presbytery in Antwerp. In England they sought to foster the further reform of the church (as they conceived it) by setting up a model presbytery of a private character near London. A superficial judgment would dismiss Travers and his friends as persons who had no right to officiate within the bounds of the Church of England. But the error of such an attitude lies in the assumption that they could have removed themselves from the Church if they had been consistent. There was no Church validly and legally existing in England in the time of Elizabeth (and for long after) apart from the Church of England. Separation was unlawful and indictable. Further, Travers and his school (or rather Cartwright's school), had strong support in Cambridge and among men of affairs. From their point of view it was devoutly to be wished that the Church might see the wisdom of adopting a Presbyterian order. The heir to the crown who would succeed on Queen Elizabeth's death was the King of Scotland, James VI, and he was thought to be a Presbyterian who would favour a Presbyterian system in the Church. This expectation was not fulfilled, and the conference on religion which the new king held at Hampton Court disappointed many. That, however, was still in the future when Usher entered Trinity College where Walter Travers had been installed as the first Provost (1594).

We have written thus of Walter Travers because we can see no reason to reflect upon his character or merits. While we regret that he could not accept the standards of the Church of England as Hooker did, we recognise that he and others had not lost hope that their's might be the winning side and that the Church of England might be moulded nearer to their heart's desire. So he was offered the Provostship and was introduced to office by Dr. Loftus, Archbishop of Dublin, who had been nominal Provost in order to inaugurate the College.

Dr. Elrington, editor of Usher's works, says in his "Life of Usher" that Travers was "perhaps the most improper man in England for the place." This observation follows upon his suggestion that "the extraordinary selections made for the management of the infant Irish College must have materially contributed to influence the early theological opinions of Usher." The fact is that Travers had a good reputation in England (apart from his views on Church government). Fuller in his Church History praises him as a preacher of attractive qualities, and he had the advantage of Irish associations (his grandfather had property in Co. Cork, and his grandmother was a sister of Edmund Spenser the poet who was a landowner in the same county.) His scholarship, we may be sure, was adequate, and it is not unreasonable to assume that Usher owed much to him. That Usher did not adopt Traver's views on Church government is certain. Travers may have recognised that his position did not warrant active pushing of his opinions. He may also have found that Usher and other students had other influences to keep them firm.

Twenty years earlier Travers had published a once famous Latin work on Ecclesiastical Discipline. It appeared in 1574. Among the grounds of criticism of the Church we find him deploring the very low standard of the men the bishops were ordaining. He reveals a remarkable acquaintance with Latin words of contempt which he applies to the clergy. Possibly he had justification in 1574; for the changes in religion under Henry VIII and Edward VI, and the reaction to Romanism under Queen Mary, and the vacancies which must have been numerous in the early years of Elizabeth, inevitably created needs the universities could not immediately supply. We must also allow that nobody engaged in controversy in the sixteenth century aimed at being fair to an opponent. Traver's book had extraordinary influence, and Usher must have read it; but it was written twenty years before, and a man's views usually grow mellow and his judgments less severe as time and age advance. Travers could scarcely have said of his old university, Cambridge, in 1594 what he said in 1574. In 1574 he declared that scarcely one pastor could be found conformable to the ideal he drew from Scripture. A few years later his friends and others who agreed with him presented a petition for Church reform to King James with the claim that it had a thousand signatures!

* * *

There is no denying that in his earlier years Travers was an intractable person, but it is gratifying to read in Dr. J. P. Mahaffey's history of the foundation of T.C.D. ("An Epoch in Irish History") that Travers lived in Trinity College "without suffering complaint, or making complaint of others." He says of him "he was a man of zeal and great learning, not only in theology, but in languages, and was James Usher's master in those things. It is no rash inference to say that the complexion of Usher's theology, the Evangelical character of his teaching, the utter distaste he shows for High Church practices, were all the results of the influence of Travers."

Mahaffey, nevertheless, suggests that Usher's "persistent defence of episcopacy in later life was evidently his recoil against the extreme Puritan teaching he had received in his youth."

* * *

We have lingered too long with Walter Travers, but we must quote some of the speech made at his installation by the Archbishop of Dublin. Archbishop Loftus was reckoned to be a Puritan, but he was a prominent churchman, who knew that T.C.D. was founded on behalf of the Church. He described Travers as "a person of many solid excellencies." He added "I must say this much, that for the promotion of learning the most critical choice could not have fixed on a fitter person." Turning to Travers the Archbishop said "this place requires a person of exemplary conformity to the doctrine and discipline of this Church as they are established by law."

* * *

Another influence on Usher was that of the vice-provost, Dr. Luke Challoner, who was related by marriage to the Usher family. Challoner was in reality the mainstay of the college in all its ups and downs. He was a constant preacher as well as a good man of business. The college library has many of his sermon notes (and some of Travers'). He held Puritan views, but was mainly concerned to build up the college, and to establish himself as a prosperous man. When near to his end he directed his daughter Pheobe to marry Usher if he asked her. Usher did, and they had forty years of married life. The Diocesan Registry of Dublin contains a Deed of Gift of the Rev. Luke Challoner to his daughter of £300 in gold "in my Dutch trunk," £60 in silver, plate worth £90, farms, furniture, bedding, linen, brass, pewter, utensils, and lands in Finglas. James Usher started married life very comfortably.

Now as to Usher's outlook. He may be described in early life as a decided Calvinist. When the Church of Ireland found it necessary to adopt a Confession of Faith (it had not officially accepted the Thirty-nine Articles of England) its bishops and clergy met in synod in Dublin in 1615 and Usher prepared a long confession of one hundred and four articles, based on the unofficial "Lambeth Articles" (see Hardwick—"History of the Articles of Religion." See also the appendix to Dr. Elrington's "Life of Usher"). This Calvinistic confession was adopted, and though discarded in 1634 when the Thirty-nine Articles took its place, it provided the materials for the Westminster Confession of Faith.

As the seventeenth century advanced the strict Calvinism of earlier years was modified—Remonstrants and Arminians appeared in Holland, and the school of Saumur in France. Whether it was Arminians or Episcopius, Amyraut or Pajon, the tendency was widespread, and there appears no reason to deny that Usher's views were influenced by Continental movements of thought, and by interchange of opinion with his numerous correspondents.

We are of course at a loss to know why Dr. Elrington and others have been so anxious to show that Usher modified his doctrines. We cannot regard it as a blemish on a man's character that he is a Calvinist, or a sign of ineptitude that he understands the New Testament as St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Augustine did (see Mozley—"Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination"). If a man changes his interpretation of things in later life he is not necessarily right or wrong: all we need assume is that he is honest. So we consider it to be simply a matter of record that Usher saw reason to move from the theological position he held till he was middle-aged. The extent of the move cannot easily be estimated. "All are agreed on one point" says Dr. Elrington "that in the earlier part of his life he had held rigidly to the opinions of Calvin." That the word "rigidly" is incorrect may be learnt from Elrington himself, who goes on to say "even at a much earlier period of his life he was not an advocate of the extreme opinions attributed to him." His biographer claims that Usher's letter to Archbishop Laud (Letter 190, Vol. 15, Usher's Works) congratulating Laud on his appointment to Canterbury could not have been written by a Calvinist! The letter refers to Laud's successful labours to improve the Church's property. It is surely no crime to wish well to one who was careful of the Church's material interests, even if one is a Calvinist! Also, the courtesies exchanged between the two Archbishops are not unusual, and Usher valued Laud's service to the Church of Ireland.

Those who are interested in this question may examine the letter of Dr. Henry Hammond on page 290 of Elrington's "Life." This letter declares that Usher preached that there is a free offer of salvation to every man. There is also on page 292 a letter of Dr. Brian Walton (of "The Polyglott Bible") in which Walton says that Usher disliked the doctrine of absolute reprobation and some other points of "the doctrine of Geneva." The conclusion we draw from this is that Usher in his older days was satisfied with the teaching of the Thirty-nine Articles of his Church and no longer cared to define exactly the various providences of God.

We may touch now upon a matter which gave rise to lively controversy at the time, and which was revived two hundred years later. This was Usher's attitude (real or alleged) to the men of Presbyterian convictions who came to the North of Ireland in the wake of the Scottish plantations of King James I. These men were introduced into certain benefices by patrons. (Scots who had become landlords in many districts and who had formed Scots colonies of tenants in parts of Down and Antrim.)

The problem was "how to incorporate these men into the State Church whose bishops had full legal jurisdiction in ecclesiastical affairs, as well as the responsibility for maintaining the good order of Church and realm?" It appears that in one instance a Scottish gentleman, Robert Blair, was invited by Lord Clandeboy to become minister or incumbent of Bangor, Co. Down. Blair told Clandeboy that he could not submit to episcopal government, nor any part of the English Liturgy which was there in use. Clandeboy told the Bishop of Down, Dr. Echlin, of the difficulties Blair felt. The bishop, a Scot himself, was good-humoured and patient, and no doubt hoped that in the long run Blair (then aged about thirty) would grow easier and more familiar with Church usage. He told Blair that he must ordain him otherwise the law would be flouted. He suggested that Blair might consider him a fellow-presbyter at the ordination. Blair agreed, and so was lawfully ordained. This Blair tells us in his autobiography (Woodrow Society—Edinburgh, 1848.)

About three years later Blair says the bishop began "to lay snares" for him. All this amounted to was a desire to incorporate Blair more fully into the Church by inviting him to be the preacher at the triennial visitation of the diocese of Down by the Archbishop of Armagh. Blair was uncompromising and intolerant. He even expresses surprise that the "prelatic meetings," as he calls them, countenanced him. He excused his acceptance of the invitation by saying that he and his brethren were not at that time "under an explicit sworn covenant against them." He boldly insisted in his sermon on the divine institution of presbytery, but his hearers made no stir; only the Bishop of Dromore "desired me to be moderate towards them."

Later Blair visited Usher, and heard the English Liturgy in his family, much to his chagrin—"I expected another thing in the family of so learned and pious a man than the reading of the Liturgy." Reading Blair's words we are inclined to say that if Usher used the Liturgy Blair might have been satisfied of its propriety.

Blair visited Usher at Drogheda, his residence, and in conversation Usher told him that his attitude to the Liturgy, etc. might endanger his ministry, and said how much he, Usher, would regret that. He agreed with Blair that further reforms might be made. We are, to remember, of course, that Blair was Usher's guest; that Usher was an agreeable and courteous man; and that Blair may innocently have overestimated the extent to which Usher concurred with him.

After eight years ministry in the diocese of Down Blair was suspended for nonconformity. He appealed to Usher, and the suspension was withdrawn, probably because of some legal point. His bishop urged him to conform, but he answered that no law or cause in the kingdom of Ireland required conformity. The deposition was then declared. An appeal to Usher was fruitless, which is, one thinks, evidence that Blair's position was illegal. It seems plain that Echlin and Usher had particularly sought to win Blair to an acceptance of the Church Order and Liturgy. Blair was steadfast in his nonconformity. His position was not really defensible, though we can see that he felt called to minister to his fellow countrymen according to the principles he held. But Lord Clandeboy was not, after all, justified in persuading Blair into a situation in which conflict would be inevitable.

Another distinguished Scots minister whose difficulties here were similar to Blair's was John Livingstone (autobiography in Select Biographies I, Woodrow Society, Edinburgh, 1845). He describes Usher as "not only a learned but a godly man, although a bishop." Livingstone says what they wanted was "to desire toleration in our unconformity." He was deposed in 1635 by Echlin's successor, Henry Leslie, Bishop of Down. He had been minister in Killinchy, Co. Down, for five years.

Particulars of these controversies may be read in the lives of Blair and Livingstone, and in Adair's Narrative (a seventeenth century history of the Presbyterian cause in Ireland). The nineteenth century discussions on them may be read in Elrington's "Life of Usher," and Bishop Mant's "History of the Church of Ireland," and in Reid's "History of the Presbyterian Church" and Killen's introduction to his edition of Adair. Too much has been made of the issue on one side or the other. Archbishop Usher, Bishop Echlin of Down, and Bishop Knox of Raphoe (who ordained Livingstone) were trying to make the best of a situation which confronted them. Their plan was to meet the Scots more than half-way. Blair, Livingstone and their associates, on the other hand were convinced that no good could come of bishops, having had experience of the bishops put into office in Scotland by King James I. Livingstone says "I was from my infancy bred with averseness from episcopacy and ceremonies."

What happened then had to happen, and we need blame neither side in that unhappy affair.

ASPECTS OF ESSENTIAL FAITH.

For us the prime source of the essentials of the Christian faith is the Holy Scripture. Before the writing of the books of the New Testament and the gathering of them into the "Canon," or inspired category, the saving truths of Christianity must have been made known orally, and by the testimony of men who received the word from their predecessors. This period cannot have been long, for all the books of the New Testament were in existence (almost certainly) well before the end of the first century. It is true that for some generations other writings as well were popular among Christians; and by some people were thought to be as valuable in their way as the writings later termed canonical. But the fact that the only writings which endured are those in the "Canon" is proof that the Holy Spirit permitted men to test and discover for themselves what He authenticated and sealed.

The testimony of the fathers of the Church was given to the New Testament because it gave evidence of its divine authority, and thus the oral tradition of the faith ceased to be needed. At the very stage when an oral tradition would tend to become corrupted the written tradition (i.e. the New Testament) was at hand, and men could, and did, say of it that it is "the Christian tradition." The New Testament is therefore the source—book of the faith, the record of its origin and purpose, and the rule by which all differences and disputes are to be settled. There is no verifiable tradition, or body of doctrine or person to which appeal from the New Testament may be made.

* * *

All reformed churches recognise this, and indeed it is the realisation of this truth which made them reformed churches. That is why the reformed churches make the primary affirmation that the Bible is the supreme standard and rule, and that all else is subordinate. In these islands the Church of England, the Church of Scotland, the Church of Ireland, and the other Christian communions of orthodox principles are in concord basically because they all declare that God's word is above all else. We may say that this is a truly Protestant position: but it is also in the soundest sense a truly Catholic position; and failure to uphold the Bible as the rule of faith means that Rome has forfeited the sound old Catholic principle. It is the genuine Protestant Churches which place themselves under God's written word, and accept its arbitrament in controversies.

For convenience we quote the decisive statement of the Anglican formulary—Article VI declares that the Bible contains all things necessary to salvation. From this it deduces two principles—whatsoever (1) "is not read therein" (2) "nor may be proved thereby" is not required to be believed as an article of the faith, or thought necessary to salvation.

This is sufficiently plain (for all but the most contentious), and ordinary people can understand and concur. Spiritual truth, the truth of salvation, is not measured quantitatively. There is no virtue in multiplying dogmas. Hence the reformed position (a) sets aside a great deal that is not read in the Bible, and (b) erects a barrier against future additions.

Should anyone say "How lean and impoverished, as a result, your reformed faith must be" we answer that we learn of (1) The being of God. (2) His activity in creation. (3) His activity in grace. (4) His self-revelation as Trinity in Unity. (5) The incarnation of the Word, Jehovah—Jesus. (6) The gift of the Holy Spirit. (7) The fruits of the Holy Spirit. (8) The moral law. (9) The precious blood, etc. We learn on our side also the need of repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. We are faced repeatedly with the lesson of the necessity of faith—"without faith it is impossible to please Him." We learn too of justification by Faith—That there is no salvation by works: That there is no salvation without obedience.

Will anyone venture to say that such a faith is lean and impoverished?

For many years the reformed churches have been meditating on their faith in relation to the ideas suggested by the word "Catholic." They have realised that the common use among Roman Catholics is to claim that word for themselves exclusively, and thus to label all the rest as "non-Catholic" which stigmatises us as heretics. Those who hold the true Catholic faith of Holy Scripture are not heretics, and so our reformed churches have been re-discovering the right significance of the word.

"Catholic" is a symbol of the "wholeness" of our faith. What way shall we take to define "wholeness?" Obviously we ought to understand it in relation to the fullness of the doctrines of Christianity, i.e. the full doctrine of the Godhead, not the inadequate notions of Arians, Socinians or "Jehovah's Witnesses;" the full doctrine of the atonement, and not a meagre one which does less than justice to Scripture teaching; the full doctrine of free grace, and not the Pelagian or semi-Pelagian modification of it. In this sense, in regard to the teaching of the New Testament, we can see the "wholeness" as distinct from partial, one-sided, and attenuated views. If we consider saving truths thus (and we have not referred to all of them) we recognise our right to the Catholic faith and name, and our duty to repel any form of suggestion that we are heretics.

Then, too, we ought to see that the discussion of our Catholic position is not sidetracked by questions of "how much" or "how little" do we believe. Are there seven grades of ministry in the Church? Are there seven sacraments? Have we devotions to the saints? Have we aids to sanctity such as cords, medals, scapulars? Have we pilgrimages, penances etc? Do we believe that the Church on earth is infallible? We hold that these and similar questions are beside the point, for as we have said already, there is no virtue in multiplicity of observances, and no necessary truth either. All that we can legitimately call "Catholic" must be truly typical of Christianity throughout its history from the first century. If things enter into religious practice a thousand years after the Incarnation they can never be Catholic even if to-day they are widespread.

The questions can never be "how much?" or "how little?" but "what is true?" To decide what is true requires an appeal to Holy Scripture. It will not do to try to settle the matter by saying that such and such a belief is generally held, or that such and such a belief is fitting. Argument like this would make popular opinion infallible. It is the abandonment of serious and responsible thought.

If again it is protested that this view demands an austere and rigid rather than a rich and flexible presentation of the faith we answer that beauty (if that concept underlies the protest) is not to be looked for in religion in just the way it is aimed at in the arts. We are not concerned with the aesthetic but with the ethical: not with God in nature but with God as Spirit. Religion ought to be beautiful above everything man is engaged in, but it must be moral beauty; the purity of "the image of God restored." The arts give us a parallel—in architecture what means most in the way of achievement is line, form, and proportion: not detail, ornament, and elaboration. Elaboration may obscure the true aspect. "Austere" and "rigid" are not indeed the adjectives to apply to a religion whose working principle is love, but they may serve as a protest or corrective. The luxuriance of the tropics is ultimately less satisfying than the uplands of more temperate climes.

Holy Scripture is our safeguard. It nails us down to what is true, not to how much or how little we retain of the unreformed system.

When we consider the pursuit of the essentials of the faith at the time of the Reformation we have no need to hide from ourselves the unfortunate differences which existed among reformed churches. But if there is a Lutheran reform, a Calvinistic reform, and an Anglican reform, there is common consent as to the Rule of Faith, and common agreement that we are justified by faith only. Where the glorious truth of justification by Faith is understood (unfortunately not everywhere among us) there is, basic agreement as to salvation, and basic agreement as to the efficiency of the atoning sacrifice and Precious Blood of Calvary.

* * *

All reformed churches will agree, we think, with the declaration of the Church of Ireland A.D. 1870 (or the part of it) which says "the Church of Ireland as a Reformed and Protestant Church, doth affirm its constant witness against all these innovations in doctrine and worship whereby the Primitive Faith hath been from time to time defaced or overlaid, and which at the Reformation this Church did disown and reject."

It is, to be noted this part of the declaration properly follows the more positive statement—"the Church doth, as heretofore, accept and unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, as given by inspiration of God, and containing all things necessary to salvation; and doth continue to profess the faith of Christ as professed by the Primitive Church." This is surely the right approach for reformed churches; first, to declare positive truth, and that, not by novel interpretations, but in harmony with what Christians have always believed. Then, secondly, to liberate the essential faith from the drift of centuries by which it has been overlaid or defaced. Thus the reformed churches became Protestant in order that they might recover the primitive and truly Catholic faith of the New Testament.

We are bound, therefore, to say that the faith which was sufficient for apostles, saints, and martyrs of the first age of the Church is sufficient for us. Apostolic faith was not defective, or inadequate, or provisional, awaiting further revelations or developments. If the twelve apostles were Catholics, so are we. If we are not, they were not either.

We say further, reverting to the point about "Catholic" referring to time as well as to space, that if we can show the date when the dogmas we discarded in the sixteenth century were made obligatory beliefs, we have at once deprived them of their right to be called "Catholic" dogmas. The reason is that if it was not necessary to salvation to believe a certain thing in, say, 1214 A.D. it cannot be made necessary by any sort of legislation in 1215 A.D. Such things may affect visible communion with part of the Church on earth, but are of no account in the issues of eternity. The usual answer to this is to say that before such dogmas were defined and prescribed by Councils, etc. they were believed by everybody right back to the first century with "implicit faith." This means that if they had known of these doctrines they would gladly have professed them! The fact is that the whole concept of "implicit faith" is as the lawyers say "void for uncertainty." The theory of implicit faith was created to meet difficulties of an historical character. It was the answer thought up to rebut the Reformers' criticisms of the mediaeval dogmas as innovations and corruptions unheard of in ancient times.

But of course there is a claim in favour of the legitimacy of mediaeval and modern dogmas. It is the doctrine of development which will be for ever associated with the great Dr. J. H. Newman who was almost its inventor. Newman's Doctrine of Development, a great "tour de force," was greeted as a sublime justification of the Church of his adoption;

Protestant and Anglican arguments, based on the evidence of history, against the additions which Pope Pius IV made to the ancient Catholic creeds were thought to be quite irrelevant in the light of the principle of development. But more reflection abated the enthusiasm, and Newman's vindication of his Church is now, we believe treated with caution. If there are true developments, we must admit that there are also false developments. Also the ancient rule of Catholicity defined by St. Vincent of Lerins in the Commonitory, that the faith is what has been believed "always, everywhere, by all" is irrefutable. Reasonably interpreted it cannot be persuaded into agreement with Newman.

* * *

The word "faith" is often loosely used. We must regard the true Christian faith as what we know God has revealed, and not what we guess at, or infer generally, or wish to be true. It was all very well for the seventeenth century physician of Norwich, Sir Thomas Browne, to say that "he loved to lose himself in a mystery" (or words to that effect), but that is a matter of temperament, not of truth. The only mysteries the Christian has concern with are those truths which God's word puts to us which are beyond our limited understanding. We accept them because of their source, not otherwise.

* * *

Essential faith, because of its importance must be based on real foundations. Non-essentials may consist in whatever views appeal to us or commend themselves to us. But vital faith cannot rest on conjectures, credulities, or corruptions. We sadly confess that there are sects of recent origin in our midst which rest upon such errors. Against their errors, as against all errors which arise from neglect of the true rule of faith we must be on our guard.

Our faith, founded upon Christ, and upon an immediate redemptive union with Him, as the New Testament instructs us, is the response to the call of the Gospel and enabling Grace. It is a faith which is independent of intermediaries, and ought not to be involved with side-issues. Our task, through the Holy Spirit is to live our faith as St. James teaches—"Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only."

ARE PROTESTANT CHARGES UNJUSTIFIED?

A broadcast in "The Case for Protestantism" Series by Ven. Archdeacon T. C. Hammond, M.A. (T.C.D.), Th.D.

Cardinal Gilroy a while ago entered the lists as a champion of toleration, and rejoiced that the sectarians, as he called them, achieved nothing at the last Federal elections. The Cardinal spoke with a vigour and sincerity that assured him a good hearing. But we still contend that there is a case for argument which cannot be closed by an earnest appeal for toleration. Protestants are convinced, many of them, that the system which is advocated by the Roman Catholic Church is inimical to the true spirit of democracy. They may be mistaken, but we respectfully submit that something more than hard names is necessary, if the opinion we hold is to be dismissed as wholly absurd. The only evidence that can be brought on the side of the Protestant contention is the evidence of the dogmatic statements of the Roman Catholic Church and the evidence of the actual working out in practice of these dogmatic statements. I prefer to adopt the latter course, as there is ground for disputing the interpretation placed upon dogmatic statements. Cardinal Gilroy would seek to assure Protestants that there is no possibility of any interference in politics in the set-up of Australian economy. Some Protestants are not yet satisfied that this is the case.

Vaughan's Intemperance.

They recall the extraordinary violence of Archbishop Vaughan's assault on the State School system introduced by Sir Henry Parkes. In public utterances he described the State Schools as "seed-plots of immorality". Protestants wonder why this protagonist of strict sectarian segregation should be the subject of such extraordinary publicity at the very time when Cardinal Gilroy is denouncing sectarianism. This is a kind of inconsistency that runs through much of the Roman Catholic propaganda. Archbishop Vaughan's bones have been removed from England and received here with every mark of respect. The A.B.C. has given wide publicity to the ceremonial associated with this enterprise. Protestants are set wondering if this is the prelude to a strong political campaign in favour of a reversal of the present Education policy of the State. It seems idle to level charges of sectarianism against others when the claim to distinctive sectarian education is so confidently advanced by the leaders of Roman Catholic thought. So long as there are people in the State with strong and different religious beliefs, it is absurd to contend that sectarian issues can never influence political movements.

In Malta not so many years ago the priests in the Confessional were required to interrogate penitents as to the manner in which they cast their votes. The Bishops issued solemn warnings that voters could not support the Government party on pain of mortal sin. The pressure was so strong that Lord Strickland was forced to do penance for his errors. The Roman Church triumphed in the end. The origin of the whole dispute was that the Government felt compelled to support the claim of a monk who had been placed under discipline that, as a British subject, he could not be compelled to leave Malta and present himself for judgment in Rome. That is a political issue, and as a consequence of it there was direct interference by the Roman Catholic authorities in the elections.

Flagrant Dishonesty.

There are minor instances that create amusement as well as other feelings. A man who engages in controversy requires a long memory. I am always impressing this fact on myself. When St. Mary's Cathedral was dedicated in 1900, Lord Beauchamp attended the dedication ceremony. The Bishop of Wellington was the preacher. He let himself go in his manuscript about Protestants. Personally I think he was quite within his rights, provided he said nothing untrue. But then the Governor was there, and the Governor was a Protestant. The strong passage was not read. Well, of course, that might be just an act of courtesy. We need not always say all we think. If the matter had rested there no harm would have been done. But the Bishop put all the acid in when an official report of the proceedings was published. The Westminster Gazette got hold of the story, and tells us, "Certainly in this case the 'villain of the piece' seems to be the Roman Catholic Bishop."

So there we are. There are repeated assurances of broadmindedness, and now and again a different point of view emerges. The fact is that it is impossible to conceal real convictions all the time, and it is more honest to acknowledge that they exist. When Protestants do this they are classed as "sectarians", "bigots", and all kinds of objectionable creatures. It is inevitable that unthinking people with little grey matter and easy-going beliefs will fall for it and cry out, "Oh! My! how very wicked of those awful stirrers up of strife." But an appeal can still be made to the thoughtful and the consistent, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant. They see that the question must be discussed in a spirit of reasonableness and charity, not concealing anything, but remembering that the freedom we claim for ourselves must be given cheerfully to others. There is nothing illiberal or immoral in sectarianism. It is a name for those who divide on important matters, so that Liberal, Country, Labour and Communist supporters are all members of a political sect. It is amazing to me that Cardinal Gilroy does not see that.

Need for Care.

I recall another minor instance of controversial stupidity. The Bishop of Nice attacked Houtin, a rebel priest, in a daily newspaper. Houtin attacked the Bishop's bad grammar and spelling. The Bishop described the accusations as miserable and only sustainable by attributing to his secretary the blunders of the printer's compositor. Houtin published a facsimile of the letter in the Bishop's own handwriting, and roundly charged him with lying. Well, all this goes to show that faults are not confined to one side and warns us all to be very careful. It is for that reason that I try to give well authenticated instances in support of any position I take up, and frequently invite my listeners to correct me if I am in error. No good is done by mere invective. I regret to say I have noticed lately, shall I say, a certain asperity in the public speeches and published writings of the champions of the Roman Catholic position. I suggest that the calm discussion of facts carries us farther. Let us consider some facts which lead Protestants to think that the system advocated by the Roman Catholic Church is calculated to bring her at times into collision with the State, where Protestants would see no need for any collision. It is admitted that any religious body might find itself unable to accept a State ruling. This being admitted, the case must be narrowed to issues in which there is a difference of judgment between Roman Catholics and Protestants. If the cases are proved, then a reason can be found for the reluctance of Protestants to commit the Government of their country to those who would restrict what they regard as their essential liberties. Of course, it is at once conceded that the opposite point of view should be allowed the fullest right of expression.

Here is the first fact. In France a law existed at the beginning of this century which aimed at tightening up State control. Numbers of religious societies had sprung up which had neglected to secure State authorisation. The law to which I refer was passed in 1901, requiring all such societies to seek recognition or to dissolve. The congregations resented the demand for the most part. The ground which they gave was that they depended on the Pope, not on the government. Feeling ran very high. On both sides there were regrettable actions. A spy of the curia was arrested in Paris and his papers published. The revelations were so distressing that Tyrell wrote, "I have felt the moral badness of Rome and the curia so deeply and acutely these late years that I cannot take active service, as a priest, under such a canaille." The only point that interests Protestants in the present discussion is the point that Religious Orders were allowed to place themselves in opposition to what seemed a reasonable state law. They have noticed in this connection the strong opposition to allowing religious houses to be open to Government inspection even when such houses conduct work such as laundering and lace making. This is a claim to impose a limit on State authority that does not seem justified. The French were admittedly unsympathetic in the last phases of the controversy. But the French Cabinet had been exposed to very unbridled criticism, and the authority of the Pope had been freely invoked, not to say flattered.

Intrigue in the U.S.A.

But we come nearer to conditions resembling Australia when we consider developments in the United States. There there is admitted freedom for all religious beliefs, a freedom that sometimes releases queer freaks. When Archbishop Ireland of America gave utterance to strong American sentiments, his utterances were hailed with delight in many quarters. The phrase, "Americanism", was coined to express this new attitude. But, after a little time, fears came to be expressed that Roman Catholics in the United States had been drawn into blameworthy concessions. Archbishop Ireland's preface to "The Life of Father Hecker" set out the sentiments which in his judgment reconciled the free atmosphere of the United States with the principles of the Roman Catholic Church. Pope Leo XIII thought otherwise. He wrote to Cardinal Gibbons and took the occasion of "reprobating certain new opinions which are contained in, or which some men read into, this book". The Pope maintained that if the doctrines which were supported by Archbishop Ireland were admitted, "It would lead to suppose there are people . . . who dream and hope that the Church may be different in America from what she is in other countries of the world." Americanism died a natural death after that, or perhaps I should say, the Pope strangled it. But the discussion lost Governor Smith the Presidency of the United States. The Governor made a gallant effort, with the assistance of Father Duffy, to prove that his allegiance to the Roman Catholic Church in no way hindered him from being a true son of American Republicanism. But he failed to convince the voters of the United States. All this has been set down to an outbreak of Protestant bigotry, but we are not convinced that this offers a full explanation. One rather disturbing feature emerges. The Roman Catholic supporters of Governor Smith were not able to agree among themselves. Mr. Marshall, a Protestant lawyer, directed Governor Smith's attention to the Syllabus issued by Pius IX, which condemned the propositions that every man is free to embrace and confess the religion which reason seems to point out as true: that the Roman Church has no right to employ physical force: that the Roman Church has no right to exclude other forms of worship. Governor Smith replied, "So little are these matters of the essence of my faith, that I, a devout Catholic, since childhood, never heard of them until I read your letter." A New York paper concluded from this, "They do not bind American Catholics, as is shown by the fact that the Governor never heard of them." But another paper, "America", entered the fray at this stage. It repudiated the attitude of the Governor. Here is what it said: "The statement as it stands is gravely erroneous. A Papal Encyclical invariably demands from Catholics, first, respect, in view of the source from which it emanates, and next, absolute obedience . . . Hence the genuine Catholic at once yields respect and obedience."

Protestants assert that in view of the internal divisions of opinion amongst Roman Catholics as to the extent of Papal control, and in view of the repeated restrictions placed by authority in the expressions of liberal opinions in matters of State, they cannot view with indifference any bid for power made by representatives of a Church that wields so much authority and so often uses it to check progress as they conceive it.

Archdeacon has not broken a law? Is it not a most dangerous precedent that the Governor should intervene in Church matters purely on a matter of private opinion where he has no legal status or legal right to do so? This may be a far-away colony, but surely personal rights of freedom of speech and commonsense should be observed.

Mr. Hopkinson: It is not a question of freedom of speech. (Cries of "Yes it is.") The Governor has had correspondence with the Bishop of Mauritius in the past on the subject of the Archdeacon's activities and there is no doubt that the Governor is entitled to express his own private opinion as to whether the Archdeacon's presence is in the interests of the colony and of the Anglican community, which is greatly divided on this subject.

Mr. J. Griffiths (Lab. Llanelly): The Minister is leaving this in rather an unsatisfactory state. Are we to gather that, because this man has expressed unwelcome or unpopular views, he is to be deprived of opportunity of going back without any opportunity of meeting the charges?

"Stirred UP Trouble."

Mr. Hopkinson: No, sir. The Archdeacon has had an opportunity of having these charges which he has made against individuals investigated in the past through the Governor, and he has also been in correspondence with the Colonial Office. He has stirred up a lot of trouble in a community where there is great delicacy between the different denominations and there is no doubt he has caused great difficulties there.

Mr. Fletcher gave notice that, in view of the grave constitutional issues raised, he would raise the matter again.

The Ven. C. A. Roach has been Archdeacon of the Seychelles since and is in London on leave. He was due to return at the end of this month. Archdeacon Roach had recently alleged religious persecution by leaders of the Roman Catholic Church in the Seychelles and made complaints of the administration of the island and its officials.

In a sermon in St. Paul's Cathedral, he said there was not sufficient religious freedom in the islands. Roman Catholics claimed nearly 90 per cent of the island's total population of 36,000 and there were peculiar difficulties which "those who have not lived in a country where the Roman Catholics are in a majority will scarcely appreciate."

Persecution in Argentina.

"Recently the world has been shocked by the appearance of godless materialism where we should least expect to find it. In the Argentine, a country with a strong and age-long Catholic tradition, the dictator has proved how well he has learned the lesson of his Communist masters."

Most Rev. Dr. Quinn, Bishop of Kilmore, said this at the Shrine of Blessed Oliver Plunket in St. Peter's, Drogheda, when he led a pilgrimage of 2,000 people from his diocese.

"Such terrible persecution as the people of Ireland suffered in the days of Blessed Oliver Plunket may seem very remote to us who live in days of freedom and peace," said his Lordship.

But, he continued, terrible as had been such persecutions in our own and other countries, they had never been carried out with the calculated intensity and diabolic ingenuity which had been witnessed in our own day.

In the past it was in the name of heresy, which, at least acknowledged God and our dependence on Him.

Hatred of God.

Persecution, His Lordship continued, sprang from hatred of God Himself, engineered by men who saw nothing but a materialistic world. Communists would have us live and die as animals. They would not acknowledge man's human destiny or any God-given liberty to pursue it.

Referring to the Argentine, Dr. Quinn said: "A cruel and unjust persecution of the Church is being hypocritically defended in the name of people whose most sacred rights are being trampled on by a clique who would place their own will above the law of God.

"Priests are being arrested and steps are being taken to paganise the schools, while every protest in defence of religion and human rights is represented as an act of disloyalty, and punished as such," said His Lordship.

"We in Ireland cannot but feel the deepest sympathy for our fellow Catholics of Argentina. We feel it our duty not only to offer up our earnest prayers for their relief, but to voice our indignation at the unjust and ruthless tyranny imposed on them."—Irish Press, 6/6/55.

[The protest of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Kilmore against persecution of his co-religionists in Argentina recalls to our mind the sufferings (far worse) of evangelicals in that other American country, Colombia. A condemnation of all religious persecution, whether in Argentina, Spain, Italy, or Colombia, coming from R.C. bishops would do an immense amount of good.]

Irish Emigrants in England. Roman Catholic bishop's views of the situation — Bishop attacks "so-called employment agencies."

"Perhaps the greatest danger to emigrants is situated here in our own country, in the so-called employment agencies in Irish towns and cities, which send young girls of 16 and 17 years of age to work in hotels in England, without any safeguard of attendance at Mass or protection of their virtue," said the Most Rev. Dr. Browne, Bishop of Galway.

Preaching at Solemn High Mass in St. Augustine's Church, Galway, commemorating the centenary of the building of the church, Dr. Browne said that they should not listen to those who preached depression and discouragement about the future of the Irish Catholic people. They had built up the Church in England and Scotland, in the United States and Australia. "Not merely our missionary priests and nuns, but our young men and women who go to England and America, are doing their part in this great work. The vast majority of them are staunchly faithful. They are founding good Catholic homes. They are helping to build Catholic schools and churches in many a parish in England."

"Many Benefits."

"Within the last fortnight I have had an opportunity to meet many of our exiles," said Dr. Browne. "Undoubtedly, there have been difficulties and dangers, but they also have many benefits and advantages. They are in a country that provides good employment and wages, and that gives every inducement and reward to those who are industrious, well-behaved and self-respecting. They find in England less of the craze for pleasure and more respect for hard work than here at home. There dance halls close well before midnight, and public-houses do not carry on illegal trade all night. There is respect and advancement for good workers. In that atmosphere of justice, discipline and industry Irishmen and women can give of their best."

He then made the statement quoted at the outset, and said: "There are evils enough for us to correct here in our own country—to eradicate these employment agencies which exploit the youth and innocence of Irish girls; to close the public-houses which by their illegal night-trade make drunkards of many of our young men; to restore respect for honest work."

"The Vital Force."

"Girls have left employment here in Galway and gone to England because the living conditions were neither safe nor healthy. A true Catholic should make his religion the vital force of his life and daily work. The worker who does not give honest work, the employer who does not give good conditions—these men are not worthy of the name Catholic. Real Catholic faith should make men respect justice and temperance, and hate idleness. It should make us indignant and intolerant of the evils in our midst."

He paid tribute to the Augustinian Fathers, who had built their first church in Galway in 1508: Their 450 years in Galway covered periods of war, persecution, poverty, oppression and contempt—"Irish Times," 29/8/55.

"Papalist Anglicans."

We find among our papers an excerpt we took some years ago from "Irenikon" a Belgian R.C. quarterly published in the interests of the reunion of Christendom. It is from an article by the R.C. Bishop Cowderoy of Southwark. He says that there are 1,400 Papalist Anglicans among the clergy of the Church of England (we have no verification of the number). The group according to the bishop "declares itself devoted to the Holy See, and accepts Roman Catholic instruction including papal infallibility, while remaining attached to the Church of England so as to work for reunion with Rome."

We gather that the bishop did not think the prospects very promising.

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

United Church of Canada.

Membership in the United Church of Canada increased by 26.1 per cent between 1941 and 1951, the board of evangelism and social service reported at the meeting of the executive of general council.

Last year's new members on profession of faith totalled 38,196, compared with 35,012 in 1953 and 33,368 in 1952.

Chile—Awakening Interest in the Bible.

A revival of religious interest in Roman Catholic Chile has resulted in crowded Protestant evangelistic meetings in large halls and open-air stadiums, and in the sale by the Bible Society there of over 4,000 Bibles in one week. These facts were given in an address to the Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society in London by Rev. D. C. Brackenridge, Secretary in Chile to the Society and its American counterpart.

Mr. Brackenridge stated that the circulation of the Scriptures in Chile was free and unimpeded; it was a country of great opportunity. The circulation in 1953 was 176,300 volumes of which 16,908 were complete Bibles and 30,032 were New Testaments. The Scriptures had been sold in 20 tongues, with Spanish taking the lead, followed by English, German, Hebrew, French, Arabic, Greek, Polish, Italian, Rumanian, Portuguese and Serbian.

The following incident is symptomatic of the interest aroused in the Scriptures to-day, according to Mr. Brackenridge. "La Nacion," one of the leading dailies in its regular column, called "Notes from the Big City" ran this story: "Here in the capital—in the heart of Santiago—there is a store which exhibits only copies of the Bible in all sizes, qualities and versions. They are printed in Spanish, English, German, Italian, Portuguese, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Russian, Arabic, Hungarian, Polish, Bohemian, Slovenian, Danish, Dutch, Yiddish, Afrikaans, Japanese and even in Esperanto. There is a special edition for the blind in Braille; curious copies in Mapuche, the language of our Araucanian Indians; others in Aymara and Quechua. The prices vary from 30,500 pesos. This book store is the only one of its kind in the country."

"This unsolicited publicity," said Mr. Brackenridge, "had very happy effects. As a result of the article many people came seeking the Scriptures in various languages which they had thought impossible to get in Santiago, and one day a man bought and carried off 20 Bibles in 20 different languages to distribute among his linguistic friends"—"The Christian Irishman," July 1955.

Former Curate A Convert.

Rev. Walton Hannah, honorary curate of St. Augustine's, Kensington, London, since 1952, announced to-day that he is to be received into the Catholic Church.

In a statement headed "Why I leave the Church of England," he said that he hoped to be received soon.

"Recent events in South India and elsewhere have shown me clearly that the Church of England cannot make any claim to be a branch of the Catholic Church in separation from the divinely-appointed centre of Catholic unity," the statement added.

"The present relationship of Canterbury to South India is but the inevitable sequel to the blessing pronounced by the Lambeth Conference of 1948 upon four of her dioceses leaving the Anglican communion and going into schism to join a new Protestant sect.

"To my certain knowledge there are other Anglican clergy who are taking the step that I am taking, and I doubt not that more will follow."

[This extract from the "Evening Herald" Dublin of 6/9/55 may have attracted a little attention, but, there is no novelty in the "conversion" of a Church of England curate to Rome. It has happened quite often in the last one hundred years. Of course a proportion of these men return, something wiser than before, to the Church of England.

Mr. Hannah is upset over the fact that the Church of England has shared its orders and communicant life with fellow Christians in South India. A Christian ought to rejoice in this, but the tragedy of some men is that their appreciation of the Gospel is inadequate.

We are glad to know that the advance in fellowship between the Churches of England and South India has the support of the "very high" as well as the "moderate" Anglicans.]

World Council of Churches H.Q. and Dr. Wm. Graham — Dr. Graham Meets Church Leaders—Visit to Ecumenical Institute.

Following his visits to Zurich where he addressed a crowd of 40,000 people in the football ground with an overflow audience of 20,000 outside, and to Geneva where he spoke to 30,000 people in the Exhibition Hall, Dr. Billy Graham called on the General Secretary and staff of the World Council of Churches. He was accompanied on this visit by Mr. Jerry Beavan and Mr. Walter Bennett.

Welcoming the evangelist Dr. W. A. Visser't Hooft, the World Council's General Secretary, said how thankful they were that he had come. Evangelism was the most tremendous task of the Church and, said Dr. Visser't Hooft, "We are thankful to God for all the blessing that has come to the churches as a result of what Billy Graham has so far done."

In response, Dr. Graham said that he valued this contact with the World Council. "I am sure," he added, "that in the area of evangelism we can be ecumenical."

Team Work.

While at the Ecumenical Institute, Dr. Graham met various World Council leaders and discussed a number of problems with them. On the question of the relationship between his own ministry and that of the churches, Dr. Graham appealed for team-work between the evangelist and the local church. "The evangelist," he said, "can make some breach in the indifference of people, but the ministers in their congregations must move in afterwards like the infantry in warfare."

Among those who met Dr. Graham on this occasion were Professor Hendrick Kraemer from Holland, Dr. Hans Wolf, the German theologian, Dr. J. R. Nelson, Secretary of the Faith and Order Commission, and Rev. Paul Abrecht of the United States.

Danish Critics of Billy Graham.

According to a report circulated by Reuter, eighteen Danish clergymen of the State Lutheran Church have sharply attacked Dr. Billy Graham, and strongly opposed the holding of a meeting by him in the town of Aarhus, Jutland, to which they belong. They also criticised the local bishop for supporting the meeting. In a statement the clergymen said: "We do not want to judge who is a true Christian and who is not, but there is a definite difference of view between us and Graham as to the meaning of the baptism. Co-operation is only possible if we deliberately omit any mention of the meaning of baptism, and such action would not be honest." The clergy also considered the extensive propaganda preceding the meeting to be "a violation of the nature of the spirit," whatever that may mean. It is evident that these dissentients are not representative of the attitude of the Danish Lutheran clergy as a whole toward Dr. Graham. They may belong to that section of Lutheranism which believes in baptismal regeneration, in which case it is not surprising that they are opposed to the preaching of free grace.

—"The Christian," 1/7/55.

[We think the last sentence of this extract might give you a wrong impression. There is no necessary contradiction between a belief in baptismal regeneration and a belief in Free Grace. So many good orthodox theologians tell us. We have not heard that Dr. Graham expounds what we know as Free Grace, i.e. the doctrines of grace of reformed theology—Ed.]

German Economy as Good as Ever.

Dr. Joseph Meurers, Director of the Institute of Astronomy, Bonn, who attended the Astronomers' Conference in Dublin, lectured on "Germany to-day" to the members of the Catholic Association for International Relations, in the Mansion House.

He told his audience that the German people, by their own efforts, had restored the country's economy to the stage where it was as good as it ever was in the present century. Many miners in the Rhur area had higher incomes than a university professor in his early years of work.

Dr. Adenauer, he said, was the most successful statesman in Germany since Bismark.

The speaker dealt with the composition of the Christian Democratic Party, and pointed to the danger of a break between the Catholic and Protestant elements. The declaration of the Dogma of the Assumption had brought protests from Protestant Bishops and Protestant Church leaders in Germany, which showed that differences were as deep as ever. In spite of tension, however, the unity of the party had remained intact.

The tensions between East and West Germany were not political or economical; they were the fight between Christianity and atheism, and the religious attitudes of Protestants and Catholics from expelled populations had prevented the intellectual break-up of Germany and the advancement of Communism in West Germany.

The Russians were now entering the intellectual sphere of Germany. They published well-written books, based on materialism, and with those they hoped to change the attitude of the German people.

In East Germany the vast majority of the people were not Communists, and because of this the Communist authorities said that time was not ripe for an election. They knew that, in a free election, their majority would be swept away.

Mr. F. W. Ryan proposed a vote of thanks to the speaker, Mr. Dermot O'Flynn seconded the proposal, and Mr. Vincent Grogan, chairman, presided—"Irish Times," 2/9/55.

U.S. Diocese Honors Glorious Heritage of Latimer, Ridley.

At the diocesan convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church held in Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, Ohio, U.S.A., Rev. Robert T. Becker, Rector of Grace Church, Cleveland, presented the following resolution which was adopted by the convention.

"Whereas, Bishop Hugh Latimer and Bishop Nicholas Ridley believed in and died for a Reformed and Protestant Religion, and

"Whereas, the four hundredth anniversary of their deaths falls on Sunday, the sixteenth of October, 1955, and

"Whereas, their courageous deaths have been an inspiration to many members of the Anglican Communion through the succeeding years and should be recalled to the minds of the present generation by suitable public observance,

"Let it be resolved, that this present Convention of the diocese of Ohio does petition the Rt. Rev. Nelson M. Burroughs, Bishop of Ohio, to designate Sunday, the sixteenth of October, 1955, as a Memorial Sunday and to request that suitable services be held throughout his diocese and that, with the consent of the dean, vestry and chapter of Trinity Cathedral, a memorial service be held in the cathedral church at four o'clock in the afternoon on the Sunday, commemorating specifically the martyrdoms of Bishop Nicholas Ridley and Bishop Hugh Latimer, but also including those other great leaders of the Protestant Reformation in England who also suffered the pains of death for their faith."

Steps are being taken to carry out the terms of this resolution and it is hoped that it will be a glorious occasion.

"Surely the Protestant Episcopal Church needs this emphasis," writes Archdeacon Donald Wonders, in the The Churchman, New York, "with all the propaganda for the change of name of the church. This great anniversary will do much for us who love the glory and power of our reformed inheritance."—"The Sentinel", Toronto, July, '55.

Was the Reformation Needed?

Was the Reformation needed? A Roman Catholic historian, Rev. F. H. Funk, Professor of Theology in the University of Tübingen, frankly acknowledges that even the Church of Rome benefitted by the Reformation. He was the author of a standard Manual of Church History in two volumes, published by Kegan, Paul and Co. in England, and issued with the imprimatur of Cardinal Bourne's Vicar-General, 16th May, 1910. On page 271 of volume II, one reads:

"For the West, the greater misfortune was the schism of the sixteenth century, yet, however regrettable, it was not without wholesome results. It has often been questioned whether, had it not occurred, a reform of the Church (Rome) would have been possible. To return a simple negative to this question would indeed be to despair of the church's vitality and Providence. On the other hand, there can be no doubt that the reforms were far too long delayed, and that they were introduced only when the church had been shaken to her foundations and when a large fraction of the world had already abandoned her in disgust. History also shows us that the wholesale apostasy not only preceded, but actually caused the reforms within the church; hence there can be no doubt that the church's improvement is closely bound up with the Protestant Reformation."

Roman Catholic Proselytising.

Against protests by Roman Catholics that Protestants are trying to evangelise "Catholic" countries must now be set a protest by Protestants that the reverse is true in Indonesia. The February 15 issue of the "Evangelisch-Lutherische Kirchenzeitung", official publication of the United Evangelical Lutheran Church of Germany, reports the complaint of the Rhenish Missionary Society that the Rhenish-Westphalian province of the Capuchin Order has taken over a "new mission field" the island of Nias and adjoining territories in Indonesia. The Rhenish Missionary Society of the Lutheran Church began work on Nias in 1865 and to-day claims 160,000 members out of a population of 200,000. The indigenous church of Nias is now independent, but the missionary society sends workers who serve under the native administrators. On nearby Sumatra the same society helped start the Protestant Batak Church, whose 600,000 members constitute the largest of the "young" churches of Asia. The Lutheran Society declares this is not a new mission field and characterises the arrival of the Capuchins as "an incomprehensible usurpation."

Churches and Communism.

The Right Rev. J. S. Moyes, Anglican Bishop of Armidale, said recently:—"The Western world to-day faces the greatest challenge for centuries—the challenge of a faith that threatens the Christian faith and democracy." With this we agree entirely. But why? Have we professed Christian people lived up to our profession, or have we become a lot of plain hypocrites? Have we the goods to sell for Christ, but have sold the Devil's instead? Can we expect the ordinary person to have faith in our religion which tolerates tens of thousands of our people living in sheds, shacks, and worse; hundreds of thousands of people living under primitive conditions without sewerage; tens of thousands of pensioners trying to eke out a living on a mere existence pension; a public, political and commercial life which reeks with rackets; a generation which takes more than it is entitled to and gives far less than it should, etc. etc.? If this is Christianity, then is it any wonder that so many to-day have lost faith in our professed religion? We can find millions of building and rebuilding "beer brothels" where the very lifeblood is sucked out of millions, but we cannot find millions to build homes and essential amenities for the people.

There must be a complete change of heart in our political and public leaders before the ordinary person can be expected to have faith in our way of life.—"Protestant World", Sydney, Aug., '55.

Eight Largest Churches in U.S.A. Show Striking Advance.

How the eight largest Protestant denominations in the United States have advanced is shown briefly by Newsweek as follows:

1—The Methodist Church. Now more than 9 million strong, the Methodists in this merged body numbered 5.5 million 40 years ago. They are not only the largest but the most influential. For example, the 96 Methodist members of Congress outnumber any other faith in that body.

2—The Southern Baptist Convention. With almost 8 million members, one of the fastest-growing churches in the country had only 2.5 million members a generation ago.

3—The National Baptist Convention of the U.S.A., Inc. The 4.5 million members of this Negro body put special emphasis on African missions. Conservative in doctrine, they spring from the old Regular Colored Baptist Church of almost 2 million.

4—The National Baptist Convention of America. Familiarly known as the "unincorporated" branch, this church has almost 3 million supporters. It seceded from the incorporated church (above) in 1916.

5—The Protestant Episcopal Church. Less than 1 million in number a generation ago, Episcopalians now total 2.6 million.

6—The Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (Northern). Now 2.6 million strong—as contrasted with the earlier figure of 1.4 million—this is by far the largest Presbyterian body existing in the United States.

7—The United Lutheran Church in America. The more than 2 million Lutherans in this body have jumped from some 850,000. It is also the most progressive and unity-minded of the Lutheran churches.

8—The Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod. This strict Lutheran body now has more than 2 million members; formerly there were only 950,000. Its ultraconservative tenets and independent views still attract converts.—"The Sentinel," Toronto, April, '55.

Dublin Protestant School Wrecked.

The fact that St. George's (Church of Ireland) School in Lower Sherrard Street was carried on more or less as usual to-day was not thanks to a group of vandals who broke in yesterday evening and reduced two of the six classrooms to a shambles.

The school earlier this morning looked like what one would expect to see after an air raid, with the floors littered with broken glass and splinters of wood—the aftermath of an all-out mission of destruction and one in which the participants need have no fears that they failed to accomplish what they set out to do.

"Smashing" Time.

To judge by the job they hammered on the school the intruders must have had a "smashing" time, and it would appear that they did not spare themselves in using the school hatchet which was found among the rubble this morning.

The Principal of the school told an Evening Mail reporter to-day that everything was in order when she locked up on Friday afternoon for the week-end. The sorry sight the school presented this morning must have come as a shock to her.

All the bulbs, and most of the lamp shades in one of the rooms were completely destroyed, while the piano is in such a state that it can only be used for firewood.

All the keys and chords have been ripped off. An electric clock was smashed and the hands stopped at 6.30. A number of presses were forced open, and a quantity of clothing and other property belonging to the Girls' Brigade was strewn around the place.

Instruments Escaped.

Fortunately one of the few presses which escaped the attention of the vandals housed the instruments belonging to the St. George's Brass Band. The press containing delph was also broken open and quantities of tea leaves sprayed around the rooms. Nearly all the windows were smashed and a brick and stone were found on a floor.

To-day the police were examining the damage but no estimate could be placed on the extent of it. The Principal is of the opinion that the intruders merely broke in for the purpose of wrecking the place as no property appears to have been stolen.

Having its windows broken in is no novelty to this school as it is in the centre of an active ball-playing area, but yesterday's visitation was something new. It is expected that it will be some time before a full assessment of the damage can be made, and the actual work of replacement and repair will take some time. No arrests had been reported up to this afternoon.—"Dublin Evening Mail", 3/10/'55.

[It should be stated that on one or two occasions in recent years we have read in the newspapers that damage has been done to Roman Catholic schools of a like sort.]

"If Luther Came Back!"

Such is the title of an editorial which recently appeared in the official organ of the Roman Church in South Africa. The editor admitted that there were abuses within the Church when Luther raised his famous protest, but now, he contended, all that has been changed and if Luther returned to-day he would find the Roman Church governed by a saintly pope and devout cardinals, with nuns and priests engaged in world-wide missionary activity. Indeed, to quote the Romanist editor, "Luther would see a Church he would not have wanted to reform—united in government, obedience and loving loyalty to the Holy See, One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic for all who are not wilfully blind to see". The article concludes with a statement that the Dutch Reformed attitude to the Roman Church is several centuries out of date and that it is high time that they extended to that Church the hand of Christian friendship.

Now, all that sounds very nice. The only thing wrong with the appeal for the extended hand of friendship is that it is addressed to the wrong quarter. It ought, strictly, to be sent to Cardinal Segura of Seville whose demands for the repression of Protestantism in Spain has led to such intense persecution during the past ten years. Or, it might be addressed to the Romanist hierarchy in Colombia whose pressure on the government of that country has led to the exclusion of all Protestant missionary effort in an area twice the size of France, and whose propaganda has led to the death of at least 50 Protestants and the destruction of as many Protestant Church and School buildings. Finally, there is no reason why it should not be sent to the pope himself with the request that he should issue an encyclical defining religious liberty as an absolute and objective human right to which Protestants are entitled equally with Roman Catholics. We know that such a definition would involve the pope in a major contradiction with the encyclicals of his predecessors and, also, for that matter, with his own previous utterances, and that may not be possible for one whose prestige depends upon the assumption that he never makes an official mistake. But it would indicate that the Roman Church means what it says when it asks for friendship. Until these requirements are met, the Romanist appeal reminds us very much of Russia's request for the co-operation of the West and the establishment of "democracy" in those countries which do not submit to her control. In both cases, a favourable consideration of their appeals depends entirely upon themselves.

—"Protestant Reveille", Capetown, Aug., '55.

Growing Power of Protestantism in the United States.

The Roman Church has been claiming great progress in the United States, but the reliable and influential newspaper, the Newsmark, in a recent article, "Resurgent Protestantism", declared that there had been such an advance in the operations and achievements of the Protestant Churches in making the Christian faith a living reality to the American people, that it could only be described as "a genuine Christian revival". The increase in members was prodigious. Easter Sunday was celebrated in the nation's churches by 90 million persons. There is a steady growth of belief in God in the United States. American church membership since the turn of the century has increased more than twice as fast as the population, and there is renewed vigour in Protestantism, preachers and people uniting to spread the Word of God.

Just thirty years ago, Newsmark states, Protestants were only 27% of the population. Now they are more than 35%. The Roman Catholic Digest in its survey of American religion a little more than a year ago, pointed out that 59% of all Protestants tried to win converts and 43% succeeded. But only 28 out of every 100 Roman Catholics tried and only 17 had any success.

The cheering feature is that there are 35.4 million children in the United States Sunday Schools,

The Saving Work of Christ

It is very easy to lose touch with the true object of the Church and its faith. We are seldom immune from the temptation to uphold Christianity on other grounds than the true one, or to expand its significance so widely that its real purpose is lost sight of. Some people regard Christianity as a safeguard of the "status quo", a means for the maintenance of old conditions, an anti-revolutionary influence. Others consider it to be reactionary; an answer to modern knowledge and outlook. Others again think of it as the noblest and truest basis of social order. It may also figure as the chief element in the formation of European culture, and, for the ecclesiastic, it may be the starting-point of a system of thought, order and organisation which affords him a sphere of activity which is congenial.

But all these are minor considerations. What really matters is the correct primary significance.

* * *

The correct primary significance ought not to be hard to discover for it is constantly emphasised in Holy Scripture, and is, indeed, the theme of the New Testament. It is that Jesus is the Saviour. Saviour is not an ambiguous word—"Deliverer", "Preserver", convey plain meanings to us. To rescue from danger, to preserve from peril, to save from death—all these are universal facts falling within most men's experience. "Saving" means that something is done to rescue, keep, deliver us which we could not do for ourselves, and which needed to be done. Deliverance is not from some inconvenience, fear or danger in our physical or temporal state, but from eternal death. Through, and by the will and power of our Saviour we pass from death unto life.

Let us see how this is set before us in Holy Scripture, where the Incarnation of God the Son, the Eternal Word and Wisdom of God is recorded.

Jesus Christ came on earth to be the Saviour—"Unto you is born in the city of David a Saviour", Luke 2. 11 "The Son of Man is come to save that which was lost", Luke 19. 10. "God sent His Son that the world through Him might be saved", John 3. 17. "Him hath God exalted to be a Saviour", Acts 5. 31. "Christ Jesus came unto the world to save sinners" 1 Tim. 1. 15. "He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him" Heb. 7. 25.

Here we have a Synoptic Gospel, the Fourth Gospel, Peter, Paul, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, setting down for us the good news—typical of the unanimous voice of the Scriptures on the work of Christ.

* * *

We have drawn attention to the essential fact of Saviourhood "something done to deliver us which we could not do for ourselves". How does or rather how did Jesus Christ come to our rescue? How have we been delivered from eternal death? By taking our place, and the consequences (which were not averted because He was in our place)—"He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed" Isaiah 53. 5. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us" Galatians 3. 13. "... that He, by the grace of God should taste death for everyman" Hebrews 9. 28. "Who, His own self bore our sins in His own body on the tree" 1 Peter 2. 24. "Christ hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God" 1 Peter, 3. 18.

Isaiah had foretold the Messiah's substitutionary death "He bore the sin of many" 53. 12. The Epistle to the Hebrews declares "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many" 9. 28. John writes "Ye know that He was manifested to take away our sins" I. 3. 5.

Though less is said about the sorrows than about the sins of humanity (for most of the sorrows are the fruits of sin), yet we are told plainly that our Lord "hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows" Isaiah 53. 4. St Matthew refers to the prophet's words when he writes "Himself took our infirmities, and bore our sicknesses." 8. 17.

* * *

The phrase "The Lamb of God" properly recalls the sacrifice of the Lamb (Exodus 12) whose blood sprinkled upon the door posts of the Israelites' houses in Egypt saved them from the last plague sent upon Egypt (the death of the first-born). The flesh was eaten in preparation for the journey out of the land of slavery, and the memorial feast was to be observed for ever as "the Lord's Passover". As a title of Christ its appropriateness is not in doubt, for His blood was shed for our redemption. "He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter" Isaiah 53. 7. "John seeth Jesus coming and saith 'Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world'" John 1. 29. The old Testament parallel of which we have taken note is recognised by St. Paul when he writes "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us" 1 Cor. 5. 7. St. Peter teaches that we are redeemed "with the precious blood of Christ as of a lamb without blemish" I. 1. 19. In the Revelation of St. John "the Lamb that was slain" is a favourite picture of the Redeemer, and the final scenes of triumph are associated with "the throne of God and of the Lamb".

* * *

The substitutionary death of Christ (also spoken of as a "vicarious" death) is demonstrated by the passages which show us Christ as taking no negative part in redemption, but as being its prime mover and active agent.

He declared it Himself "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" John 15. 13. St. Paul stated His purpose in taking our place—"who gave Himself for our sins that He might deliver us from this present evil world according to the will of God" Gal. 1. 4 He puts it in another way in Ephesians 5. 2. "Christ hath loved us and hath given Himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God".

In the epistle to Titus the same apostle tells us that our Lord "gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" 2. 14. St. John saw in Christ's death "the love of God, because He laid down His life for us", I. 3. 16. In the Revelation John greets his readers with the salutation "Grace be unto you from Jesus Christ who is the faithful Witness, and the prince of the Kings of the earth", and then ascribes to Him the glory—"unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood".

Further, we can draw a conclusion about beneficiaries through Christ's substitutionary sacrifice. He Himself (in John 10. 11), said "I am the good Shepherd: the good Shepherd giveth His life for the sheep. "Also, in the same gospel we have a further symbol of Christ-given by Himself—"Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit". The fruit is no alien, but kin to the seed which bears it.

That He has "purified unto Himself a peculiar people" (not odd people, but "a people for His own possessing") is shown by the song of the redeemed (Revelation 5. 9) "They sung a new song saying 'Thou art worthy to take the book and to open the seals thereof: for Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue and people and nation'."

* * *

Finally, we have conclusive evidence of the unique Saviourhood, and Mediatorship of our Lord—

Isaiah 59. 16. No other Intercessor either available, or possible. The ages were waiting for Him.

Only in believing in Him, in virtue of His sacrifice, is there eternal life. No other made this promise—John 3. 15.

Only He is the true Bread from Heaven: only He therefore is the Bread of Life. Only by being broken could the Bread of heaven give life to men. John 6. 35.

St. Peter declared that Jesus Christ alone has "the words of eternal life". He said of Him also "neither is there salvation in any other"—Acts 4. 12.

"Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ" 1 Cor. 3. 11. Foundation of what? of salvation and eternal life: of the Church which is His Body: of the truth which makes us free."

REVIEW.

"Christendom or Christianity"—Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, New York, 1955. N.P.

This is a typical "Jehovah's Witnesses" pamphlet, now being widely circulated. Like most of the "Witnesses'" publications it has a great air of telling the reader something he did not know before, as well as telling him the new stereo-typed dogmas of the movement. Everybody who has any intelligence is aware that Christendom and Christianity are not the same thing. No Church we ever heard of not even Rome claims that the two are identical. So it is a falsehood to write (page 1) that "Christendom takes pride in thinking that it and Christianity are one and the same thing". Christendom is in fact that part of the globe in which the tradition of Christian thought and institutions provides the basis of culture and ethics. It is neither the faith itself, nor the Church or Churches. The idea expressed by the word "Christendom" is therefore not exclusively a religious one. The Witnesses in their controversial writings, which seem to be the main part of their publications, set up their own definitions of what they controvert, and so can overthrow the figments easily enough.

The point then of the pamphlet appears to be that "Christendom" is the term for all who are not "Witnesses", and "Christianity" is the "Witnesses'" own possession.

Bits of Gospel truth are set out as if they had not been heard before, and the platitudes and common places of most Orthodox Christians are repeated as if they were specially communicated from on high to this sect.

On page 7 we have reference to "the Dark Ages". All ages are "dark ages", and the early mediaeval period, when religion was often at a low level, but by no means dead; when millions of barbarians were slowly being educated to an awareness of religious truth; when doctrinal and practical error was mingled with remarkable insights of truth, is not regarded by historians today with the contempt or indifference formerly shown. For "Witnesses" honest historical estimates must be set aside so that their theories may be plain black and white. The Dark Ages were not completely dark, and the superstitions of the time did not prevent the copying of Scriptures and Christian writings.

On the same page is some nonsense about "the religions of heathenism are being combined with those of Christendom as the recently organised World Parliament of Religions". This is quite purposely misleading.

It is also said that in the World Council of Churches members disagree among themselves what is the real hope of Christians. This too misrepresents the situation. There are different elements in, and aspects of the Christian hope, and the Evanston meeting of the Council gave expression to them.

On page 9 the disunity of Christendom is referred to. It exists, but have not the "Witnesses" done their share in the cause of disunity? They are culpable like all of us.

On page 11 the existence of nations appears to be considered a wrong thing—but God's Word (Rev. 21, 26) recognises the lawfulness of distinct nations. Of the Holy City, New Jerusalem, St. John says "they shall bring the glory and the honour of the nations into it."

Christendom's doctrine of hell (not now to the forefront) is castigated, but ought we not to give heed to Matt. 25, 3-46, or 13, 40-41, or John 5, 29? These are not the words of Christendom but of Christ.

The doctrine of the Holy Trinity is objected to because it is mysterious. It seems to us to be the expression of the nature of the Godhead which alone does justice to the whole range of Bible teaching about God. A mystery is only a mystery to us—why should we understand everything?

II Cor. 6, 14-17 ("... be ye separate...") is quoted—but what sect does not quote these words of St. Paul? We ourselves cannot imagine St. Paul recognising in "Jehovah's Witnesses" "the Church of the Living God, the Pillar and Ground of Truth".

How little history is known, or made use of, is shown by the words on page 13 "the first Protestant system broke away from the Catholic system in rebellion against the totalitarian rule of the Pope". The school-boy judgments are regrettable. The cause of truth is not served by generalisations.

Page 14 has a paragraph which shows little sense, beyond its effort and intention to appeal to prejudice. It alleges that Protestants "held on to many things vital and fundamental to Catholicism". The fact is that the Reformers held on to many things which belonged to old Christianity before Rome began to introduce its peculiar dogmas and ceremonies. Despite the allegations of this pamphlet we did not get Sunday or Christmas or Easter from Rome. It is no more a crime to commemorate our Lord's birth and resurrection than it is to commemorate His death. Even if we want an express command, we are still in no way disobedient, but rather bearing witness to Christian truths.

The Holy Trinity, Immortality, fiery destruction of the World are also questioned, but we get them from God's Word—where else? The distinction of clergy and laity is in the New Testament—it is not sacerdotal but it is there plain to be seen.

The second half of the pamphlet is a series of questions and answers, which are marked by disingenuous assertions—for instance Jesus "was against 'common-law marriage', such as is winked at by religious clergymen in many lands of Christendom". This is such an obscure bit of slander that nothing can be discovered to justify it. Church buildings have pagan origins. It is said to be better to go to a private house—but larger buildings were used, not for badness, but because private houses were too small.

Again, we find the old folly of sneering at education. The "Witness" movement of course emerged from a background of U.S.A. business, not culture. Russell its founder was a salesman, so that education was at a discount. Further, it is not likely that the views of the Witnesses would impress an educated section, for theological study would dispel much of this sect's theorising.

That the bitter abuse heaped upon the clergy and ministers of all denominations by the "Witnesses" needs defence is shown by this pamphlet's attempt to justify it on the smug grounds that as they are so right God has authorised them alone to sit in judgment on everybody else. This is one of Satan's delusions.

Their conceit has become megalomania. They lay claim to inspiration (page 22). We ought to expose their pretensions. That we have been courteous is due to our Christian charity and hope that they might learn to be humble, not arrogant. They do not speak the truth in love, because they show little of either. Rutherford's books are fantastic. He is as anti-clerical as a French atheist. If we ask how sound they are we can be told about Bethsarisim, San Diego, a palace for the future residence among us of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and David, or we can be told of the 144,000 who are the only ones to make up the heavenly church. If that interpretation is right the number has been completed long since, long before Russell or Rutherford.

Much more might be said, but we end with this, all of us are to be witnesses to Jehovah!

COMMENT.

From a letter in a recent number of the "Dublin Evening Mail"—

"'F.D.B.' states that the historic abbeys and churches in possession of the Church of Ireland are a just and lawful heritage. They are, indeed, in the same way that the church of St. Sophia in Constantinople is a just and lawful heritage of the Turks, i.e. by right of conquest.

"We need take only two examples in our midst in Dublin—Christ Church and St. Patrick's, both built by Catholic hands for Catholic worship, and so used for centuries before Protestantism was heard of. These were ruthlessly wrested from their rightful owners by fire and sword, and given over to alien worship. 'H.C.W.'"

Nearly everything in this world changed hands at some point by right of conquest. But the writer of the letter quoted is under several misapprehensions. One, in particular, is in the last paragraph. Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin and St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin were never "ruthlessly wrested from their rightful owners by fire and sword". Anyone can go into Christ Church and read in the porch the names of the ecclesiastics who had charge of the church through many centuries. At a date in the sixteenth century, 12th Dec. 1539 it was decided by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the Archbishop of Dublin, and the Sub-Treasurer of Ireland that Christ Church "having been secular at its foundation, its ministers shall be regarded as secular priests: that it shall have a dean, a precentor, a chancellor, and a treasurer: that Robert Paynswick, the prior shall be dean; that Richard Ball the sub-prior be precentor, that John Morse the Sacrist be treasurer, that Walter Whyte the seneschal be chancellor, that eight regular canons be the vicars choral", etc. Thus the clergy of Christ Church, who had been regular canons of the Arroasian order (Augustinian) with a prior at their head, became a Dean and chapter of secular canons. The same men continued in office, and the life and worship of the church went on. Sometime later the Dean and Chapter complied with directions of the Archbishop to use the services of the Book of Common Prayer. Robert Paynswick is in the list of names in the porch thus—1537 Robert Paynswick, Prior; 1539 Robert Paynswick, Dean.

That Cathedral was originally not in the hands of regular canons, but secular, and in the time of Laurence O'Toole, Archbishop of Dublin (in the twelfth century when the Norman invaders and their ecclesiastics were conquering the soil and Church of Ireland at the Pope's orders) the Arroasian order was introduced to replace the secular clergy.

There is no evidence of fire and sword in Christ Church any more than in St. Patrick's. Talk of this sort is either due to ignorance or malice.

The worship of the reformed Church of Ireland was and is the worship of the Holy and Undivided Trinity—what can be more truly Catholic? It is worship inclusive of a great deal of God's Word, read to His glory—what can be more truly Catholic? It is worship whose praise is largely the Psalms of David, part of God's Word—what can be more truly Catholic? The preaching is the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ—what can be more truly Catholic? The sacraments administered (and as He commanded, i.e. in "both kinds as regards the Holy Communion) are those instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ—what can be more truly Catholic?

Why then call it "alien worship"?

Let us turn to the pages of history to see if "fire and sword" did affect the religious life of Ireland in the sixteenth century. In Philip Wilson's "The Beginnings of Modern Ireland" (1912) we find a chapter describing the Church in Ireland before the Reformation. From it we learn that the old Irish and the Anglo-Irish, lay and clerical, were opposed in conflict as always. Monasteries whose houses were reserved for English monks would not admit Irish ones. Bishops of English race here resisted the bishops of Irish race. Bishops were often belligerent, Cormac Mac Coghlan, bishop of Clonmacnoise, was killed in battle, his archdeacon who was his illegitimate son, and the archdeacon's own illegitimate sons being killed with him. Wm. O'Farrell, "chief captain of his nation" continued to act as chieftain though he was made bishop of Ardagh in 1486. In 1537 the people of Wexford complained that their bishop had allied himself with a freebooter whom he assisted to burn the town of Fethard. Like charges were made against the bishops of Leighlin and Waterford by their fellow-bishops. Edmund Butler, archbishop of Cashel carried on a war against his father, the Earl of Ormond, in the course of which nearly every church in Co. Kilkenny and Tipperary were destroyed. He too supported a pirate on the Waterford coast.

Doran, bishop of Leighlin, who was a good man, was murdered in 1523 by his archdeacon.

The lower clergy were wretched and illiterate.

The Earl of Kildare burnt Cashel Cathedral on the excuse that he believed the Archbishop was inside. In 1488 the Earl of Desmond plundered the See of Ardferd. In 1502 his brother did the same to the See of Cloyne. The O'Neills of the North frequently attacked the Cathedral of Armagh, and the O'Donnells of Donegal plundered the See of Raphoe. As a consequence Cathedrals were everywhere in ruins. In 1517 reports were made of Ardagh and Clonmacnoise Cathedrals as ruined and almost abandoned.

It was noted in 1561 that the archbishop of Tuam had regained his Cathedral which for three hundred years had been used as a barracks.

The tale of ruin extended to the parish Churches which were misused and neglected. The native Irish of the sixteenth century were not as devout as modern Irish Roman Catholics imagine. They were the experts in the use of fire and sword in the sixteenth century. Destructiveness in Ireland or in Scotland ought not to be regarded as an occupational infirmity of Protestants. Fire and sword had been active in the hands of "the faithful" in Ireland before the reformation was heard of.

PROTESTANT WITNESS— THE PERSECUTED WALDENSIAN CHURCH.

By Winifred M. Pearce
(in "The Christian")

Far too little is known of the heroic stand for freedom of conscience that from the 12th century has been maintained by Waldensian Christians. They have been marked by evangelistic fervour from those early days when itinerant preachers were sent two by two, and, disguised as pedlars, went from place to place selling their wares and speaking about the Bible, large portions of which they had committed to memory.

This humble and unobtrusive witness among the villages of the Cottian Alps for a while escaped the eye of Rome, but when men and women began to turn from myths and fables to the Saviour they obscured, the hierarchy of the Papal system became alarmed and took drastic action.

The first serious massacre occurred in the Valley of Pragelato on Christmas Eve, 1386, when armed troops were sent against these defenceless people, and from then on, for almost half a millenium, the Waldenses were the victims of a policy of extermination. It was a period of unutterable suffering during which the soil of Italy was drenched with the blood of martyrs. In 1848 the Edict of Emancipation gave them civil and political rights, but they have never known complete freedom from suspicion and restrictive measures.

Coveted Fellowship

The English Committee in aid of the funds of the Waldensian Church Missions is a real source of encouragement to these sturdy Protestants, not only by reason of the financial assistance it raises, but also, and indeed mainly, because it is a token of the fellowship of other Christians whose prayerful sympathy means so much.

In order to foster and widen interest in this country it is the custom of the Committee annually to invite a delegate to visit Britain and address meetings on behalf of the Waldensian Church. This year the chosen representative was Rev. Aldo Sbaifi, of Genoa.

It was the writer's privilege to interview Pastor Sbaifi during his brief visit to London, and to gain from him a picture of the situation in Italy to-day as it affects evangelical witness. Hindrances are encountered because the provisions regarding religious liberty are not applied according to the Constitution. While services in churches or hired halls are not interfered with, open-air preaching, tract and leaflet distribution in the streets and meetings in houses are forbidden. Permission to build a church has to be gained, and although according to law it cannot be withheld, it is often long delayed.

Tricky Interpretations

In view of the frustrations experienced, the Federal Council of Evangelical Churches issued in February this year a memorandum on the problem of religious liberty in Italy. In it they asked for the application of the principles of religious liberty as established by law, by the abandonment "for ever of those exasperatingly tricky interpretations" and the solving of this serious problem "in full compliance with the regulations and the spirit of the Republican Constitution". They await the result.

Recognizing that the Christian Church can build up and maintain its spiritual life only on the Word of God, the Synod last autumn passed an important resolution to the effect that pastors should urge their congregations to return to the Bible. They were asked to impress upon their people the vital importance of regular Bible reading, to establish Bible classes and in every way to make the Bible the centre of their work. As a result many pastors have prepared a system of daily Bible readings for the use of their congregations.

Despite the difficulties with which it has to contend, the Waldensian Church is actively seeking to spread the Gospel, and is finding that wherever it is proclaimed it is "the power of God unto salvation". Into three soils mainly it is sowing the Word of God, and is gathering fruit from each. The first is superstition arising from ignorance of the Bible, a condition the Roman Church seeks ever to preserve. Sicily has been one of its strongholds and is known as "the country of miracles". A Waldensian community was first established there in 1861, but under severe persecution the Protestants became discouraged and settled elsewhere. Since then the Gospel has taken root all over the island, which now has a number of Waldensian churches. Recently a revival movement started on the west side of Sicily, where Christians meet for worship in a hired store. As a result of their witness many have been won from Romanism, and they have asked for a Waldensian pastor to be sent to superintend the growing work.

Spiritual Bondage

The second soil is the absolute allegiance to the Church of Rome that is demanded of all its adherents. Deep conviction and strength of will must be exercised in order to break free from the spiritual and mental bondage, yet this is happening, even among priests. During the one year in which Pastor Sbaffi had the oversight of the church in Turin he received into membership three ex-priests, an ex-monk and an ex-seminarist.

At the present time there are movements that are merely anti-Roman Catholic, and much wisdom is needed in dealing with those who imagine that to leave the Church of Rome is to become a Protestant. To the Waldensian Church, which is a despised religious minority, this presents the temptation to increase its numerical strength, which however, it is stoutly resisting.

Not long since Pastor Sbaffi was called to a village where he was faced with some 400 people who said they wanted to become Protestants. Inquiring as to the reason for this radical change he discovered that it was only a ruse to force the Roman Catholic bishop to reinstate a priest against whose removal they had protested. The pastor used the opportunity to tell them that they could only become Protestants by conversion to Jesus Christ, and some have since shown their desire to know more by attending his church.

The third soil is Communism. Those who follow this ideology have as their only pre-occupation the creation of paradise on earth, and they too are responding to the Gospel. Young people frequently ask, "Why do you not fight for social justice?" To which Pastor Sbaffi replies that he has discovered in the Gospel that it is man who needs to be changed, and only Christ can do that.

In her stand for the truth the Waldensian Church covets the prayers of her brothers and sisters in Christ, not that she may have an easier path, but that she may remain faithful to the Word of God and continue to see souls born into the Kingdom of Christ.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 125

and almost 33 millions are Protestants.

A prominent Roman Catholic thinks that Romanists have damaged their cause "by needlessly rubbing non-Roman Catholics the wrong way".

The re-birth of faith in all the Protestant Churches was aided largely by the influence of Reinhold Mebühr, Vice-President of Union Theological Seminary in New York, who urged Americans "to return to justification by faith, to get back to theology and the Apostles Creed".

There has been a definite return to the preaching and teaching in pulpits and counsel rooms of the Church of the necessity of faith and belief in the Gospel of Christ as the great need of human hearts. The powerful words of the Apostle Paul head the articles in Newsweek:

"For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith, as it is written, The just shall live by faith"

(Romans I. 16-17).

These words led Martin Luther into the light. They were the bedrock of the Reformation. May they kindle living faith to-day in Britain, America and throughout the world.

"Now none but Christ can satisfy,

None other Name for me."

R.C. Churches "Not Only Foe of Reds."

The Roman Catholic Church was not the only opponent of Communism, the Rev. Dr Cumming Thom said.

He was addressing the Presbyterian General Assembly.

The Assembly elected Dr. Thom, Moderator for 1955-56.

Dr. Thom said the Presbyterian Church "regarded with dismay and anxiety recent events affecting one of our major political parties."

He said he had recently witnessed a scene in the Federal Parliament which he hoped would never be repeated.

"Behind the bitterness, spleen and personal rancor one sensed the tremendous influence in politics and in the industrial world, of the Roman Catholic Church through its camouflaged instruments and agents," he said.

"A Minority."

"Speaking for the Presbyterian Church as a whole, we stand solidly behind our Anglican and Methodist friends who have recently expressed their views about this.

"It seems necessary to remind our Roman Catholic friends that this is a Protestant country and they are a minority.

"They are not the only opponents of Communism.

"We do not follow them as auxiliaries in the fight against Communism.

"We shall adopt our own methods against Communism—and apply them in our own way.

"It is only in Roman Catholic countries that Communism is growing.

"Real Battle."

"The real battle against Communism has been fought in Korea and is being fought chiefly in Malaya by Protestant troops from Protestant countries—by America, Britain and her Dominions.

"It is also necessary to state here that our people are very weary of being governed by those we believe are under an outside influence.

"We object to the passing of oppressive legislation such as the Compulsory Unionism Act and many of us desire that it be repealed at the earliest opportunity."—(Daily Telegraph), Australia. "The Protestant World" Sydney, Aug., 1955.

Centenary of Protestant Christianity in Colombia, South America.

Following is a translation of a communication from the President of the Evangelical Confederation of Colombia, the Rev. Francisco Ordáñez.

"Next year, 1956, will mark the 100th anniversary of the arrival in Colombia of the Rev. Henry B. Pratt, a Protestant missionary. Mr. Pratt began the work of evangelization in Colombia at a time shortly after the country had achieved its independence from Spain. He was one of the outstanding personalities in the history of Protestantism in Hispanic America. He was not only a missionary pioneer, but also an important writer. He promoted the translation of the Versión Moderna of the Bible and wrote various commentaries on the Old Testament.

The Evangelical Confederation of Colombia is preparing a celebration of the anniversary of Mr. Pratt's arrival and has planned a programme of activities which will unfold during the whole of 1956.

Special emphasis will be given to evangelism. At the same time, the Confederation will publish information on the advance of the Protestant Churches against fanaticism, indifference, and systematic persecution.

During the year there will be evangelical campaigns, not only from the pulpits, but also by personal contacts, and religious literature. We deeply regret that we cannot use radio. That means of communication has been denied us since 1953.

We will celebrate three large meetings: one in Barranquilla, on the Caribbean coast; one in Cali, centre of the famous Valley of Cauca, and another in Bogotá, the capital city. The last of these will be designated as the first Protestant Congress of Colombia.

We are inviting outstanding speakers from Latin America and hope to reach multitudes of Colombians with the gospel. We will have the co-operation of youth groups, the various church denominations, musical organizations, and a chorus composed of choirs from many churches.

One of the goals for the Centennial is the distribution of 20,000 copies of the New Testament in a special binding to commemorate the event. A book on the history of Protestant work in Colombia is being published which will indicate the immense difficulties which the Protestant movement has faced in this country, as well as its victories and successes.

We ask our brethren in other countries to continue to pray for the Church in Colombia and especially for the plans which are being made for the Centennial. We want to show the world that our Churches are emerging triumphant from the trial of fire to which they have been subjected to for the last seven years of persecution and that God is accompanying us and leading us on to greater conquests in the future."—"The Churchman's Magazine, London, Sept., '55.

PASSING EVENTS.

Match Against Yugoslavs On — Protests in Dublin.

The Football Association of Ireland has rejected representations by the Department of Justice and by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, Dr. McQuaid, asking it to reconsider its decision to play an international football match against a Yugoslavian team in Dublin on Wednesday. Roman Catholic societies in Dublin have also protested against the match. At a special meeting in Dublin on Saturday night the council of the association voted to go ahead with the game; the only vote against was that of the representative of the Irish Army Athletic Association.

It is announced that the President of Ireland, Mr. Sean O'Kelly, will now not attend the match; the Army No. 1 band will not play at the game, although it is understood that the music for the Yugoslav anthem had been flown to Dublin to enable the band to practise it; and Mr. Philip Greene, sports officer of Radio Eireann, states that, in view of the opinion expressed by the Archbishop, he will not be available to give the broadcast commentary.

When the Council of the F.A.I. met on Saturday night the members were informed by the secretary, Mr. J. F. Wickham, that the Department of Justice had informed him that permits were required to bring the visiting team and officials into Ireland, and he had been asked for a full list of all those arriving. The association had been asked to guarantee expenses in the event of repatriation being necessary if any member of the party remained on in Ireland.

Mr. Wickham also said he had received a telephone call from a representative of the Archbishop saying that he hoped the match would be cancelled. The representative asked him whether it was not bad policy to bring to Ireland representatives of a country which had persecuted Cardinal Stepinac.

The chairman of the council, Mr. S. R. Prole, said that they regarded the matter as a sporting affair between two countries. If the match was cancelled's Ireland's position might be jeopardised in regard to future international football.

The vote was then taken, and when the council assembled later Mr. Wickham said he had been in touch with Mr. T. J. Coyne, Secretary of the Department of Justice, who had said that, as the arrangements for the game had been completed, instructions would be given for visas to be issued for the party to travel to Dublin.—“Manchester Guardian”, 17/10/'55.

Clergyman Becomes a Roman Catholic.

The Rev. Hugh Ross Williamson, of the Church of England, was yesterday received into

AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER

Usher's Study of "The Religion Anciently Professed by the British and Irish."

As we have seen, James Usher was constantly engaged in the defence of the reformed religion. He was too good a scholar, and too wise a thinker to imagine that you can settle all controversy by hurling a few texts of Holy Scripture at your opponents. He venerated the tradition of the ancient Christian Church as to the right meaning of Holy Scripture, and had a clear understanding of the divergence from that tradition which in his day (and in ours) marked the course of Roman Catholicism. Incidentally, he held that the description "Roman Catholic" was best appropriated to the system created by the Council of Trent. He saw that that Council replaced the mediaeval heritage (in which reformed churches could share what was true and good) with the new sectarian spirit of dogmatism. He may very well have used John Evelyn's phrase "the new Trent religion," for the innovations of that great Council were imposed by an authority which was no longer genuinely Catholic.

Being a life-long student of Christian antiquity as well as a convinced upholder of the Reformation (as every true Anglican must be), it became Usher's task to show that the Reformation was not the time of repudiation of the Christian past, but rather the time of recovery of the precious truths held by our ancestors in these islands. He undertook to explore the Christian literature of the old Irish and British churches during the five centuries following upon St. Patrick's mission, and so produced the famous work (1st ed. 1622; 2nd enlarged 1631) "The Religion Anciently Professed by the British and Irish".

* * *

During the labours involved in this enterprise Usher (then Bishop of Meath) obtained the wonderful illuminated manuscript "The Book of Kells". He also obtained a number of mss of great interest and value which are in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin. Among them is the "Codex Usserianus," a sixth century ms. of the Gospels in the Irish form of the old Latin. Some of his collections are in the Library of the Royal Irish Academy. Irish learning therefore is under much obligation to him for preserving documents which otherwise would have been lost.

The motive of "The Religion Anciently Professed" is set out at the beginning—"If unto the authorities drawn out of Scriptures and Fathers, which are common to us with others, a true discovery were added of that religion which anciently was professed in this Kingdom, it might prove a special motive to induce my poor countrymen to consider a little better of the old and true way from whence they have hitherto been misled."

Usher adds to this the conviction he had reached—"As far as I can collect by such records of the former ages as have come unto my hands, either manuscript or printed; the religion professed by the ancient bishops, priests, monks and other Christians in this land was for substance the very same with that which now by public authority is maintained therein against the foreign doctrine brought in thither in later times by the Bishop of Rome's followers."

About a hundred ancient writers are quoted, and generally the bishop's fine scholarship detects false dating and false attributions of authorship. We are aware of very few points where it seems to us that he was a little inaccurate. He quotes extensively from the commentator Sedulius, but appears to place him rather earlier than is right; but more than one man bore the name Sedulius, and if Usher is not correct it is very pardonable, and in no way affects his deductions.

The book is a series of short chapters, each treating of a major controversial issue, and proving from the old writers that their views are not those of modern Roman Catholics, but rather agree with the reformers.

Chapter 1 On Holy Scripture—Usher quotes Sedulius (the commentator who lived in the ninth century, for Sedulius the poet was a fifth century man, and Sedulius the Scotie bishop was not a writer). He was known as Scotus, and for a time was a "Peregrinus" in Liège. He gives us his behest "Search the law in which the will of God is contained". He quotes Claudius (Comm. in Matt.) "Men err because they know not the scriptures, and consequently they know not Christ who is the power and the wisdom of God". This Claudius is likely to have been the ninth century bishop of Turin who was a Spaniard, not an Irishman. The Dictionary of Christian Biography (Smith and Wace) names an obscure Irish Claudius, not the Spaniard who was a zealous commentator, and disciple of St. Augustine (see N. D. Emerson "Claudius of Turin", Evangelical Quarterly, vol. 10. 1938, Edinburgh). Still, Claudius was evidence of a widespread devotion to the Bible in a period which we have now learned not to call "The Dark Ages". Usher quotes from Claudius of Turin on Galatians also (Migne, Patrologia Latina, 104).

Venerable Bede is quoted to the effect that "the successors of Colombkill ('the great saint of our country') observed only those words of piety and chastity which they could learn in the prophetic, evangelical and apostolical writings".

"When we read in the same Bede of Furseus, and in another ancient author of Kilianus that from the time of their very childhood they had a care to learn the holy Scripture; it may easily be collected that in those days it was not thought a thing unfit that even children should give themselves unto the study of the Bible." "As for the edition of the Scriptures used in these parts at those times, the Latin was so received into common use among the learned that the principal authority was still reserved for the original fountains. Therefore doth Sedulius command unto us 'the Hebrew verity', for so with St. Jerome doth he style it, and in the new corrects oftentimes 'the vulgar Latin' according to the truth of the Greek copies." "In the old Testament I observe that our writers more usually follow the Septuagint (Greek tr. of O.T.) than the Vulgar Latin now received in the Church of Rome."

He also shows that our writers down to the eleventh century recognised the difference between history as recorded in the Canonical books of the O.T. and, "history" as told in the Apocryphal books.

The second chapter has the elaborate title "On Predestination, Grace, Freewill, Faith, Works, Justification, Sanctification". Obviously all these subjects hold together. Usher says that the doctrine our learned men observed out of the Scriptures and approved Fathers was "that God by His immoveable counsel ordained some of His creatures to praise Him and live blessedly from Him and in Him and by Him, namely by His eternal predestination, His free callings, and His grace which are due to none" (i.e. are unmerited). "Grace only maketh distinction between redeemed and lost". St. Gall.

He shows further that Sedulius and Claudius teach that sins are forgiven without the merit of our works. Not our righteousness or learning. "Faith procuring the remission of sins by grace maketh all believers the children of Abraham". "Thus", says he, "did two of our most famous divines deliver the doctrine of free-will and grace, faith and works, the law and the gospel, justification and adoption, no less agreeably to the faith which is at this day professed in the reformed churches than to that which they themselves received from the more ancient doctors whom they did follow therein."

"Touching the imperfection of our sanctification in this life, these men held the same that we do, that the law cannot be fulfilled, that there is none that doeth perfect and entire good, that God's elect shall be perfectly holy in the life to come"—"whatsoever men have from God is grace because they have nothing of due" Sedulius.

Chapter 3 This treats of Purgatory and Prayer for the dead.

Usher writes of St. Patrick's Purgatory, the famous place of pilgrimage and penitence in Co. Donegal. In the late Middle Ages it was discountenanced by the Popes, but continued to be frequented, as it is till this day. He says he found no reference to it "before Henry of Saltrey in the time of King Stephen". He says that in a book "ascribed to St. Patrick"—

"De Tribus Habitaculis"—only heaven and hell are mentioned. The three habitations are heaven, this world, and hell. He quotes testimonies to the absence of purgatorial teaching. He criticises Cardinal Bellarmine who alleged that a vision of Furseus "what he saw concerning the pains of purgatory" was a proof of the existence of purgatory, and says that visions are an ill foundation for doctrine, and that Furseus can be otherwise explained. Later visions are irrelevant to the period under discussion.

"The prayers and oblations for the dead mentioned in ancient writers are expressly noted to have been made for them whose souls were supposed at the same instant to have rested in bliss".

"It appeareth that an honourable commemoration of the dead was intended, and a sacrifice of thanksgiving for their salvation, rather than of propitiation for their sins". This is Usher's explanation of the Eucharist ordered by Columba to be observed at the death of Brendan—neither the commemoration, nor the praying for the dead nor the requiem masses of that age have any necessary relation to the belief of purgatory." "In those elder days it was a usual thing to make prayers and oblations for the rest of those souls which were not doubted to have been in glory."

* * *

The fourth, chapter — Worship, Liturgy, Sacrament. Sedulius gives the general rule "to adore any other besides Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost is the crime of impiety." Both he and Claudius reprove the heathen in the matter of images. "The Liturgy or public service of God which St. Patrick brought into this country he received, it is said, from Germanus and Lupus, and that it originally descended from St. Mark. "But whatever Liturgy was used here at first, in succeeding ages, no one general form of divine service was retained until the Roman use was brought in at last by Gillebert, Malachy, and Christian who were the Pope's legates about five hundred years ago." (i.e. in the twelfth century. The men were the bishops of Limerick, Down, and Lismore).

Gillebert wanted uniformity, and called the various liturgies used here "schismatical". Malachy established in all his churches the customs of Rome. That the British Christians when Augustine the monk came from Rome (sent by Pope Gregory the Great) had a different way of administering Baptism is shown by Augustine's request that "they should perform the ministry of Baptism according to the custom of the Church of Rome".

* * *

"The public Liturgy or service was of old named the Mass even then also when prayers only were said without the celebration of the Holy Communion. So the last Mass that St. Columba was present at is called by Adamnan (his biographer) "Vespertinalis Dominicæ Noctis Missa", i.e. Evening Prayer. But the name Mass was specially applied to the Lord's Supper. The word "Sacrifice" was also used of the Lord's Supper. The service is first presented unto God as thanksgiving (Eucharist), and then communicated to the use of God's people, in the performance of which part of the service the minister was said to give, and the communicant to receive "the sacrifice". They did not distinguish the sacrifice from the sacrament as the Romanists do nowadays, but used the name sacrifice indifferently both of that which was offered to God and of that which was given to and received by the communicant, whereby it doth appear that the sacrifice of the elder times was like not unto the new Mass of the Romanists wherein the priest alone doth all, but unto our Communion, when others also have free liberty given unto them to eat of the altar as well as they that serve the altar."

"Our ancestors received the Eucharist in both kinds not being so acute as to discern betwixt the things that belonged to the integrity of the sacrifice and of the sacrament because in truth they took the one to be the other." (This is a propos of the Roman theory that bread and wine are offered for the sacrifice of the Mass to preserve the sacrifice's integrity; but that when that is done, it is enough to give only the wafer to the people. The principal object has already been attended to).

From Venerable Bede, Usher quotes instances of administration in both kinds; others he refers to are in the "Life of St. Fursey; and the "Life of St. Bridget". He then says that references to receiving the body and blood of Christ may be claimed for the dogma of transubstantiation, "I answer that as Christ Himself said 'this is My body, this is My blood', he deserveth not the name of Christian that will question the truth of that saying, or refuse to speak in that language which he hath heard his Lord use before him. In what sense must these things be conceived to be His body and blood? First, the demonstrative 'this' can refer to no other substance than that which He then held in His hands, bread and wine. Secondly, the predicate makes mention of Christ's body broken and his blood shed, to show that His body is to be considered not as it was born, but as it was crucified. If Christ's body be presented as broken and lifeless, and blood as shed, and it be most certain that there are no such things now really existent anywhere, as is confessed on all hands, then it must follow necessarily that the bread and wine are not converted into those things really. It is 'in sacrament and mystery'." Sedulius Coelius (i.e. the author of the Carmen Paschale) is quoted as saying that the things offered in the Christian sacrifice are "the fruit of the corn and of the vine". Claudius held that the sacrament is in its own nature bread and wine, but is the body and blood of Christ by mystical relation.

Chapter 5 Confession and Penance.

St. Bernard says that Malachy, bishop of Down (11th century. He had been bishop at Armagh) "did de novo institute in Ireland the most wholesome use of Confession, Confirmation, and the contract of marriage, all which the Irish before were either ignorant of or did neglect". Usher states that the attitude of the old Irish (and British) was upon special occasions to make confessions of their faults publicly and privately that they might receive counsel and the benefit of the keys. Fiachna confessed his sins before Columba and all who were present, and Columba is said to have answered "be comforted; thy sins are forgiven because a contrite and humble heart God doth not despise".

"The penitent after confession was commonly told to wipe away his sins by meet fruits of repentance, for penances were exacted as testimonies of the sincerity of the inward repentance necessarily required for obtaining remission of sins, and so had reference to the taking away of the guilt; and not of the temporal punishment remaining after the forgiveness of the guilt which is the new found use of penances invented by our later Romanists. The penance should first be performed, and when long and good proof had been given of repentance they wished the priest to impart the benefit of absolution. Whereas by the new device of sacramental penance the matter is far more easily transacted. By virtue of the keys the sinner is instantly of attrite made contrite, and as soon as he hath made his confession he receiveth his absolution. After this some sorry penance is imposed. We accord with Claudius that the pastors of God's church do remit sins ministerially so that the privilege of forgiving sins properly and absolutely be still reserved to God alone."

(Chapter 6 treats of monkish discipline).

Chapter 7 The Catholic Church.

"Concerning the Catholic Church our doctors taught with St. Gregory that God 'hath a vineyard, the universal church, which is just Abel until the last of the elect that shall be born', that 'the congregation of the just is called the kingdom of heaven which is the church of the just', that 'the sons of the church are all such as have attained to be just and holy'. "These and similar views are quoted from Sedulius and Claudius. Yet in the Church are mingled evil with good. Claudius said that in this church neither the bad can be without the good, nor the good without the bad whom the Church doth both now receive indifferently, and separate afterwards at their going from thence.

As to later miracles, Claudius said that they were no argument to prove the holiness of them that be the instruments thereof—for the Lord said "many shall say to Me in that day 'have we not in Thy name done many miracles?'".

On the great point touching "the Head and Foundation of the Church"—Sedulius says the title "foundation" is attributed both to Christ and to the Apostles and Prophets—"by stone or rock Christ is signified".

Claudius teaches that the words "upon this rock I will build My Church" mean "upon the Lord and Saviour who granted unto His faithful lover and confessor the participation in His own name, that from 'petra' a rock he should be called 'Peter'". The same Claudius acknowledges that St. Peter received a kind of primacy for the founding of the Church in respect of which he calls him "the prince" of the apostles, and adds that St. Paul was chosen in the same way to have the primacy in founding the Church of the Gentiles. However the power of loosing and binding might seem to be given by the Lord to Peter alone, yet it is given to the rest of the apostles as Himself doth witness who breathed on them and said "Receive the Holy Ghost".

* * *

The eighth chapter is on Papal Jurisdiction.

Usher says that no Irish saint was canonised at Rome till Malachy and Lawrence (i.e. till the Church of Ireland was subjected to papal authority in the twelfth century). No Irish archbishop sought a "pallium" (papal emblem of archiepiscopal office) from Rome till Malachy's day (there was no archiepiscopal rank in Ireland before that time as W. E. Kenny clearly shows in his edition of Archbishop Talbot's "Primatus Dubliniensis", 1047). The Annals of Mailros say "in the year 1151 Pope Eugenius did by his legate transmit four palls into Ireland whither a pall had never been brought before".

Usher produces plenty of evidence of the independent activity of the Churches in Celtic lands. Only Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick had bishops subject to Canterbury (these were Danish towns and their bishops had no jurisdiction outside the walls).

* * *

Facing the statement that St. Patrick authorised an appeal to Rome in disputes, Usher explains that Patrick had a special regard unto the Church of Rome, so "if I myself had lived in his days, for the solution of a doubtful question I should as willingly have listened to the judgment of the Church of Rome as to the determination of any church in the whole world . . . but that St. Patrick was of opinion that the Church of Rome was sure ever afterwards to continue in that good estate, and that there was a perpetual privilege annexed unto that see, that it should never err in judgment, or that the Pope's sentences were always to be held as infallible oracles, that will I never believe."

(Chapter 9 is about the old controversy over the date of Easter—not unimportant as a sign of Celtic church independence, though in itself of little moment).

* * *

Chapter 10 discusses the opposition between the Roman party and the British and Scottish, and how the doctors of the Irish and Scottish side have been accounted most eminent men in the Catholic Church notwithstanding their dissent from Rome. Usher names some of them—Aidan, Finan, Colman, Cedd, Cellach, etc.

* * *

The last chapter is on the Pope's temporal power.

"Before Henry II's time not one footstep doth appear in all antiquity of any claim that the bishop of Rome should make to the dominion of Ireland". Polydore Vergil in the time of Henry VIII invented the story of the cession of Ireland to Rome in St. Patrick's time.

John of Salisbury relates that at his request the Pope (Adrian IV) granted Ireland to Henry II "for all islands of ancient right are said to belong to the Church of Rome by the donation of Constantine." Pope Alexander III confirmed the bull of Pope Adrian IV, "we ratify and confirm his grant concerning the dominion of the Kingdom of Ireland conferred on you; reserving to St. Peter and the Church of Rome the yearly pension of one penny out of every house."

* * *

Bishop Usher ends his book with the following address to his readers—"we are to build our conclusion on the main bulk of the substantial points of doctrine controverted among us to-day. Therefore the adversary must not say 'such a man held such a point with us, therefore he was a Protestant', nor will I allow him to frame the like—'such a man was a monk or in such and such particular agreeeth with the now church of Rome, therefore he was a Papist'."

EDITOR'S CHAIR

"THE WORD WAS MADE FLESH"

The Messiah was long expected by Israel, but when He came "His own received Him not". Pity and sorrow may still fill our hearts as we think of God's ancient people condemning themselves to agelong frustration with a creed which was only valid until Christ came: a creed which existed as a preparation for the coming of the Messiah; but was never final in the sense in which the Gospel is God's final word to humanity.

Christians are apt to leave Judaism alone, and to disregard it. Yet it is plain from Holy Scripture that Israel ought to have recognised, acclaimed, and surrendered to Jesus the Christ. Every proof possible was given to His people by Our Lord in the days of His flesh. The prophecies of His birth were constantly before them. The Greek Translation of the Old Testament (with which most of them were familiar) had given definition to the prediction of His birth, and its correctness was confirmed by the event, so that the Holy Spirit said through Matthew "Behold a virgin shall be with child and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call His name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is 'God with us'." Thus the right significance of the prophet Isaiah's words is established. The place of Israel in God's purpose is not realised by Christians when they assume that the rejection of the Messiah nearly two thousand years ago is irrevocable. Israel may yet acknowledge Him who fulfils the title given at His birth and at His death "the King of the Jews" (Matt. 2. 2, and Matt. 27. 37). It ought to be the Christian's constant practice to imitate St. Paul "Brethren my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is that they might be saved" (Rom. 10. 1).

* * *

If one proof of Messiahship is given by the wonderful birth of Our Lord in fulfilment of mysterious prophecies, another proof is given by His own invitation to consider His works and the explanation of them. When John the Baptist from his prison sent two of his followers to ask Jesus if He really were the expected Christ, Jesus said to them "Go and show John those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them" (Matt. 11. 5).

These mighty works had not left the general populace unmoved, for we read "great multitudes came unto Him, having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed and many others, and cast them down at Jesus' feet; and He healed them: insomuch that the multitude wondered, when they saw the dumb to speak, the maimed to be whole, the lame to walk, and the blind to see; and they glorified the God of Israel". (Matt. 15. 30).

Those healings were deliberately referred to by Our Lord as proofs of His divine mission. We know that He sometimes sought to suppress the testimony of miracle; no doubt because He wanted men to be taught by His words, and to follow Him by spiritual conviction. But when it was called for He did emphasise the significance of His overruling the forces of nature. It might be said that in His answer to John's disciples He spoke only of His healings, not of wider powers over the "laws" of nature. It seems that at the period in His ministry referred to, the healings were the most widely known actions, and the ones with permanent effect, so that they could be critically examined. If it be said that others since then (and in our own day) have exercised healing powers, we may readily answer that "all healing is from Him". Also that His work was not on the emotional level only; and that by Him "the dead are raised up". Healing was one proof that Jesus is the Messiah. If healing occurs to-day it is no proof that the agent is Messiah, but if genuine, it is proof that the power derives from Him, and so is a new demonstration of His claim.

* * *

John the Evangelist said truly of the Word made Flesh "we beheld His glory". The first proof of glory is the truth of it. The angel of the Annunciation said to the Virgin Mary "Behold thou shalt conceive in the womb and shall bring forth a son and shalt call His name Jesus" (Luke 1. 31). In the fulness of time she brought forth her first born son and called His name Jesus (Matt. 1. 25).

It had been foretold that the Messiah would be born at Bethlehem, the city of David, of whose family He was to be. "Thou, Bethlehem Ephrathah, which are little to be among the thousands of Judah, 'out of thee shall one come forth unto me, that is to be ruler in Israel'" (Micah 5. 2.). What Micah wrote centuries before was precisely fulfilled in the peculiar synchronisation which could not have been anticipated, or pre-arranged by man. Joseph and Mary were living in Nazareth in Galilee, far north of Bethlehem. There was no reason for them to go to Bethlehem as far as they could see. They were ready to marry and settle in Nazareth. But at the time of the expected birth of the Firstborn the imperial order about the census was enforced by the Roman governor, and this required people to go to their own city to be enrolled or registered. We understand that the order had been carried out earlier in other parts of the Roman provinces, but in Palestine it was apparently involved in troubles between the Emperor and the local King Herod. Herod was in difficulties with the Roman legate (A.V. Cyrenius, R. V. Quirinius, elsewhere Saturninus). The census may have been a test of loyalty. B. S. Easton in his Commentary on St. Luke's Gospel says that at the time of a Roman census it was customary to issue proclamations requiring all travellers to return to their homes. But he regards it as more likely that all Israelites were to go to their ancestral homes for the purpose of enrolment. Thus we see the truth of the event; a divine planning, which men would not have realised, caused the fulfilment of Micah's prophecy that Israel's Ruler would be from Bethlehem.

The minor circumstances, such as the birth being in the reign of Herod, and in a stable, have their share in the truth of the Incarnation. So also has the visit of the wise men from some Eastern land. Their gifts were symbolic not only of the land they came from, but of the status and destiny of the child they adored. Many in the past and in the present have found fault with the story of the guidance of the star. The utterly exceptional character of the occasion: the unprecedented circumstances; the uniqueness of the Child of Bethlehem make it reasonable to believe that special Divine intervention would mark the Nativity. What unexplained restlessness of spirit stirred the Eastern sages; what discussions may have followed with learned Jewish scholars in Babylon; what elucidations of prophecy may have preceded their decision to journey westward to the Holy Land in search of the Redeemer we do not know. But we can be sure that God led them and blessed them as first-fruits of the Gentile world, and satisfied their souls with the revelation of the Incarnate Word. Like Simeon they could have said—"Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, according to Thy word: for mine ages have seen Thy salvation, which Thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel" (Luke 2. 29).

* * *

"The glory of the Lord" shone round about the shepherds when they, the night of the Nativity, both heard and saw the Angel of the Lord—Why shepherds? Only those without imagination and without knowledge of God's word can ask that. Ought not the Shepherd of Israel to make known to the men on earth who humbly bore the same relationship to their flocks the truth that now the Good Shepherd's earthly life had begun? The Christ who would in due time lay down His life for the sheep was there with them. Then began that time of grace in which they and all men might return to "the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls."

The Shepherd-Flock relationship is the true interpretation of God and man. It runs through the Old Testament, and in the Gospel it is embodied, or as theology puts it, it is incarnate. The lost sheep, the door of the fold, the one flock, the other sheep, the hireling shepherds, the Good Shepherd, above all "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world";—these speak to us warmly lovingly and practically of "the election of grace", of its origin, its cost, its permanence.

* * *

"The glory of the Lord" in other aspects of its truth is set out in many parts of the New Testament, and specially in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

Our Lord is defined in Chapter 1 as "the brightness of God's glory, and the express image of His person". The "express image" is the exact presentation, just as the impress of the die will leave the perfect representation of itself. The Hebrew thought expressed by our word "glory" is one of the supreme things—the dazzling experience, such as Milton sought to express in the phrase "dark with excessive bright" or what is conveyed to us by the description of wisdom in the non-canonical book of Wisdom—"an effulgence from everlasting light, and an unspotted mirror of the working of God, and an image of His goodness".

Above all, we think of the Hebrew consciousness of the glory dwelling among men in the presence of the mercy-seat of the Tabernacle. All this foreshadows the true glory of His presence through the Word made Flesh. The Epistle to the Hebrews teaches us a true Incarnation. Our Lord is not one who has 'the value of God', or one who through holiness and dedication stands nearer to God than the rest of mankind: He is God who has taken our nature—God "in the likeness of sinful flesh". The New Testament does not teach Arian, still less Socinian, still less Unitarian doctrine—

"Though God of true God,

"Light of Light eternal,

"The Womb of a Virgin hath He not abhorred;

"Very God,

"Begotten, not created;

"O come, let us adore Him Christ the Lord!"

* * *

The purpose of the Word made Flesh is further set out in Heb. 5—"Christ glorified not Himself but He that said to Him 'Thou art My Son, this day have I begotten Thee'." "As He saith 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order Melchizedek'." He was incarnate that He might be the Son of Man—representative of all that is best in our nature; the unsullied "image of God". For us the Fall has brought about the depravity of all our faculties: in Him our nature shines immaculate.

In our nature our Lord Jesus came to serve God and to suffer, for it was the Father's will "to make perfect through suffering", the Captain of our Salvation—Heb. 2. 10. That perfection is not moral perfection (for in that case the text would imply some defect in the Incarnate Word) but the completeness of human experience.

It is also made plain, as we have said, that the Incarnation of the Son of God was not merely to enlarge experience of human life or to taste death, but that He might be "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world". He became man in order that "through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. 2. 14).

* * *

The truth here expressed means that the death of Christ was redemptive. It was victory, not defeat. He came to us "to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons"—Gal. 4. 5.

He came to rescue us from temptation, for He came to be "a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. For in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted" (Heb. 2. 17).

Not only that, but the love and mercy of God extend far beyond. God does not only give us opportunities of salvation, He saves. He does not only offer assistance, He gives redeeming grace. He does not say "Hold on to me", "He taketh hold of the seed of Abraham" (Heb. 2. 16). We are justified, not by works and faith, but by faith only, for our works, good deeds, alms, penances, austerities, even sacrifices and services to others, cannot add up to the righteousness God may require. Only Christ's righteousness made our righteousness by faith can justify—so it is not by works of righteousness we ourselves have done, but according to His mercy He saves us. Therefore this epistle to the Hebrews brings us the revelation of redeeming everlasting love. "This man hath an unchangeable priesthood, wherefore He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. 7. 24).

"Yea, Lord, we bless Thee,

"Born for our salvation;

"Jesus, for ever be Thy name adored!

"Word of the Father,

"Now in flesh appearing,

"O come let us adore Him,

"Christ the Lord."

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 133

the Roman Catholic Church at Farm Street, London, by the Father Basil Fitzgibbon, S.J. Mr. Williamson, a playwright and author, and before the war a prospective Labour candidate for Parliament, has been an Anglican clergyman since 1943. He became a leading member of the Annunciationists, a group which has strongly opposed a proposal, approved last week by the Convocations of Canterbury and York, to admit the Church of South India to limited intercommunication with the Church of England.

The Rev. W. W. T. Hannah, who was secretary of the Annunciationists and had been honorary curate at St. Augustine's Church, Kensington since 1952, resigned his orders in the Church of England and was received into the Roman Catholic Church in September. He is now in Rome studying for the priesthood.—"Manchester Guardian", 17/10/55.

[These men have sustained an agitation against recognition of the Church of South India in any way, and lately put up the threat that if the Church of England Convocations allowed episcopally ordained clergymen of South India to officiate in the Church of England great numbers of clergymen would secede to Rome. To date we have heard of only two secessions, Messrs. Hannah and Williamson. Mr. Williamson has not been in the true Anglican tradition, and Mr. Hannah has not been fully occupied in the work of the Church of England. Threats of secession have too often carried more weight in the Church of England than was right or seemly, but not this time.]

Quakers found Christianity flourishing in China—Stigma of "Foreign Cult" Removed.

The members of the Quaker mission of goodwill to China who have just returned to London spoke last night of the flourishing life of the Christian Church which they saw during their visit. They said that they could confirm that the freedom of religious belief and worship which is guaranteed by the Constitution is in fact granted to the Christian Church.

They saw that large numbers of churches of all denominations were in use in the cities which they visited, and the congregations contained a good proportion of younger people. The Christian Church in China, deprived of foreign aid and influences, was self-supporting, self-governing, and self-propagating. The forebodings of Christians at the time of the revolution had been replaced by the feeling that it was a blessing in disguise, for now the Church had an increased sense of responsibility, and being entirely Chinese, no longer bore the stigma of being "a foreign cult".

The Chinese Church felt itself part of the movement for national betterment, and the Chinese Christian was glad to play his part in it. Asked about the position of the Roman Catholic Church, Mr. Grigor McClelland said that they, being Protestants, had had little contact with Roman Catholics. They had been told that the recent arrests of Roman Catholics in Shanghai were due to their subversive activities and had nothing to do with their religious beliefs. He said that there was no way of finding out the truth but it was safer not to jump to conclusions.

There are four main theological seminaries, for which there are long waiting lists, where candidates of all denominations are trained before joining their various churches. The members of the mission found it surprising that there was no pressure within the Chinese Church for reunion between the various denominations, but there was, however, close co-operation between them, and the inter-denominational societies, such as the Y.M.C.A., held conferences for Christians of all the Churches.

Chinese Bible

A Chinese Bible has been printed this year and was on sale in Shanghai. Although public meetings in the open for the purpose of evangelism have been forbidden, members of the churches are able to invite their friends to join in the worship in the churches.

The delegation was granted a two-hour interview with the Prime Minister, Mr. Chou En-lai.

The Quakers said they pleaded with him for continued patience and restraint and told him that they believed world opinion, especially in the United States, would become more sympathetic. He for his part suggested that Great Britain should follow through the implications of recognising his Government by supporting China's entry into United Nations.

Mrs. Janet Rees, who was in China for 25 years as the wife of a Methodist missionary, said that she found a great improvement in the health, clothing, and housing of the people. She felt China was now a land of law and order, an impression she had never gained during the years she had lived there.—"Manchester Guardian", 8/11/55.

[Objection has been made, on the Roman Catholic side, to this not unfavourable view of the Christian situation in China. But the Quaker mission spokesman (as above) carefully explained that the delegation did not concern itself with Roman Catholic affairs in China.]

R.C. Populations.

Rev. Adrien Bouffar, of Paris, France, has published a study entitled "The Priest and the Mission", wherein he states that one-fifth of the world's population is Roman Catholic, namely that there are 472,000,000 among the 2,440,000,000 inhabitants of the earth.

In the enumeration of the countries he says that Italy has 47,500,000, France, 35,000,000, and Spain, 28,000,000, by way of example.

It is a known fact that only one-fifth of the Italian population are practical, church-going Romanists. In France about 17 per cent of the population are really genuine Roman Catholics, and in Spain the percentage would be even less if Franco's laws and decrees were not in force.

The Bible in the World.

The British and Foreign Bible Society keeps on extending its civilizing work. The latest project is to build a $22,000 Bible House in Port Moresby, New Guinea, the Society's first venture of the kind on the island.

U.S.A. Religion.

Referring to recent statistics of the growth of Protestant denominations in the United States, "The Sentinel", Toronto, has this comment—

While statistics of this kind do not prove that religion is registering equivalent gains in shaping the nature of American life, they are certainly to be preferred to figures that would reflect stagnation. There is undoubtedly a Protestant resurgence in the U.S.A. to-day and the churches were never more active or mindful of the spiritual needs of the day. There is room for optimism when it is so clear that this physical progress shown by the churches coincides with an equal advance in evangelistic and missionary enterprise. To some extent this stimulating progress has been experienced in Canada, particularly in those churches where there has been a return to the preaching and teaching in the pulpits of the necessity of faith and belief in the Gospel of Christ as the great need for human hearts to-day.

[We published the statistics in a recent issue. The above is from the Oct. issue of "The Sentinel".]

Religious Issue in Scholarships—Tipperary Council Debates N.U.I. & T.C.D.

Mr. O'Driscoll said that the Scholarships should apply to every University in Ireland.

Mr. John Gleeson said there were Protestant ratepayers in the county and they might have a son who might want to go to Trinity College and supposing he qualified for a Co. Council Scholarship, his parents were as much entitled to send their son to Trinity as they were to send their children to a Catholic University.

"No Limitation."

If this rule was put forward in the Six Counties and no Catholic University was provided for, there would be an outcry of bigotry.

He would not be a party to a proposal to deprive any citizen whether Protestant or Catholic of the same amenities that they would claim for themselves.

He supported Mr. O'Driscoll that there should be no limitation in the rule to which College a Scholarship holder should go.

Mr. O'Driscoll proposed that the condition should be eliminated from the regulations of the scheme and that it should apply to every university in Ireland.

Outside National.

Mr. Gleeson said he would like Mr. O'Driscoll amend his motion to read that no applicant who was a non-Catholic and who wished to apply for a scholarship would be debarred from going to some university outside the National University.

They would not come in contact with their own Church to object to Catholics going to non-Catholic universities, and he would give a person who was not a Catholic the opportunity of going to a non-Catholic university if he desired.

Burning of Flag.

Senator P. Tierney said he would move that the scheme would remain as it was and said if a person of another religion wanted to go to Trinity College, he was sure the County Manager would do nothing to debar him. It was only a few years ago, he said that students of T.C.D. burned the Tricolour in Dublin.

Mr. Desmond Hanafin supported Mr. O'Driscoll.

Mr. Fanning asked did it ever happen that a Catholic asked to get a Scholarship to Trinity.

County Manager—No.

Mr. Gleeson—Will you agree that if the position was on a different footing, and this Council was run by a majority of Protestants, would you agree that a Scholarship should be granted on condition that the Catholic boy or girl should go to Trinity.

Mr. Fanning said he hoped that day would never come that they would have such a Council in Tipperary or in the Republic.

County Manager—Protestants are not prohibited from going to the National, but Catholics are prohibited from going to Trinity.

As They Were.

Mr. T. F. Meagher said he was for leaving matters as they were. They knew that the Bishops were against Catholic children going to Trinity.

Mr. Brislane agreed with Mr. Meagher.

Mr. Collins said they would give a sympathetic hearing to any Protestant Scholarship holder who wanted to go to Trinity. They were not victimising them in any way.—"Dublin Evening Herald", 17/11/55.

[The proper course is to allow a successful student to enjoy his Co. Council Scholarship at any University he wishes, at home or abroad.]

St. Patrick in U.S.A.

"Tidings", the parish bulletin of Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, O., where the Very Rev. Percy F. Rex is dean, featured an article by the dean on St. Patrick. "The Church of Ireland", he wrote, "an ancient and honoured part of the Anglican Communion, will pay tribute to Patrick . . . It is unfortunate that this great stalwart of the (Protestant) missionaries of all time is not included among the saints in our Prayer Book. In spite of the legends and stories that have grown up about him, historically he occupies a very prominent place in the spread of Christianity in his generation. For this he belongs to the whole church and deserves to be remembered for our edification and inspiration.

[Quoted in "The Vigilant", Melbourne, Aug. 1955. We are very glad to note that some Protestants in the United States realise that St. Patrick was not a "Roman" Catholic, but a pioneer evangelist of the ancient Christian Church, for whom Rome was the Imperial capital rather than the headquarters of an Imperial church.]

A Christian gave a man in a railway carriage a Gospel. The man tore it into fragments and threw it out of the window.

A worker on the line picked up one of the fragments and read the words on it.

.....

He took the fragment into a Bible shop and asked for a book with those words in it. He got it.

PASSING EVENTS.

Rome's Invitation to 2,000 English Clergymen —"Will be Received with Fraternal Joy and understanding."

ROME, Sunday.

An authoritative invitation to join the Roman Catholic Church was issued to-day to a group of nearly 2,000 clergymen of the Church of England distressed by a recent decision of their supreme ecclesiastical governing body.

The Rev. Charles Boyer, a Jesuit, and Dean of the Gregorian University theological faculty published the invitation in "Unitas", the organ of a Roman Catholic Association for Christian unity. Mr. Boyer is also president of the Unitas Association.

Writing of the distress caused to an "Annunciation group" of the Church of England by a decision to recognise the bishops and ministers of a new "Amalgam" church in Southern India, he says that the duty of Roman Catholics was clear.

"They will pray that the leaders of the Church of England will abandon the way to compromise, ruinous of sound doctrine. "And they will pray that those who do not accept this way will receive the strength to follow their consciences. Indeed, they will be ready to receive with fraternal joy and understanding those who come to them."

Recognition.

The Convocation of Canterbury and York, representative of the clergy and bishops of the Church of England, decided three months ago to grant full recognition to the bishops and other ministers of religion to the Church of South India, which is composed of Anglicans, Methodists, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists.

Members of the "Annunciation Group" claimed that the non-Anglican pastors of this church lacked the Apostolic succession.

Ratification of the compromise by the Church of England's highest authorities has already caused at least two members of the "Annunciation Group" to seek entry into the Roman Catholic Church.

Authoritative quarters in Rome said 20 or 30 Church of England clergymen were likely to pass over into the Roman Church by Christmas, but not many more.

High Church.

Although not stated, the invitation was evidently addressed to the High Church and Anglo-Catholic adherents of the "Annunciation Group" of the Church of England, numbered at between 1,700 and 2,000.

Some members of the group are reported to have at one time threatened to secede from the established church and to set up another church in England, perhaps in communion with the Papacy in Rome.—Reuter.

—"Belfast News Letter", 31/10/'55.

[Since this appeared in the papers we have not heard of any response. Before the Church of England Convocation met it was threatened that a very large body of clergymen would secede to Rome if Convocation recognised the orders of Church in South India. Convocation at Canterbury and York recognised the ministries concerned, but the big swing over to Rome did not take place. The "Group" referred to, supposed to be 2,000 strong, now appears to be able to afford only 20 to 30 seceders. Those "Papalists" referred to in these columns in October, are sad anomalies in the Church of England.]

Anglican Clergy to Join Rome?

Approval given at the Convocation of Canterbury and York (July 6th) to admit the Church of South India to limited intercommunion with the Church of England, has brought the statement that "before Christmas a group of Anglo-Catholic priests of the Church of England, will have submitted to Rome". The author of the statement, Rev. Hugh Williamson, was unable to say how many were in the "group". Rev. W. G. Bennett, vicar of the Church of the Annunciation, who displayed a notice that "It is not possible in this Church to admit to Holy Communion any member of the Church of South India", found his church picketted on Sunday by persons carrying placards with Bible texts and Protestant slogans. Mr. Bennett, however, denied he was "about to secede to Rome".

Dr. W. E. Orchard, who left the Congregational Church in 1932 for Rome, has just died, and the official R. C. paper has to admit that "no great movement from the non-conformist denominations followed as a consequence. His assistant, Rev. Stanley James, came to the Church. But there were few besides." So the Presbyterian, later Congregational minister who, in 1920 "was known to every reader of British newspapers" (says the R. C. obituary) passes on practically unknown to this generation.—"Protestant Action", Toronto, Oct. '55.

A Coming Centenary.

This year will mark the centenary of the coming of Protestant Christianity to Colombia, where, incidentally, the persecution of Protestants still goes on. A hundred years ago there arrived in Colombia the Rev. Henry B. Pratt, a Protestant missionary. The country had quite recently obtained its independence from Spain, and Mr. Pratt, as a missionary pioneer, proved very successful, becoming, in fact, an outstanding personality among the Protestants of South America. Among his gifts was that of writing, and in addition to writing some commentaries on the Old Testament, he promoted that translation of the Bible which is known as the Version Moderna. For it is always the prime endeavour of a Protestant missionary to make the Scripture available to his converts in their own tongue.

Celebrations.

An interesting programme has been prepared by the Evangelical Confederation of Colombia, and it is designed to last throughout the year. "The Confederation will publish information on the advance of the Protestant Churches against fanaticism, indifference, and systematic persecution." It should prove very interesting information indeed, and we shall be glad to see it. There are to be evangelistic campaigns of all sorts, except one by radio, for that has been forbidden to Protestants since 1953. "Outstanding speakers from Latin America" are to be invited, and three large meetings are projected. "The last of these will be designated as the First Protestant Congress of Colombia." For, as the Roman Catholic Church ought to know, for it has been long enough at it, a persecution always provokes a reaction on the other side, and consolidation and growth are usually its outcome. But it is, of course, easier to persecute than to convince.—"The Bulwark", Oct. '55.

Emigration "Empties" Eire Towns.

Mr. Thomas Derrig, former Minister for Lands, speaking on emigration in the Chamber of Deputies, Dublin, said that the people of whole townships in the western areas of Eire were clearing out, and the movement was extending to comparatively well-off areas.

Large numbers of houses were being abandoned. Their former occupants were seeking better living elsewhere and it would require an enormous effort now to stem emigration. If the women were to be induced to remain at home, constant employment would have to be provided for the men.

Influence of Roman Catholic Church in Eire— A Protestant Bishop's View.

There may be an undue influence exerted in Eire by the Roman Catholic Church upon its members—but that is because of the personal loyalty of members and not because of any ultra-autocratic outlook on the part of the Church leaders, a Protestant Bishop said in Belfast.

Rev. Dr. E. C. Hodges, Bishop of Limerick, was the principal speaker at a meeting of Queen's University Literific Society.

Speaking on the subject "Church and State," he said that if any definite instructions ever went from the Roman Catholic hierarchy to the Government of Eire he had never heard of

THE STORY OF A PRIEST TO ROME AND BACK.

The Rev. William Purcell Witcutt's mouth clicked shut like a snap lock when British reporters tried to interview him six years ago on his reasons for quitting the Roman Catholic Church and rejoining the Church of England. This week the lock opened smoothly with U.S. publication of Anglican Witcutt's Return to Reality (Macmillan; $1.65)—a well-written attack upon Roman Catholic doctrine.

In 1928 Witcutt, son of a Staffordshire merchant tailor, was studying law at Birmingham University when the attraction of G. K. Chesterton's anti-industrial theory of "Distributism" led him to Rome. Distributists took one look at the misery of the workingman and concluded that large-scale industry should be abolished in favour of a social-industrial structure more like that of the Middle Ages. Since the leading Distributists seemed to be Catholics, Witcutt began to study the Roman Catholic system of thought. "It at once attracted me," he writes. "Here was an intellectual scheme moulded and shaped, it seemed, to include every detail. One had only to make an act of faith and one was settled, intellectually for life. No more questions need be asked."

Seven Year Crind.

Anglican Witcutt became a Roman Catholic, and resolved to study for the priesthood. He persuaded Catholic authorities to waive their rule requiring converts to spend two years in the Church before entering the seminary, and within a month of his reception into the Church plunged into a seven-year seminary grind at Oscott.

"It was," writes Father Witcutt, "a seven years' intensive training in how to think . . . We studied every branch of philosophy and theology. Logic was our master and the syllogism our instrument." He was entranced by the Church's scholastic system of theology, "glittering and shapely as a machine." Scholastic theology's two fundamentals, says Witcutt, are the Abstract Idea (the essence of every object is comprehensible only to the mind, which is immaterial, spiritual and immortal) and the Beatific Vision (the plunge of the soul into the Divine").

Armed with his new-found theology, Father Witcutt was sent to a slum parish in Birmingham. For a while all went well. Then in a lecture on the Reformation to the Catholic Evidence Guild he bore down too heavily on the corruption of the medieval Catholic clergy. "I was summoned to interview the Vicar-General, who told me, with a searching look, that I was being transferred to 'the farthest outpost of the diocese.'"

As a parish priest in the villages of Staffordshire and Warwickshire, Father Witcutt drew nearer and nearer to the God that seemed to lie just behind the veil of nature and farther and farther away from the Abstract Idea and the Beatific Vision. He found that "The God of Scholasticism was unworshipable. Nor do Roman Catholics worship Him. They cannot. They worship the Sacred Heart, the Virgin, and the Saints . . . To me Roman Catholicism seemed one of two things: either a set of dry philosophical formulae or else a range of plastercast statues . . . What I wanted was no vision of the intellect, but resurrection. It was the doctrine of bodily resurrection which held me by an unbreakable bond to the Christian religion, as it had held St. Paul."

Roman Catholicism, says Father Witcutt, conflicts with philosophy ("It does not allow for any advance in philosophy made since the 13th century"), with physical science ("by insisting upon the now indefensible Aristotelian doctrine" that qualities, such as colour, are objective instead of being in our senses) and with history. Back in the Anglican fold, he holds that the Bishop of Rome became pre-eminent in the Church only because the Mohammedans "overwhelmed the Patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, isolated him of Constantinople, and left only the Patriarch of Rome in his former authority."

For the last six years Father Witcutt has been an Anglican Curate in London's run-down suburb of East Ham. The freedom of the Church of England is a relief to him. "More and more the Latin liturgy had become an annoyance to me," he writes, and "I had grown to detest the spiritual Iron Curtain which divides Roman Catholics from their fellow-countrymen . . . I am sorry to say that the Roman Catholic, and particularly the priest, despises the Church of England. He does not consider its clergy to be true priests, and he despises it for its lack of congregations and its empty pews."

Of these empty pews optimistic Anglican Witcutt notes that the un-Churched English are "not bitter anticlericals and atheists, as they would be in a Continental country. They are members of the Church who are at present asleep, and one day someone's voice will wake them."—"Time," 4/7/55.

AN IMPRESSION OF IRELAND.

Visitors to Ireland sometimes form curious ideas about us: and sometimes they are given odd information by well-meaning persons. For instance, we have heard of visitors to Dublin who have been told that Trinity College (Dublin University) "used to be Catholic" (i.e. Roman Catholic). It is well-known of course that it is a famous Protestant place of learning, and historians would be at a loss to say how a college founded in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (A.D. 1592) for the education of Protestant clergymen etc. could be described as above. It is true of course that at an earlier date part of the ground occupied by the College had been the site of a monastery which had become the property of the city of Dublin. But we fear that that is not enough to support the statement that the college itself used to be "Catholic".

This notion is akin to the one referred to elsewhere, that every ecclesiastical ruin in Ireland is due to the fire and sword of Protestant vandals, whereas in fact at the time of the Reformation here there was scarcely a parish church or cathedral not in ruins or ruinous. This sorry condition of things was due to the constant strife among the people who cared little for church or religion. It was not solely the conflict between Irish and Anglo-Norman, but between the Irish chiefs themselves, and religion did not restrain them very much.

We had here, of course, a certain number of monastic institutions in the sixteenth century which were "confiscated" or secularised by King Henry VIII. What state they were in we cannot say. Perhaps they were better in some instances than the English ones, but it would not have suited state policy to secularise the English monasteries and leave those of Ireland alone. So the Irish monks and friars were demobilised, and their houses sold. If they were like many of the English houses they were in debt, and in poor repair.

* * *

Then again the visitors may be interested in higher education, and be anxious to learn something of its history in Ireland. He will very likely be told that Trinity College, Dublin was the wealthy preserve of the privileged Protestant classes, and that the Roman Catholics had no facilities given to them for higher education until efforts were made to establish a "Catholic University" about 1855, which was not a success, and so the people had to wait till 1909 for the National University with its three colleges, Cork, Galway, Dublin. Now in 1795 the Irish Government (before the union with Gt. Britain) established on public funds St. Patrick's College, Maynooth for the higher education of Roman Catholics, both lay and clerical. Some years later the admission of lay students was stopped so that the college became exclusively clerical.

In the 1830's the Government created for Ireland a national system of primary education which, though not perfect, and needing revision in regard to religious matters (afterwards satisfactorily settled), was the best in Europe, and far superior to anything in Great Britain in the nineteenth century. This system was augmented by the subsequent creation of "model" schools, under the management of the Commissioners of National Education (the "national" schools were managed locally, usually by clergymen). The model schools were truly models of what well equipped, well-staffed schools should be; and the grades, classes, and curriculum of the whole system were efficiently planned and carried on. The only thing we may regret is that the Irish language was not fostered as a literary medium. The Irish like the Welsh might well have been taught bilingually where the old language was in common use.

The National system also allowed the establishment of "Higher Grade" schools where local demands existed. This provision could have supplied secondary education throughout the country where it was needed, but little interest was taken in this possibility.

In 1845 the Government established "the Queen's University of Ireland" with three Queen's Colleges, Cork, Belfast, Galway. In these colleges open to everyone, as T.C.D. had been since 1793, sound teaching in letters and sciences was provided, and a good supply of scholarships was available. The professors were outstanding men equal to the staffs of any other university in these islands, but the colleges were condemned by the Roman Catholic bishops because they were under State control and made no provision for theological instruction. So the only one of which really prospered was the Belfast one (which attained to independent status in 1909).

Yet the fact remains that the two colleges of the National University outside Dublin have existed since the 1840's, and anyone was free to attend.

From 1880 onward there was a "Royal University" here which was not a teaching institution but an examining one. Anyone could sit for its examinations after preparing in ecclesiastical colleges, secondary schools, or privately. The standard was high, and the results good.

It may be said that since 1845 the facilities for university education in Ireland were quite adequate to the country's needs. England had only two universities till well into the nineteenth century (London University was not set up till about 1830, Durham a few years earlier). Ireland had non-university training for lawyers and physicians and surgeons, as it has still, so its professional needs were not handicapped. Had the Queen's University Colleges been welcomed and used it is probable that they would have been increasingly adapted to suit the needs of their students spiritually as well as intellectually.

A visitor from overseas may set out to tour Ireland in company with a number of other visitors, and they all may be Protestants or the majority of them. About the country they may see and hear much about the faith of the majority. They may see Croagh Patrick in Co. Mayo and hear of the pilgrims who annually climb its stony track to hear Mass on its lofty summit. In the same county they may hear of, and see the shrine at Knock (where an appearance of the Blessed Virgin is affirmed to have been made). In Donegal they may see "St. Patrick's Purgatory", and elsewhere see modern Roman Catholic establishments such as Mount Mellary. But they may not have their attention drawn to the fact that a quarter of Ireland's people are Protestant, and that their co-religionists have places of worship throughout the country in North and South.

* * *

Some months ago a lady from the United States of America was in Dublin and had paid a visit to Dublin Castle where she was correctly told that the present Roman Catholic military chapel had formerly been the "Chapel Royal". She asked us if many of the Protestant churches had been taken from Protestants at the time the Irish Free State was set up. We were a little taken aback at this question for we had never thought anybody would imagine such a thing, and of course told her that nothing of the sort had ever occurred. She then asked about the Chapel Royal, having been given the impression that it had been "wrested" from Protestants. We were glad to explain that that building had never belonged to any Irish Protestant church, but had always been State property in no way connected with the diocese of Dublin.

* * *

Some time ago Professor D. W. Brogan, formerly of Glasgow, wrote his impression of a recent visit to Dublin. He gave his readers a picture of the religious attitude he found here of denunciation of many things. He saw the isolationist spirit which acts as if there were no world outside Ireland, and if he had been here lately, mid-October, he would no doubt have been interested in the efforts made by Roman Catholic organisations to prevent a football match in Dublin between an Irish and a Yugoslavian team. From the Roman Catholic Archbishop's House came a complaint that the promoters of the game ought to have discussed the matter of the invitation to the Yugoslavs first. Various Roman Catholic groups raised their voices against the match with the "Reds". But the curious fact stands out that last July Dublin had a contingent of Russian Soviet astronomers as guests. These men were fêted in the customary manner, and no protests were made. But when the simple players of association football, the game of the common man, came over the sea the protests began. However, the football organisation here did not allow itself to be stampeded. Neither the disapproval of the Roman Catholic Archbishop, nor the refusal of the President to attend the match, and of the band to play at the field, nor the failure of the broadcast arrangement discouraged the people concerned. The public did not yield to pressure either, and some twenty-thousand people were said to be present.

This successful assertion of the independence of sport is a healthy sign in a country in which moral courage is not conspicuous.

Professor Brogan said of Ireland "Here nationality and religion are one". This is no new assumption, and a year or two ago we commented on the view of an ecclesiastic that "when he thought of an Irishman he thought of a Catholic" (or words to this effect). Now Professor Brogan refers with appreciation to the work of reviving the Irish language done by the Gaelic League. The visitor may be surprised to learn that the founder of the Gaelic League was Dr. Douglas Hyde, son of a Church of Ireland clergyman, a practising churchman all his life, and the first President of the Irish Republic. How the facts falsify sectarian prejudices!

Just lately too there died in Dublin Dr. Kathleen Lynn, for forty years a strong Irish republican who figured in the Easter 1916 Rising. Dr. Lynn was a co-founder of St. Ultan's Hospital for sick infants, and was a noble pioneer of social improvement. Her funeral was attended by representatives of all parts of political and social life. It surprised many to realise that Dr. Lynn was a Protestant who faithfully practised her faith. So Ireland is a land of unexpected things and people, and the visitor must not assume that the pattern is uniform or that individuality is a thing of the past.

But we want more individuality; more people out of step; more iconoclasts; more men and women to challenge the smug assumptions of people who trip over themselves in their hurry to toe the line. In older days the people of Ireland believed in liberty. To-day it is hard to find clear thinking. People are frightened to use their reason lest they might come to unpopular conclusions, and the kind of information they ought to have is some times not available. We read, à propos of the Yugoslav football match that the Yugoslavs massacred thousands of Roman Catholics, but not that the Croats under Mussolini's aegis murdered many thousands of Greek Orthodox Yugoslavs beforehand. We have seen it stated that the majority of the citizens of Yugoslavia are Roman Catholic. But in fact the Orthodox outnumber the Roman Catholics, and there is a substantial population of Mohammedans as well.

No doubt visitors to other countries find anomalies, and learn that hastily formed opinions mislead. But we in Ireland are quite ready to mislead ourselves. Little wonder then that our visitors carry away notions which perpetuate error.

The matter which is most misunderstood by visitors is the situation of Northern Ireland. We despair of seeing the day when citizens of the republic will consider fairly the position of the North, so that we have little hope that our visitors will be enlightened. From Dublin to the Border is little over sixty miles: to Belfast it is about a hundred; yet surprisingly few southern Irish who are vocal about partition know much about the North, or are anxious to gain impartial information. They do not visit Northern Ireland enough, nor do they associate with people who will give them a reasonable point of view. They think political unity is the only thing that matters, and so they neglect the other sorts of unity which could make friends and fellow-workers.

Our visitors then had better confine themselves to sight-seeing, and food, and avoid trying to understand us. As long as we are elusive we may be interesting. Once we cease to be that we shall be as dull as everywhere else.—D. C. MacW.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

Christ Revealed as One With God

The saying of Our Lord which ought at all times to guide our faith is set down in St. John's Gospel (10, 30) "I and my Father are one." The numeral "one" in Greek has masculine, feminine and neuter significances, and here the neuter is used, meaning "an entity," "a unity." It may be said to the believer that this saying is not enough to bear the weight of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. That was not its purpose, but in fact, if we use it as a proof-text we can easily support it by numerous Scriptural evidences, so that the interpretation of "I and my Father are One" is made plain throughout the New Testament.

* * *

Let us consider, first, what we are taught about the existence of Christ. St. John 8, 58 we read "Jesus said 'before Abraham was, I am.'" The phrase "I am" is the same as the Old Testament one in which Jehovah revealed Himself. He sent Moses to Pharaoh with the directive "I AM hath sent me unto you." God had named Himself "I AM THAT I AM" (Exodus 3, 14), so we are struck by the use of this sacred phrase by Our Lord in reference to Himself. The usual explanation of the phrase is that it means "the Eternal One." This is carried over in the Epistle to the Colossians from its Old Testament sense into the New, in direct application to Our Lord. In chapter one (verse 17) St. Paul wrote of Him "He is before all things, and by Him all things consist."

This does not rest only in St. Paul's words: Jesus had said (St. John 17, 5) in His great prayer "Now, O Father, Glorify Thou me with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was." Further in the same prayer He said to the Father "Thou lovedest me before the world was." (v. 24).

The same truth is emphasised in the Revelation where Our Lord takes the title "The Alpha and the Omega"—"the First and the Last," i.e., the One who has priority of existence (Rev. 1, 8: 22, 13).

* * *

If Pre-existence is taught by the "I AM" of Our Lord, and the evidence is there to show it: we have the first step towards the unfolding of His saying "I and My Father are One." We go on to find that the New Testament writers under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost declare that Our Lord shares the same attributes as the Father. It appears to us to be simply incredible that Jewish Christians such as Paul, John, Matthew, etc., could have assigned to Jesus, had they not held that "God was manifest in the flesh," the attributes of Deity. Heathen writers might have done so, but we have no heathen writers in the New Testament.

The following attributes of God are referred to Our Lord:

1. Omnipresent—"No man hath ascended up to heaven, but He that came down from heaven, even the Son of man is in heaven." We find the truth here set down, that the Son of man while on earth, is yet continuously with God, put concisely in the well-known Latin hymn translated "The heavenly Word proceeded forth, yet leaving not His Father's side." He was at one and the same time with men and with God.

2. He was omniscient—We are well aware of "the Kenosis Theory," i.e., the view that in the Incarnation Our Lord "emptied Himself" (Gr. Kenosis, an emptying) of divine qualities, including knowledge He had as God. In fact, you can make this word "Kenosis" comprehend nearly anything. But the Authorised Version in translating St. Paul's words in Philippians 2, 7 (heauton ekenose) reads "He made Himself of no reputation," which, while not literal, seems to convey exactly what St. Paul intended. So, omniscience was not abandoned, for we find that St. John records a comment of Our Lord's disciples—"Now we are sure that Thou knowest all things, and needest not that any man should ask Thee: by this we believe that Thou camest forth from God." John shows that Our Lord did not repudiate this, for He simply said to His followers "Do ye now believe?" (John 16, 30). There were, no doubt, matters of which Our Lord's human consciousness was unaware, but omniscience was a quality of His eternally existing personality.

3. Omnipotence—This is a spiritual power, not yet exercised to the full though His control of natural forces when He was here on earth was enough to show that the universal power was there, so we call to mind St. Paul's words in Philippians 3, 21, to the effect that Our Lord in the resurrection "shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body, according to the working whereby He is able even to subdue all things unto Himself." If that is not a declaration of Christ's omnipotence, and the imparting to Him of divine qualities properly associated with the Godhead, then words have no meaning.

4. He is, as the Father, unchangeable—The first chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews contrasts the incarnate Son of God with angels and then declares His unvarying eternal existence. The heavens and earth shall perish, "as a vesture shalt Thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but Thou art the same." Immutability, a quality of God, is Our Lord's too, for this epistle also speaks of "Jesus Christ, the same, yesterday, to-day and for ever."

5. He is the Holy One—So St. Paul spoke of Our Lord, well-knowing that the title "the Holy One" is applied in the Old Testament to God—"Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord of Hosts" Isaiah 6, 3. "Be ye holy, for I am the Lord which sanctify you" Leviticus 20, 7 & 8. Jehovah is "the Holy One of Israel" and Jesus Christ is named "the Holy One." This speaks for itself.

6. The designation "true God" is applied to Our Lord by St. John in the first epistle (5, 20) "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true, and we are in Him that is true, even in His son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life." Here again we have the words of a Jewish Christian to whom it would have been the utmost blasphemy to call mere man "true God." John's words immediately following the above quotation are "Little children, keep yourselves from idols." Could he have said that if he had been making an idol and a lie of Jesus in the previous verse? True God is right, and its setting, like the setting of all the other attributes is in the Incarnation, "the Word made flesh."

A slightly different sort of Scripture evidence as to the meaning of "I and My Father are One" will be found in the way in which the activities of God are ascribed to Christ.

1. God is Creator—and John in chapter 1 of his Gospel says of Christ the Word "all things were made by Him (John 1, 3.) St. Paul in Colossians 1, 16 writes of Christ "by Him were all things created, in heaven, and on earth, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities or powers: all things were created by Him and for Him."

2. God is Preserver—"By Him, (that is by Christ) all things consist" says St. Paul (Col. 1, 17). The Epistle to the Hebrews describes Our Lord as "upholding all things by the word of His power" (Heb. 1, 3). Thus once more the New Testament represents one Lord as partaking of the peculiar activities of God.

3. All things are God's—And St. John records that "the Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into His hand" John 3, 35. Truly "He that cometh from heaven is above all" John 3, 31.

4. God reigneth, "the Lord is King for ever," Psalm 10, 16. He is the King "Whose name is the Lord of Hosts" Jeremiah 46, 18, and in Rev. 1, 5 Our Lord is described as "the prince of the kings of the earth." In Revelation 17, 14 the victory of the Lamb is assured, for "He is Lord of Lords, and King of Kings."

5. "Who can forgive sins but God only?" Yet it was said by the angel who spoke to Joseph of the child of the Blessed Virgin Mary "Thou shalt call His name Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins." Accused of blasphemy because He said to a palsied man "thy sins be forgiven thee," Our Lord answered that "the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins." That was His reply to those who asked "who can forgive sins but God only?" (Mark 2, 7).

6. "Thou that hearest prayer; unto Thee shall all flesh come" (Psalm 65). Jesus said "If ye ask anything in my name, I will do it" (John 14, 14.)

7. God is the Almighty—Our Lord's proclamation to his disciples on the occasion of His ascension was "all power is given unto thee in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28, 18).

8. "The Lord shall judge His people"—Deut. 32, 36. In Acts 17 we have an account of St. Paul's speech on Mars Hill in Athens. He says that God "hath appointed a day in which He will judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom He hath ordained: whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead."

The activities of God are plainly treated by

New Testament writers as the activities of Our Lord Jesus Christ. He not merely shares in part: He uses them as His own by right.

* * *

Finally, we have abundant reference to Our Lord in relation to the glory of the Father. He is "the brightness of God's glory" Heb. 1, 3. He is "crowned with glory and honour" Heb. 2, 7. When He comes again "He shall come in glory" Matt. 24, 30. And "He shall reign in glory," Matt. 25, 31.

In ascribing highest praise from men to God, we read in Rev. 1, 5 and 6 that to Jesus Christ shall be "glory and dominion for ever." So also in Galatians 1, 3-5.

* * *

We believe that this is the elucidation of Our Lord's words that He and His Father are One. In the simplest and most matter of fact way the New Testament throughout applies to Our Lord exactly what the Old Testament applies to Jehovah. That is how the Holy Ghost has unfolded to us the mystery of the Word made flesh. That is why we, without confounding the creature with the Creator, can worship Jesus Christ and call Him our God and Saviour. We know that He is God the Son. We know that the doctrine of the Holy and undivided Trinity is not an ecclesiastical fiction, but a definition of the eternal truth of the Godhead, and that Jesus is Emmanuel, "God with us."

PRAYING TO THE SAINTS.

Our readers will find in the next number of "The Catholic" a plain forthright statement of the Archbishop of Canterbury on the subject of the invocation and intercession of saints. The Archbishop's sound words which are timely and cautionary, gave concern to "The Church Times" the "Anglo-Catholic" paper, as any plain Protestant declaration must. Yet it would be wrong to suppose that praying to the saints is a "Catholic" practice; and that not praying to them is a Protestant one. In fact, praying to the saints is not Scriptural, and therefore cannot be really Catholic. Not praying to the saints is in conformity with Scripture, and so must be Catholic. Here, as in much else, what is popularly called Protestant is in reality good old primitive Christianity.

Let us recognise at once that there are certain inscriptions on ancient Christian graves in catacombs, etc., which have been eagerly accepted as proof that Christians prayed for the dead, and to the dead right from the start. It has also been claimed that Our Lord was used to prayers for the dead and did not dispute their propriety. But it has yet to be proved that Jewish prayers for the dead were offered as a duty in Our Lord's time. The fact is well nigh certain that such prayers are much later than the first century A.D. It is also true that the prayers engaved in Christian burial places are later than the time of the Apostles.

* * *

"The inscriptions in the catacombs (subterranean cemeteries in Rome), in their bearing on such practices as prayers for the dead and prayers to the saints, have been very differently interpreted by archaeologists according to their theological bias."

"It is easy to conceive how devotion (to the memory of martyrs and other dead) always ran the risk of unduly exalting human merit, and of fostering the idea that the saints, or the deceased friends, could be approached in prayer as mediators between earth and heaven. And a curious discovery enables us to contrast the popular theology at the time when Cyprian suffered (250 A.D.), with the repudiation of the worship of martyrs so emphatically expressed a century earlier, on the occasion of Polycarp's death (A.D. 156). When victims at Rome were interred in the Catacomb of Praetextatus (A.D. 258) the still wet plaster above the graves was scratched by some unknown hand with the words "O Januarius, Agatopos, Felicissimus, Martyrs, Comfort me." This illiterate "graffito" has many counterparts in the third century. It is usually the case of surviving relatives imploring the mediation not of noted saints, but of the friend deceased."

These quotations are from Appendix B of Dr. Foakes-Jackson's History of the Christian Church. This appendix is on the catacombs and was written by the Rev. A. C. Jennings. It is to be noted that Mr. Jennings draws attention to this sort of prayer as being part of "the popular theology" of the third century, when Christianity was already two hundred years old, and when its recruits were likely to carry into it much of their old pre-Christian superstition. We know how the Reformers protested in the sixteenth century against "popular theology," and we know how "popular theology," the wishful thinking and luxuriating credulities of ignorant people, built up dogmatic theology and pious practices ever since. As orthodox Protestants we maintain our witness against "popular theology" of this sort since the only divine rule of faith is Holy Scripture, and it is the test of truth.

Though our title is "Praying to the Saints," it may not be out of place to continue with quotations from Mr. Jennings, on the catacomb evidence for "prayer for the dead." He says

"the future was throughout this period (i.e. 2nd and 3rd centuries) unclouded by the gloomy speculations of theologians. The state beyond is plainly viewed in the catacombs with serene cheerfulness, as a continuation and development of the present spiritual life. It is consistent that in the first six centuries but very few examples are found of the address to the reader (of the inscriptions) for his prayers. It is no real qualification of this position, if we find the early Christians appropriating as a fit epigraph the familiar Jewish ejaculation 'on him be peace,' here appearing in such forms as 'peace be with you,' 'may you live in God,' etc. At least as frequent are the expressions of a sure and certain hope. Sometimes there is an appropriation of the traditional vocabulary of paganism. Sometimes there is merely a pathetic ejaculation of human affection. In most cases seemingly there is no expression of the survivor's sentiments at all."

* * *

It should be obvious from this that it is indeed foolish and unscholarly to draw theological conclusions, applicable to our own faith, from the catacomb inscriptions. Sentiment and emotion, not theology, dictate most funeral inscription. We emphasise all this because one of the critics of the Archbishop of Canterbury's words wrote to the "Church Times" and sought to justify the intercession of saints by a wave of the hand towards the catacombs, suggesting that there we find the convincing evidence of the soundness of prayers to the dead. Another correspondent answered with the decisive point that he preferred the Scriptures as a guide to faith and prayer, rather than the catacomb theology. He also added that the Church of England in the Sixth of the Thirty-Nine Articles says that Scripture is the Rule of Faith, and in the Twenty-Second Article says that "the Romish Doctrine concerning the Invocation of Saints is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God." The Archbishop showed himself in favour of the true doctrine of the Church when he spoke plainly against the popular cultus of saints in a church which officially declared such cultus to be repugnant to the Word of God.

One of our friends recently said that "the strongest argument in favour of the invocation of saints is ignorance." That has been shown time and again. The argument is usually put in this persuasive manner—"You ask your earthly friends to pray for you: surely you will not give up asking them now that through death they are much nearer God." The very important question ignored in this is how we are to show that when a good man dies he remains in touch with his friends he left behind on earth so as to be able to hear their prayers; and how to show that now he is in a position to address God on their behalf. We have no information whatever on this matter, and no possible source of information. What we have is a glorious revealed truth which concentrates all intercession with God in Our Lord Jesus Christ, and so by implication rules out the claim that there are subordinate intercessors in heaven—"There is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the Man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. 2, 5). Commonsense ought to tell us that if we are invited to "come boldly to the throne of grace" (Heb. 4, 16) we should realise that there can be no point in seeking any mediation other than His Whose throne it is. Let no one fall back upon the pitiable argument that Our Lord Jesus Christ is too remote from us; too holy; too austere; too concerned with judgment rather than forgiveness; for the previous verse in Hebrews, chapter 4 is "We have not a high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." It is wonderful how the Bible has anticipated and answered all the objections the natural man has to the freeness of grace, of election, of salvation. The tragedy is that so many find it so difficult to accept what God teaches in His word, and are seeking to evade its plain lessons from some perverted sense of lack of merit in themselves, and over-abundance of it in the saints.

* * *

The little catechism entitled "Roman Claims" which was issued for study in the Church of Ireland (2nd ed. 1931, A.P.C.K. 37 Dawson Street, Dublin, 4½d.) puts the subject in its right context.

Q. "What does the N.T. mean by the word saints?"

A. "Those who are separated to God. Christians are called saints because dedicated to God's service."

Q. "Who are saints according to the Church of Rome?"

A. "Saints according to the Church of Rome are those who are declared to be reigning with Christ in heaven" (Creed of Pope Pius IV: Trent, Gess. 25).

Q. "What does the Roman Church teach about the invocation of saints?"

A. "The Roman Church teaches that saints are to be 'honoured and invoked.'"

Q. "What does 'honoured and invoked' mean?"

A. "It means in practice that worship ought to be offered to them, and that we ought to pray to them to intercede with God for us" (Pope Benedict XIV, 1740-1758, defined canonisation as a decree by which the Pope commands and ordains that the entire Roman Catholic world should honour and offer prayers to the persons who are canonised).

Q. "What grounds does the N.T. afford for the belief that departed saints hear our words or read our thoughts?"

A. "The N.T. affords no grounds for this belief."

Q. "What power would a departed saint need to possess in order to hear words or read thoughts of people in all parts of the world?"

A. "He would need to possess divine power in order to do so."

Q. "Where is it forbidden in N.T. to offer religious worship to men?"

A. "St. Peter rebuked Cornelius for worshipping him (Acts X, 25, 26). St. Paul and St. Barnabas refused the worship of the people of Lystra (Acts XIV, 11-18)." (Several of the early Fathers, such as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Athanasius, and Augustine, have left their strong testimony against prayer to the saints).

Q. "How does modern Roman Catholic practice go beyond the permission of the Council of Trent to honour and invoke the saints?"

A. "Modern Roman Catholics not only ask the saints to pray to God for them, but they pray to the saints for their help and protection." (Modern Roman Catholic prayers very largely consist of prayers to the saints, not for their intercession, but for their aid).

We have heard of pusillanimous Protestants who objected to their families being taught this catechism, yet it is only simple primitive Christian truth throughout. Such people however are not interested in truth or God's word.

* * *

The Rev. Fr. Connellan, when he wrote an account of his leaving the Roman priesthood entitled it "Hear the Other Side," and it is only fair that we should indicate what Roman Catholic writers say in favour of praying to the saints. The Rev. Fr. P. Ryan in "Catholic Doctrines Explained and Proved" offers to give "plenty of proof" from the Word of God that it is lawful to believe that the saints in heaven intercede for us. He quotes Rev. V, 8, "golden vials full of odours which are the prayers of the saints." Fr. Ryan says that St. John here describes the saints before the throne of God praying for their earthly brethren. If we read the chapter we shall not find that it bears the interpretation Fr. Ryan puts on it. The "vials full of odours which are the prayers of the saints" are the prayers of the believers on earth, for the word "saint" is steadily used in the New Testament for the Christian here, not the Christian in glory.

Fr. Ryan quotes Maccabees XV 14, a book which he says "Protestants acknowledge to be historically true." The passage refers to a vision Judas Maccabee had of Jeremiah the prophet praying for the people and for Jerusalem. Fr. Ryan does not disclose that this is the Second Book of Maccabees, a very different matter. We recognise the historical value of First Maccabees, not of Second. Anyway, a vision referred to in a dubious apocryphal writing is not likely to bear much weight.

He refers to the rich man in torment praying for a message to be sent to warn his brethren; and asks if, in the light of this intercession, the saints cannot intercede on our behalf? The passage in Luke XVI is the parable of Lazarus. A parable is not a definition of doctrine, and Fr. Ryan's "proof" turns out to be only an inferential question to which we can answer "Yes," and others can answer "No."

No further Scripture proof is forthcoming in Fr. Ryan's chapter headed "The intercession of Saints," but in the next chapter he writes "We proved in the last chapter that the saints in heaven intercede for their brethren on earth." There was no proof; and the most that he could do was to give a few passages from the Fathers of the third century which appear to warrant such prayer. What we want is warrant from the first century, not from the third, or the twentieth.

* * *

Even the third century is understandable in its attitude, in contrast with the later centuries when the delusion of Purgatory and its circumstances took hold, and prayers were directed to a new end, that is, to deliverance from the pains of Purgatory. That idea was not found in earlier and better days. In earlier and better days we do not find the saints being asked to recover for us lost property; or to secure that young people shall pass their school or college examinations. Thanksgiving was made to God for benefits received for it was clearly understood that "every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father" (James I, 17). Prayer is best learned from Him Who taught us when we pray to say "Our Father . . ."

* * *

We leave the subject of "Praying to the Saints" in the hope that we may all be strengthened in our faith by the practice of believing prayer addressed to the Tri-Une God alone. We are sure that that is what all the saints desire us to do.

them.

A great many members of the Éire Government, being loyal members of the Roman Catholic Church, had a very determined attitude towards the carrying out of the wishes of their Church—an attitude which invariably reacted on their decisions in the Government.

Association.

Very Rev. Principal J. E. Davey said it was a good thing, if a country was predominately Christian, that there should be an association between Church and State.

"In Éire, where there is a predominantly Roman Catholic population, that gives the Church an established position in the Government of the country. The Government accepts the vetoes of the Church in matters of legislation but apparently not in matters of football matches," he said.

Miss Betty Sinclair, secretary of Belfast and District Trades Council, said the working classes asked the Church—in this world struggle—to make life better and to help the people to get the things they really needed. If it did that it would regain its independence and flourish as it has never flourished before.

Orangemen Answer Critical Professor — Reminder from Recent History.

Sir William McCleery, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Ireland, replied in Belfast recently to the attack on the Orange Order made by Professor E. Y. Exshaw of Trinity College, Dublin.

Sir William was proposing the toast of the Government at the annual meeting of the Grand Lodge of Ireland held in Sandy Row Orange Hall.

He said that when speaking last month at a party conference in Dublin, Professor Exshaw declared that the only hope for the solution of partition lay in the disappearance of the Orange Order.

"I can assure Professor Exshaw that if the end of partition depends on the disappearance of the Orange Order then partition will remain for a very long time indeed," Sir William declared.

The Order was stronger to-day than ever it was, and there could be no doubt that it would continue to prosper and to go forward from strength to strength.

Sir William said that the professor had alleged that the views of the Orange Order were those of 300 years ago.

Under Hitler.

"Instead of wandering back over Europe's past 300 years, I would suggest that the Professor should recall to mind a more recent page of history, when had it not been for the steadfast determination of the Loyalists of Ulster, the bulwark of which has always been the Orange Institution, he and his friends in the South of Ireland might have found themselves under the heel of Adolph Hitler," he added.

Professor Exshaw had continued his virulent attack by accusations of bigotry and intolerance.

His study of the history of 1690 must have been very cursory indeed, otherwise he could not have failed to know that in a time when bitter sectarian hatred was rife in many lands William of Orange was distinguished for his tolerant ideals and his determination to resist the bonds of religious tyranny.

"Bigotry" Cry.

Those were the principles for which their forefathers died—they were the principles they were determined to maintain, and it ill became any man no matter who or where he might be to make false accusations that could only lead to bitterness and sorrow.

The old effete cry of Ulster's bigotry and intolerance had become barren and exhausted, and was only kept alive by those who were determined to stir up a spirit of distrust against a loyal people whose only fault was their resolve to extend the British way of life to every man and woman so that all men's consciences might be their own.

200,000 French Canadians Abandon the R.C. Church.

"The two hundred thousand or more who have abandoned their language and their faith ought not to make us forget the eight hundred thousand who have conserved these spiritual values . . ."

Thus spoke a leading priest in Quebec, Msgr. Gosselin. His statistics apparently deal with the French Canadian minorities in provinces outside Quebec for he also added the following significant statement:

"We must remember that in our own province, called Catholic and French, 20,000 of our people do not speak French; 100,000, perhaps, have deserted the temples of the true God. We have no right to judge our minorities but we have the duty of helping them."

This same ecclesiastical authority stated that Quebec now represents only 75 per cent of the French Canadians in Canada and only 50 per cent of those of French race in North America. The disappearance of the other minority groups outside of Quebec, would render difficult the survival of the French ethnic group in Quebec, he said.

Humiliating admissions such as the above, wrung from the lips of a Quebec priest by the force of cold, hard facts must surely give pause to the most ardent of French Canadian nationalists. They cannot be entirely blind to the handwriting on the wall. It is impossible that a pitifully small minority of French Roman Catholics locked within the tightly woven social and religious structure of one province can withstand the enormous pressure of a whole populous continent that is predominantly English-speaking and Protestant. Little wonder that there are bitter disputes within the sacred enclosure of our French and Catholic province as to whether it is not the best strategy for French Canadians to emerge from their monastery and throw in their lot with their Irish Catholic brethren elsewhere, becoming full fledged citizens of a great continent.

The severe losses the Church of Rome has suffered among French Canadians also explains the desperate efforts of the priests to repress and restrict any further inroads among their flock by French-speaking missionaries from non-Romanist groups. In the measure that they succeed in their persecution of evangelical groups, the priests of Quebec will succeed in driving their hitherto docile flocks out of their folds and into the maw of communist and secularist wolves.

The State of Israel.

Whatever the rights and wrongs may be of the Arab-Jewish dispute, there can be no shadow of doubt about the high ideals of the people of Israel and their desire to make the new State as progressive as possible. In this they are in the happy position of being able to call upon first class scientists, technicians and business men from among the immigrants, who have come from America, England, and indeed from almost every part of the world.

Just recently the Government have issued a small illustrated folder in Hebrew giving some interesting statistics of the progress of the new State, between the years 1948 and 1955. Amongst other items it shows that the number of workers in agriculture, industry and the public services has doubled during the seven years, and that three hundred thousand rooms have been built.

In education there are now some two hundred and sixty five thousand Hebrew pupils, as against one hundred and two thousand in 1948, while the number of Arab scholars has trebled. Last year too a State National Insurance Scheme was started, covering the aged, widows and orphans, maternity and sickness, and also industrial accidents.

All kinds of industrial projects have been financed and undertaken from the development of the natural resources of the Dead Sea to oil prospecting. The extent of these developments is shown by the increase in the production of electricity from one hundred and sixty nine kilowatts to seven hundred and fifty one kilowatts.

The medical, social and religious needs have been remembered and provided for, though the increase in hospital accommodation does not seem to have gone forward as rapidly as the industrial side. In 1948 there were sixty three hospitals, but only about another thirty have been added in the seven years; but one does find that “bed” accommodation has been increased from four thousand six hundred to ten thousand. In the running of the State there are municipalities, district councils, local councils and local committees and welfare officers. That the Government is also very conscious of the importance of religion is shown by the fact that two hundred and fifty new synagogues have been built.

What, however, has gone ahead with amazing speed and efficiency is agriculture and land development. The desert has indeed been made to blossom as a rose. Village settlements have doubled and land cultivation nearly trebled, whilst irrigation schemes have been increased to a still greater degree. The fishing industry has not been forgotten, and the annual yield of vegetables and citrus fruit has risen considerably.

Headway has also been made with transport and travel, e.g., the number of railway passengers has increased from eight hundred and thirty thousand to three million.

A form of Government has been established with a Knesset (Parliament) and three hundred and twenty nine independent laws have been adopted. Abroad the State of Israel is represented in forty one countries by diplomatic representatives of various grades.

If only peace can be established in the Middle East, the State of Israel, with its “new look” and high aspirations could indeed regain much of its past glories and become perhaps a cultural centre, and the Holy Land, with its Christian, Jewish and Moslem associations, help to knit together the nations in a bond of fellowship.

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Saints of England.

His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury is reported to have made a forthright pronouncement, on the question of canonizing saints in the Church of England. Preaching at Oxford, in a course on the Creed, he said:—

"People sometimes suggest—and every suggestion, good or bad, sooner or later comes to me—that we ought to canonise more saints in the Church of England. Please God, we shall not. Once you start, there is no end to who is to go in and who is to be left out. The advantage of canonizing was once described to me in the terms that, once a person is canonized, we no longer have to pray for him; being a saint, we can ask him to pray for us. That seems to me contrary to the whole feeling and nature of the Christian religion. This habit of asking the saints for their prayers sounds very nice, but I have never been able to find the slightest justification for it. At the bottom, there is always the fatal idea of trying to get something out of authority, and going to someone who can exercise his influence."

Lodge Burnt "in Malice."

A decree for £160 was awarded to the trustees of the Masonic Lodge, The Mall, Sligo, when they sued Sligo Corporation and Sligo County Council in Sligo Circuit Court for £171 for malicious damage to their premises in July last.

Det. Sergt. J. Feighan, Sligo, said the premises were broken into, and there was evidence of a fire. A can containing paraffin was lying on the ground.

A man had admitted breaking into the premises, and had already served a sentence for his part in the crime.

Judge Lynch said he was satisfied that there was malice.

Mission Hall Burned—Fire Caused by "Evil Minded Persons."

The burning of a wooden hut the property of the Faith Missions at Coolrain, Mountrath, on the night of July 29 was recalled at Portlaoise Circuit Court when Edward Fox, 16 Ballygal Road, Finglas, Dublin, brought a claim against Laois Co. Council for £600.

Granting a decree for £187 17s. 6d. Judge Deale said the fire was caused by some evil minded person, who did not like the Missions.

Burned to Ashes.

Edward Fox, Leader of the Missions in Eire, said the hut was taken to Coolrain by Messrs. Chestnut and McGee, who were to conduct a mission there.

James Chestnut said the hut was subjected to stone throwing on two occasions during Service. When he left it on July 29 at 10.30 p.m. it was all right, but when he saw it again, it was burned to ashes.

"Religious Medals Used in Gas Meters."

Evidence that religious medals were "very often" used instead of shillings to obtain gas from gas meters was given before District Justice McCarthy in the Dublin Children's Court recently.

A boy, aged 14, was charged with stealing £2 11s. 0d. from a gas meter at a flat at 88 Upper Dorset Street, Dublin, on November 14 last. He was also charged with stealing £4 10s. 0d. from the same premises during last July.

In a statement made by the boy and read in Court, he said that he broke open the gas meter and took the money, but left behind four medals that he found in the meter.

Mr. P. Duffley, an Inspector of the Alliance and Dublin Consumers' Gas Company told the Justice that the medals would work the meter and obtain a shilling's worth of gas. They were very often used in his experience.

Mr. Rory O'Connor, solicitor, defending, said that the medals had also been known to work automatic telephones.

The tenant of the flat in question said that her little girl sometimes put the medals into the meter.

The Justice remanded the case to March 13, on the defendant's mother undertaking to pay £7 compensation.

The Pope May Announce Finding of Relics of St. Peter.

The Holy Father may soon announce that bones found during excavations at St. Peter's Basilica are those of St. Peter, states a message from Rome.

If the Pope confirms that the bones are those of the Apostle, there will be brought to a triumphant conclusion 15 years of daring excavation beneath the colossal bulk of the Basilica.

In his Christmas message to the world in 1950, the Pope announced the finding of St. Peter's tomb directly beneath the High Altar of St. Peter's.

In his Christmas message the Pope said: "The essential question is—has the tomb of St. Peter really been rediscovered? To this question the final conclusion of the excavations and of the researches replies with a most clear 'Yes.' A second question, subordinate to the first concerns the relics of the Saint, have they been found?"

"At the edge of the sepulchre were found the remains of human bones of which, however, it is not possible to prove with certainty that they belong to the mortal body of the Apostle. This leaves intact, however, the historic reality of the tomb."

Total secrecy has descended for the past five years on the fate of the bones. It was believed, however, that they were carried with the deepest veneration to the Pontiff's private chapel next to his bedroom on the third floor of the Vatican Palace and it was reported that he had ordered a detailed scientific study of them.

The Pope's statement, the Reuter message continues, that it was impossible to prove that they were the bones of St. Peter indicated that the first result of the studies was negative. But it is now hinted that later research has established the existence of fragments of an entire body, less the head.

According to ancient tradition, the head of St. Peter, together with the head of St. Paul is preserved in the High Altar of the Lateran Basilica of St. John in Rome and some historians hold that the Emperor Constantine, the first Imperial convert to Christianity, presented St. Peter's head to the Lateran church when in the fourth century he built the first Basilica of St. Peter exactly above the tomb of the Apostle.

Scandinavia—Most Protestant Part of the World.

To-day, there are 52,000 Roman Catholics in Scandinavia though a quarter of this number were not born there, but have come as immigrants or refugees. There have been relatively few conversions to Roman Catholicism in the Northern countries. Denmark has 27,000 Roman Catholics, Sweden 18,000, Norway 5,000, and Finland 2,000. Two-thirds of Sweden's Roman Catholics are aliens who came to Sweden during or after the last war.

Turkey—Anti-Greek rioters destroy Orthodox Churches.

Istanbul, for many centuries known as Constantinople, was the scene of large scale anti-Greek rioting in September. The riots were a reaction to the current Greek demand for sovereignty over Cyprus with its large Turkish minority, which the Greeks have themselves expressed by means of violence and terrorism. That, however does not excuse what has happened in Istanbul. The General Secretary of the World Council of Churches described the attack upon church buildings as "one of the worst calamities that has befallen any Christian Church in our time, and adds a further tragic chapter to the story of the sufferings of the Eastern Orthodox Church."

Of the 80 Orthodox churches in and around Istanbul, sixty were either destroyed by the mobs, or their interiors were so badly damaged as to render them completely unusable. Almost all of the seventy Greek-language schools were damaged in various degrees.—"Protestant Reville," 1955, South Africa.

Statistics and Facts.

We take the following from "The Bulwark" (Scottish Reformation Society, Dec., 1955). It seems to show how carelessly large figures are given to the public, and will lead many to doubt the reliability of such "sound numbers".

Back Numbers.

To have the present volume of Whitaker's Almanack is to have a very useful thing, for so much, and such varied knowledge, is there at your disposal. But if you have a batch of Whitakers going back for a number of years, then let me tell you, you are rich indeed. They may be back numbers in the sense that they belong to past years, but the light they throw on the past and on the present is indeed invaluable. Now I have been reading a book which dealt more than once with the Roman Catholic method of dealing with figures, and though not very good at figures, I have always a great deal of curiosity regarding them, so I remembered Whitaker, and wondered what it said on the subject. Here then at my elbow is a little pile of Whitakers, and I take the volumes up one by one to see what they have to say about Roman Catholic numbers.

AN ACCOUNT OF ARCHBISHOP JAMES USHER

"THE REAL PRESENCE."

James Usher had a life-long concern with Protestant doctrine. He steadfastly laboured to show that the teaching of the Reformed Church was not only Scriptural, but in harmony with Christian antiquity. That was, as we have seen, the purpose of his treatise on the religion anciently professed by the British and Irish Christians. It was the object he had set before him early in life, as a result of which he had imposed upon himself the taste of reading all the available works of the early Christian writers. He was thus equipped to defend the Reformed position, and to answer the criticisms of Roman Catholic theologians who in Usher's day, as now, assume that the reformers introduced novelties into the faith. For Usher "the judgment of antiquity" was the thing to seek. It elucidated Holy Scripture, and it revealed "the novelty of the now Romish doctrine."

* * *

When Bishop of Meath, about 1624, Usher completed his answer to a challenge put to him some time before by an Irish Jesuit, the Rev. William Malone (1586-1656). William Malone (at one time superior of the Irish College in Rome, and later superior of the Irish Jesuits, and finally of the Jesuit College at Seville, Spain) put his challenge in a plain and comprehensive way—he said to Usher "Your doctors and masters grant that the Church of Rome for four or five hundred years after Christ did hold the true religion. First, then, I would know what bishop of Rome did first alter that religion which you commend in them of the first four hundred years? In what Pope's reign was the true religion overthrown in Rome?"

"Next, how can your religion be true, which disalloweth of many chief articles which the saints and fathers of that primitive Church of Rome did generally hold to be true? For they of your side who have read the fathers of that unspotted church can testify that the doctors, pastors and fathers of that church do allow of traditions; the real presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar; that they exhorted people to confess to ghostly fathers; that they affirmed that priests have power to forgive sins; that they taught there is a Purgatory; that there is a Limbus Patrum; that prayer to saints and the use of holy images was of great account among them; that man hath freewill and for his meritorious works receiveth through the assistance of God's grace everlasting happiness."

"Will you say that these fathers maintained these opinions contrary to the Word of God?"

It may be noted that there is nothing out of date in the topics brought forward for argument. Even if controversial fires have died down Fr. Malone's points ought to be studied by anybody who gives serious attention to the claims of Rome; and James Usher's answer to these points is not obsolete. It remains a mine of precious knowledge and sound judgment which has been diligently worked by many down to our own day.

Usher (who took his stand on the ground that the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion of the Church of England disallowed no article of religion which the primitive saints and fathers held to be true generally, neither did they allow any one point of doctrine which those fathers held to be untrue), replied to the challenge "1. We do not hold that Rome was built in a day, therefore it is vain to require from us the name of any one bishop by whom the Babylonish confusion was brought in. 2. A great difference is to be put betwixt heresies which openly oppose the foundations of our faith, and that apostacy which the Spirit hath evidently foretold should be brought in. 3. The original of errors is often so obscure and their breed so base, no wise man will marvel if in a tract of time the beginnings of many of them should be forgotten."

"Such is that sacrilege of yours whereby you withhold the use of the Cup in the Lord's Supper; as also your doctrine of Indulgences and Purgatory."

The errors, he says, came in "while men slept."

* * *

The "Answer to a Jesuit" examines the teaching of Scripture and the ancient church, and the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church on the following subjects. Tradition, the Real Presence, Confession, the Priests' power to forgive sins, Purgatory, Prayer for the Dead, Limbus Patrum and Christ's Descent into Hell, Prayer to Saints, Images, Free Will, Merits. The reader can imagine what a vast range of Scripture and Christian teaching is covered in this book, and how the long years of study since Usher was a pupil of Walter Travers and Luke Challoner were needed in order that real facts might be brought forward, and the evolution of Roman Catholic doctrines might be traced.

Of course it is to be remembered that the modern theory of "development" was scarcely thought of in the seventeenth century. Men then held that primitive Christians believed what was taught in the Roman Catechism. It was Usher's task to show by the indisputable evidence of the fathers that the faith once delivered to the saints had undergone serious change, but that in the time of the Reformation in the previous century a return had been made to the teaching of the New Testament and of Antiquity.

* * *

As it would take too much space to give a full account of this "Answer", which is indeed one of Usher's major works, we shall content ourselves with a survey of the chapter which discusses the primitive teaching about the Real Presence of our Lord in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This will, we think, enable the reader to understand the general character of Usher's work, and his reluctance to speculate or strive after an individual opinion.

Usher begins by giving a summary of a sermon he preached in Westminster before the English House of Commons in 1620. "In the receiving of the blessed Sacrament we are to distinguish between the outward and the inward action of the Communicant. In the outward, with our bodily mouth we receive really the visible elements of bread and wine; in the inward, we do by faith really receive the body and blood of Our Lord; that is to say, we are truly and indeed made partakers of Christ crucified to the spiritual strengthening of our inward man."

"They of the adverse part, for the first, do utterly deny that after the words of consecration there remaineth any bread or wine at all to be received; and for the second, do affirm that the body and blood of Christ is in such a manner present under the outward shows of bread and wine, that whosoever receiveth the one (be he good or bad, believer or unbeliever) doth therewith really receive the other."

"Touching our Saviour's speech of the eating of his flesh and drinking of his blood, in the sixth of John, these five things specially may be observed—1, the question between our adversaries and us being, not whether Christ's body be turned into bread, but whether bread be turned into Christ's body, the words in St. John if they be pressed literally, serve more strongly to prove the former than the latter. 2, this sermon was uttered by our Saviour about a year before the celebration of his Last Supper, at which time none of his hearers could possibly have understood him to have spoken of the external eating of him in the Sacrament. 3, by the eating etc. is not here meant an external eating, but an internal and a spiritual, effected by a lively faith and the quickening Spirit of Christ in the soul of the believer. 4, this spiritual feeding is not to be found in the Sacrament only, but also out of the Sacrament. 5, the eating of the flesh and drinking of the blood is of such excellent virtue that the receiver is thereby made to remain in Christ and Christ in him, and by that means certainly freed from death, and assured of everlasting life. Which seeing it cannot be verified of the Sacrament whereby both the godly and the wicked are partakers, it proveth, not only that our Saviour did not here speak of the sacramental eating, but also, that the thing which is delivered in the external part of the sacrament cannot be conceived to be really, but sacramentally only, the flesh and blood of Christ."

Usher then elaborates these five points, and illustrates them by quotations from many of the ancient fathers of the church. He adds the useful and significant piece of information that many Roman Catholic writers acknowledge that our Saviour in John VI did not properly treat of the Sacrament. He names among them Biel, Cusanus, and Jansenius. These were men of no mean stature in their day.

Usher, like the Reformers, leaned a good deal upon St. Augustine. Augustine dominated the theological thought of the West till the seventeenth century, partly because of his profound insight into human nature, partly because of his diligent study of the Bible, and partly because he wrote on so many different matters that he could be quoted with advantage in most issues. Augustine affirmed that the wicked "may not be said to eat the body of Christ" ("City of God," XXI. 25.).

"The distinction between the Sacrament and the thing whereof it is a Sacrament is thus expressed by St. Augustine. 'The Sacrament of this thing is taken from the Lord's table; by some unto life, by some unto destruction: but the thing itself whereof it is a sacrament is received by everyman unto life, and by none unto destruction, that is made partaker thereof.'"

Usher leads us to the same result by showing that the words of institution in the Lord's Supper have like meaning. He reminds us that the words are not "This shall be My body" etc. but "This is My body"; that the word this can have relation to no other substance but that which was then present when Our Saviour spoke that word; which was bread. Then, when it is proved that the word this demonstrates the bread, it must necessarily follow, that Christ affirming that to be His body, cannot be thought to have meant it to be so in a literal, but only in a relative and sacramental sense. As various Roman Catholic divines before Usher's day, such as Cardinal Bellarmine, acknowledged that the words of Our Lord "This is My body" meant that the bread may be the body of Christ significatively, the question to be settled was "did our Saviour mean anything to be His body but the bread which was before Him?" It is settled by this chain of reasoning—In Luke 22. 19 we have the words "He took bread . . . and gave it unto them saying 'this is My body'". "For what did He demonstrate here, and said was His body but that which He gave to His disciples? What did He give unto them but what He brake? What brake He but what He took? And doth not the text expressly say that He took bread? Was it not therefore of the bread He said, 'this is My body'? And could bread possibly be otherwise understood to have been His body but as a sacrament, and memorial thereof?"

Usher confirms this by citing St. Paul's words in 1 Cor. 10. 16 "The bread which we break, is it not the Communion of the body of Christ?" When St. Paul says "the bread which we break" he speaks of a breaking which is an accident properly belonging to the bread, and not to the body of Christ, which being in glory, cannot be subject to any more breaking. So the apostle by bread understands bread indeed.

* * *

Next, Usher asks "what other interpretation can be given of those words of St. Paul 'This cup is the New Testament in My blood' than that the cup, or what is contained in it is a sacrament of the New Testament?" That is that it figures the New Covenant, but is not the New Covenant itself, so he expresses his argument from the words of institution thus—

"If it be true that Christ called bread His body, then it must be true that what He honoured with the name cannot be really His body, but figuratively and sacramentally.

"But the former is true; therefore also the latter." "The first proposition is proved by the principles of right reason: the second by the text of the evangelists, by the exposition of St. Paul, and by the received grounds of the Romanists themselves. The conclusion therefore resteth firm; and so we have made it clear, that the words of the institution do not only not uphold, but directly overthrow the whole frame of that which the Church of Rome teacheth touching the corporal presence of Christ under the forms of bread and wine."

"If I should lay down all the sentences of the Fathers which teach that that which Christ called His body is bread in substance and the body of the Lord in significance and sacramental relation, I should never make an end."

Usher does, however, give quotations from the Fathers of enough variety to justify his claim that they did not believe in the transubstantiation of the bread and wine. Their testimony supports the reforming tradition in which Usher stood. He claimed to have set out evidence sufficient to convince the impartial, but admits that his Roman Catholic adversaries are men, whom "neither sense nor reason, neither authority of Scriptures or of Fathers can persuade . . . unless we show unto them in what Pope's days the contrary falsehood was first devised." He suggests that the literal interpretation of Christ's words became popular through delusive notions put forward by men of influence. He quotes words of Paschasius Radbert who was one of the first to put forward this doctrine that Christ in the sacrament did show Himself "offentimes in a visible shape, or in the colour of flesh and blood, so that while a host (consecrated wafer) was a breaking a lamb in the priest's hands, and blood in the chalice should be seen, that what lay hid in a mystery might, to them that yet doubted, be made manifest in a miracle." Radbert belonged to the early Middle Ages, and to a period in which Eucharistic controversy was active. Credulity was not peculiar to him, but it was, for a time at least, combatted by Church authority. The council of Constantinople in A.D. 754 affirmed the bread to be the body of Christ, not in nature, but as "a true image of His natural flesh."

Usher suggested that about the time of Pope Gregory IV, in the ninth century (i.e. some eight hundred years after Christ) there were some who talked and wrote about the bread and wine being "turned into a reasonable nature, to wit, of the body and blood of Christ." Nevertheless, the bishops of France were still ready to affirm that "the bread and wine are spiritually made the body of Christ."

Even as late as the eleventh century the true spiritual character of the Eucharist was generally held. Not until Pope Innocent III at the Lateran Council in A.D. 1215 published the dogma of Transubstantiation did the Church of the West exclude the primitive and evangelical truth.

* * *

Thus Usher shows that the reformed churches may claim to have restored "the faith of the Fathers". Not the reformers, but their opponents were the innovators.

* * *

Usher closes his book with the remark that now Fr. Malone when he reads the evidence will find that the Protestants "are not strangers to the original and first breedings of these Romish errors" as he imagined. But as a good Christian he wishes, as Malone did, that all "may be done with Christian charity and sincerity, to the glory of God, and instruction of them that are astray."

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE UNIQUENESS OF CHRIST.

Probably all our readers readily accept the fact of the uniqueness of Our Lord Jesus Christ, but it may be useful to remind ourselves of some of the reasons we have for thus regarding Him.

The word "unique" admits of no degrees—a thing cannot be "rather unique" or "fairly unique": it is either the only thing of its kind, or it is not unique at all—merely rare or unusual. We therefore understand by "the uniqueness of Christ" that He has no rivals or competition within the Christian fold. In the world outside there has never been one like Him.

It is true of course, that there have been leaders of other religions who were excellent men as far as we know. There have been founders of religious movements who deserve to be respected, such as Gautama, or the pioneers of the Ba' hai sect, but though these may have resemblances to Our Lord in one way or another they are notably different. They are sinful men, born in sin, and needing to be saved, but Our Lord Jesus Christ was not born in sin, and is the only one who did not need to be saved. They can only reveal human nature at its highest, or near it, but Our Lord can do that better, and also can reveal the Divine Nature. He, unlike them, is "of one substance with the Father."

1. Our Lord has the uniqueness which comes from completely different antecedents from the rest of mankind—of us the Psalmist's words are true "Behold I was shapen in wickedness and in sin did my mother conceive me." Our conception is for us the beginning (we leave aside the old problems of creationism and traducianism). But Holy Scripture tells us that Our Lord Jesus Christ is unique in His derivation. In the first chapter of St. John's Gospel we read of Him "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God." No human antecedents can be traced further than the first parents of our race, but Our Lord's antecedents are from eternity, there never was a time when He was not. If any venture to say that the translation of John I. 1. is inaccurate: that instead of rendering it "... the Word was God" it ought to be "... the Word was a God" he is taking a heathen not a Christian view, for he is committing himself to polytheism as he plainly believes in more than one God. Christians are monotheists, and the Authorised Version translation here is correct. The translators knew Greek as well as theology.

Also, we may turn to another passage in this Gospel. In chapter XVII 5 we read in the prayer Our Lord addressed to the Father these words—"Now, O Father, glorify Thou me with Thine own Self with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was." The phrase "the glory which I had with Thee before the world was" testifies to a heavenly existence before the Incarnation, and this marks the distinction between common humanity and the Son of God as regards derivation.

2. The birth of Our Lord was unique in that as the Scriptures foretold, He would be born of a Virgin, and in fact was born of the Blessed Virgin Mary at Bethlehem.

His Father is God, not Joseph. It was declared of Him by the Angel Gabriel "He shall be great, and shall be called 'the Son of the Highest'". His Conception was through the Holy Spirit—the Angel said to Mary—"the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke I 35).

Jesus Himself indicated this when He told Mary and Joseph "I must be about My Father's business" (Luke II 49), and when He referred to His task "My Father worketh hitherto and I work" (John V. 17).

The pre-existent, or pre-incarnational glory was for a time obscured by the limitations of earthly life, but was resumed on His return to the Father "I ascend unto My Father and your Father" (John XX. 17).

No incredulity need greet the story of the Virgin Birth. Admittedly it is unique: but why not?

The Son of God had not been incarnate before. Ordinary men and women, heirs of the Fall come into this life in the ordinary way, but Our Lord Jesus Christ is not heir to the Fall. He is the Second Adam who came to undo the effect of the Fall, and to display the character of unfallen human nature.

He had "the likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. VIII 3), but He knew no sin, hence it is no incredible tale, more suitable for classical fables, that He should be Virgin Born. The only criticism of it is that it has not happened since, and it had not happened before. But uniqueness is not evidence of non-occurrence.

3. The nature of Our Lord is dual. He is human and divine. It may be hard to think of the union of divine and human, and it has been a temptation to some to say that the Incarnation is like some ancient Greek story of one of the spurious gods of Olympus. But we have all known people in whom what we call "the better side" of human nature was uppermost, and some in whom the lower side prevailed. "The better side" suggests the persistence of "the image of God" even though sadly obscured. We also speak sometimes of "the divine spark" within us. Now, if we can recognise in man a measure of goodness, a light of God, it ought not to be beyond our powers to recognise the possibility of One who is divine and human; One who is at once God and man, not by converting the God-head into flesh, but by taking the manhood into God. In this respect Our Lord is unique, but it is not an unbelievable uniqueness, because we are "broken lights" of God. "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us full of grace and truth"—that ought to rejoice the hearts of all good men. If they but knew it, it ought to rejoice the hearts of bad men, for He took our nature in order to redeem us, and to the bad He proclaims the reality of deliverance and forgiveness through the blood shed for us.

* * *

4. His service—service of God and men, is another sign of His uniqueness. Many men have served God very wholeheartedly—let us note that the more loyally and lovingly they served Him the more they were being inspired by Christ's example. Many of us recall the old story (how true we cannot say) of Voltaire the French sceptical writer being asked if he could find one as perfect in his life as Jesus. Voltaire promptly answered "Fletcher of Madeley" (an English evangelical vicar of Swiss origin). He did not appear to have reflected on why Fletcher was so holy and devoted. It was not original goodness, but the humble following of Jesus, this sincere and patient faith, which made Fletcher a conspicuous example of grace. But Voltaire, needless to say, took no account of grace.

The service Our Lord rendered to God began with concentration of all the energies of life into a single channel—"I come to do Thy will, O God" (Hebr. X 7, Psalm XL 7.). Hence when St. Peter reflected upon Our Lord's earthly ministry he was able to say that "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power; who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed with the devil; for God was with Him" (Acts X 38).

Of the uniqueness of His service there can be no greater definition than St. Paul's—"He hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" (2 Cor. V 21).

* * *

5. In further contrast with the common lot of mankind we see the Resurrection of Our Lord. It is true that one day His people will experience resurrection, and that He is "the first fruits of them that slept" (1 Cor. XV 20, 23). But His resurrection was, and remains, unique in human experience. It was not paralleled by Lazarus even, for Lazarus rose to die again, but Christ "being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him" (Rom. VI 9).

We see too His Ascension. True, Elijah ascended, and maybe, Enoch. But Christ's ascension was a resumption of His rightful place, and was something He foretold He would effect. Not so Elijah or any other person.

His glorification is not an honour done Him in recognition of His work (though some words of the N.T. taken by themselves might be so understood). It is the return of the victorious King to the place from which He went out to fight and conquer sin. "He went forth conquering and to conquer" (Rev. VI 2). He resumed His glory, i.e. His crown, sceptre, and throne. By faith we see Him now "crowned with glory and honour" (Heb. II 9)—no other religious leader men have followed through the ages can be the present object of our faith and the future joy of our experience. So also, we say of no other leader that he is "our hope" (1 Tim. I 1).

* * *

6. Again, we must define Our Lord's relationship with God in ways which show it to be different from our own. The oft-quoted text, 1 John I 1 "The Word was with God" etc. is enough to guide us here. The Word "took our nature upon Him." It is not a man who becomes God, but God who takes manhood unto Himself.

So, also we recognise a uniqueness in Christ's relationship with His fellow-men on earth. He took foremost place. He taught, He healed, He controlled. Others may have done so, but He did it in a new way—"I am among you as He that serveth" (Luke XXII 27).

Now, ascended and in glory we find Him fulfilling His promise "I am with you always" (Matt. XXVIII 20). His followers recognise, as did His apostles, when they are doing His will "the Lord is working with them, and confirming the word with signs following" (Mark XVI 20).

* * *

7. Finally, we recognise His uniqueness when we accept the words of St. Paul—"God hath highly exalted Him and given Him a name which is above every name, that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things on earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. II 9-11).

The prophecy or promise made by Gabriel when announcing the conception and birth of Our Lord is fulfilled. Christ is not only the revelation of God, but He is the one for whom all things are. It is the Father's will to "gather up" all things in Him.

* * *

Christ's superiority over all other claimants for man's allegiance is thus shown. There can be no second Christ. His place, ministry and accomplishment are unique.

PLANTING THE GOSPEL IN SOUTH MALAYA.

The withdrawal of the C.I.M. from China in 1951 coincided with the big venture by the Government of Malaya in re-settling many thousands of scattered Chinese labourers in New Villages to protect them from Communist terrorists. The majority of these workers in tin mines, rubber estates and market gardens had never heard the gospel. Four years have elapsed since then, and there are now about eighty of our missionaries at work in the Federation—some in the Anglican field in the north, and some in the south.

Right from the beginning the type of work undertaken in South Malaya could be divided into two kinds.

There were those who went to towns at the invitation of other missions already working there, and co-operated with them in building up the work of existing churches. Some of our missionaries, e.g. those at Pontian, were occupied in this kind of work for a limited period of time and then went elsewhere; other centres such as Kluang in Johore, Sungei Chua in Selangor, and Kenmamsur in Pahang are still getting this kind of assistance from C.I.M. missionaries. In Kuala Lumpur, where the H.Q. of the South Malayan field is situated, those who live there give part-time help to existing churches by teaching in Sunday Schools and Bible Classes, and preaching by invitation at Sunday Services.

Let us pray that God will use His servants to challenge the Christians to a life of full surrender to the claims of Christ and to lead them out to evangelize the surrounding villages. Could not this be one of God's answers to the crying need for labourers in His harvest field in Malaya?

The other type of work undertaken has been pioneering in New Villages where no Christian work had been done previously and no local church already existed.

When the missionaries took up residence in these New Villages they made careful enquiries to find out if there were any Christians living in the village. Sometimes a few were found. In Cha'ah there were seven born again Christians who wished to unite with the C.I.M. missionaries and form themselves into the local Christian church, and not long after the church was established other converts were added to their number. The church continued to grow, and after about three years they had contributed enough money to build themselves a chapel of their own.

In two of the other villages, namely Pendaran and Bekok (east of Cha'ah, on the railway), work was started by our mission, and the Lord has saved souls. Other missions then sent in pastors or evangelists to help in the establishment of a local church, and the continuation of the work in those centres has now been handed over to them.

Buloh Kasap (near Batu Anam) in Johore, and Serdang and Sungei Way in Selangor now have newly established local churches composed entirely of converts from Buddhist or pagan homes, except for one Christian in Serdang, who was there before the missionaries arrived. Every effort has been made to encourage these churches to be dependent on the Word of God and the Holy Spirit for spiritual nourishment and guidance, to manage their own financial affairs, and to undertake responsibility for evangelizing the surrounding areas. After a trial period, members of these churches in one village at least have been ordained as deacons to manage the business affairs of the church, and a fund has been started for the building of a local chapel.

In other New Villages the Lord has blessed the work, souls have been saved, and the new converts are being instructed in the Word of God. However, at the time of going to press, there have not been deemed enough adult converts, or perhaps there have not been sufficient male converts, for a local church to be organized as yet. There is a great need that in every New Village not only women and children, but men, and those gifted of God to become apostles, evangelists, pastors and teachers, may be saved and instructed in the truths of the Bible. Perhaps the reason that few men have been converted in some villages is because there are no male missionaries there to preach the gospel to them.*

Some villages which have only recently been occupied are still in the early pioneer stage. The missionaries are digging and sowing in virgin soil with perhaps few converts to encourage them. Living as they do in rented houses right amongst the people, they are subjected to a close scrutiny of their daily lives. Where there are trained nurses they may be helping in a daily clinic for the villagers, and hoping in this way to break down the barriers of suspicion. They are going from door to door seeking on every opportunity to preach the gospel to every creature.—“The Millions,” China Inland Mission Magazine, Dec., '55.

EXCUSE FOR PERSECUTION.

We have from time to time exposed persecution of Protestants in the Latin American country, Colombia, and many may think that such ferocious attacks on Protestant people resulting in the burning of churches and the grievous loss of life, are incredible in this day. But the evidence to support charges of systematic decimation of Protestant churches and groups at the hands of clerically-inspired Roman Catholic mobs in Colombia is beyond dispute, and, more tragic still, there has not been one symptom of regret or apology from the authorities in the country at these barbaric outrages. On the contrary, those in authority by their attitude give every suggestion that they condone the attacks as a contribution to maintaining, as they say, “the (Roman) Catholic unity of the country.”

In these days when the tendency is to whitewash the enemies and attackers of religious freedom, like Franco, the Roman Church is more and more openly proclaiming its policy and claim to the sole right to freedom. This, of course, implies the right to persecute those of another faith and we could not find a more blatant instance of the exercise of the alleged right of Roman Catholics to subjugate Protestants for the good of the “faith”, than in Colombia.

A translation of the inaugural speech of Lieut.-General Gustavo Rojas Pinilla, President of Colombia, made before the National Assembly on August 7, 1954, as given in The New Age of Washington, D.C., discloses with startling frankness, just why the persecution of Protestant churches is so rampant in that country. It is difficult to realize that the following words came from the lips of the President of a South American “republic” in this day:

“One of the problems which weigh upon the government, and for which we seek an amicable settlement, is that of Protestant propaganda. It goes without saying that, in Colombia, our constitution guarantees freedom of worship, and the government respects religious liberty to the extent that among us an individual may be born, live, be educated, and die in accordance with the tenets and rites of any religion he professes.

“However, (Roman) Catholic unity has been unquestionably the most solid foundation for nationality. If we add religious conflict to the bloody battles of political partisanship, we shall witness the dissolution of our country. But happily, towards the end of the nineteenth century and in the first decades of the present, the most sensible leaders of our parties eliminated the religious factor from political campaigns, accepting as fait accompli the (Roman) Catholic unity of this nation. The non- (Roman) Catholic minority respects the collective sentiment for practical reasons.”

Now here is the President, not a member of the hierarchy, enunciating as clearly as possible that no religious denomination, other than the Roman Catholic, has the right to an active existence in the country. When he says that freedom of worship is guaranteed by law he means that other churches can hold services and carry out their rites but only in private, and without any public indication that they even exist. They cannot expound their faith. As in Spain, the President's idea of propaganda which is forbidden no doubt excludes even the right to place the name of the church on the building or house where the Protestant sects meet for worship. It is the brand of freedom that the early Christians had when they had to flee to the catacombs. He seems to infer that the Protestants ought to be thankful they are permitted to meet in privacy—and that is the Colombian conception of religious freedom!

The reference to the Roman Catholic unity of Colombia, is a shibboleth that is repeated in every country where it is the policy to exclude every religion except that of Rome. In Spain and Italy the same phrase is used when the persecution of Protestants becomes imminent. It suggests that the Roman Church controls every phase of life in the country from the president or monarch down. And where it is effective, what is achieved resembles the unity of the cemetery as the country reverts to conditions of the dark ages. In South America this policy of making “Roman Catholic unity” the foundation of nationality has an economic side, for it has been used to discourage trade with the United States. The U.S.A., in the hierarchy's eyes in Latin America, is the embodiment of Protestantism and every inroad made by U.S. trade is regarded as a threat to the religious domination of the Roman Church. Extension of U.S. trade means the sending of business personnel to the various countries and these usually are mainly Protestants. That, too, was why Franco was careful to get all kinds of safeguards from Washington regarding the control of the actions of U.S. servicemen in the new bases in Spain. He wanted to keep the Protestants in their place.

* There are approximately three women to one man at work in the New Villages of the C.I.M. South Malayan field.

It is a benighted policy that nullifies progress, but it also helps explain why Roman Catholic countries regard the persecution of Protestants as not only justifiable, but legitimate. It also demonstrates, by the same token, why Roman Catholic domination encourages decadence in any country unfortunate enough to be afflicted with it.

Contradiction.

To my astonishment the first volume I take up, which is one of six years ago, gives me two estimates of the numbers of Roman Catholics in the world, and these two estimates have many millions between them. The first one does not tell me where the estimate comes from, but simply tells me that there are three hundred and thirty-one and a half millions of Roman Catholics in the world. Now that is a staggering figure. How did the compiler get it for one thing? A very rough and ready calculation tells me that to count a million at the rate of one number per second would take me over twelve days, counting day and night with no intervals for food and sleep. Now if I did that three hundred and thirty-one times it would take me over eleven years with no intervals, which is some considerable time. I know the calculation is quite absurd, but it shows the difficulty of dealing with such enormous figures. The other estimate, which is quoted from the Catholic Directory says that "the Catholic population of the world is estimated at three hundred and ninety-eight million, two hundred and seventy-seven thousand." I decline to make even a rough estimate about that, but notice that, in estimations of the kind, a mere trifle of sixty-six millions does not seem to matter at all.

Standstill.

I take up the next volume, and what do I find? Sensibly enough, one of the estimates has been dropped, and significantly enough, it is the lower one. But I find also that the Roman Catholic population of the world has risen very considerably, as estimated by the Catholic Directory, and stands now at four hundred and twenty-three millions. That means that in the course of the year Roman Catholic people have gone up by twenty-five millions, which is surely very creditable indeed. I wonder how long this is likely to go on and I consult the next volume. It surprises me, but in another way. The estimated Roman Catholic population of the world does not seem to have risen at all. It still stands at four hundred and twenty-three millions. And so indeed it has remained. For the Almanack for this year gives the same number exactly, no more and no less. I wonder what 1956 will bring forth. Will it break the deadlock, and resume the triumphant progress?

Hispanidad.

The underlying causes and the secret springs of the insurrection in Argentine can be traced to Hispanidad. Hispanidad is a Spanish word significant of an extensive movement with its main centre in Madrid, functioning as an element of the Latin Block; its activities operating almost entirely amongst the Latin elements of the American Continent. As a powerful fifth column Catholic Action Army, it is organised as a branch of the Franco Falanx, functioning from Mexico to Tierra Del Fuego. As a strong arm of Franco's "Great Christian Crusade," it is organised in "Centros de Hispanidad," and operates as a policy of the "Grand Strategists" of Catholic Action; for the conquest of the American Continent for the papal Church. Varieties of daily, weekly, and monthly periodicals, and propaganda literature of many kinds, are published in support of the papist religion and the papal political order.

Under cover of Spanish unity of race, culture, customs, ideals and religion, hostility is engendered against anything non-Roman; with the ultimate objective of the subjugation of the Western World to Spanish dictatorial Falangism. General Jordana, Franco's Foreign Minister, addressing the Hispanidad Council in Barcelona, on April 16th, 1943, asserted: "The Council is a germanically inspired organisation created for fifth column purposes in Spanish America." A feature article on Hispanidad, published in the "Sunday New York Times," March 16th, 1942, stated: "Members in Latin America, and other foreign Countries are required to obtain and report information and to propagate totalitarian doctrine and to undermine democracy."

The subject is of vital cosmic importance. The purpose of Hispanidad is to do in Latin America, what has been done in Spain, under Franco.

Rome and the Ecumenical Movement— Dangerous.

An article on "Ecumenicism" in "Thought" (Fordham quarterly) by Gustave Weigel, S.J., makes it clear that Catholics will never enter the ecumenical movement. "The Catholic insists," to quote from this article, "that men dare not judge God and His Word, and the word of God is spoken by the Catholic church only, for the divinely inspired Scriptures and the ecclesiastical tradition are merely two means whereby the church infallibly communicates her message. The moment a Catholic drops this point of view, he automatically ceases to be a Catholic. He implicitly drops his conviction when he is willing to drop any proposition taught by the church as the genuine word of God, or if he seriously enters into a conversation where the silently operating postulate is such a willingness." In other words Roman Catholics equate the Roman church with God and there is no rising above creeds to find an area of agreement among sects or churchmen.

A Successful Publication.

The United Church of Canada's booklet "What's the Difference?" has sold 120,000 copies in Canada in its first year of publication. A comparison of Protestant and Roman Catholic teachings, the booklet has been translated into Chinese for the Hong-kong area, and a French translation will soon be available. An American printing of 75,000 copies has come from the Abingdon Press in Nashville.

A Negro Priest Barred.

A strange report comes from New York via the "Daily Telegraph." It tells of the suspension of services at the St. Cecilia Mission, Jesuit Bend, by the R.C. Archbishop of New Orleans because the parishioners refused to allow the Rev. Gerald Lewis, a negro priest, to celebrate Mass. For the same reason the Archbishop has also reduced the services at another mission and a church which lies across the River Mississippi. The only reason for the opposition to the priest was admitted to be that he was a Negro. Apparently, therefore, the claim made by the Church of "universality" does not work out in practice although this coloured man was fully qualified and ordained by the Roman Catholic Church.—"Churchman's Magazine," Dec. '55.

The Bible in Germany.

The Association of Evangelical Bible Societies in Germany has issued its report for 1954 in which it is stated that 1,800,000 Bibles and Scripture portions were distributed in Germany during the year. The figures for 1953 and 1952 were 1,200,000 and 800,000 respectively. There are thirty-two Bible societies in Germany, the largest of them being the Privilegierte Wuerttembergische Bibelanstalt which has circulated more than thirty-seven million Bibles and portions since 1812 when it was founded.

Roman Catholicism Menaced in Brazil?

Roman Catholicism in Brazil is menaced by communism, Protestantism and "spiritualism": so says a report on religion in this country issued by the Apologetic Centre conducted by the Jesuit Order in Zurich, Switzerland, and summarised in a recent issue of our liberal Protestant magazine "Unitas". "Of all South American countries, Brazil is the one where Protestantism has made the most notable progress," says the report. "It is well organised for propaganda and enjoys good financial backing . . . Its educational effort is especially strong." The report lists Protestant schools in Brazil: 1 university (Mackenzie Institute in Sao Paulo city), 93 colleges, 468 primary schools with 55,850 pupils, 8,065 Sunday schools with 554,483 pupils, and 28 seminaries enrolling 1,426 students for the ministry. In social action, the Zurich report says, Brazilian Protestantism is also strong: it has 36 hospitals and sanatoriums and 70 orphanages and homes for the aged, and conducts 123 radio programmes in 60 cities. One reason for this situation, concludes the report, is that "religion in Brazil is superficial—a sentimental matter."—"Christian Century."

More Spanish Priests for Latin America.

What goes on at the great eucharistic congresses of Roman Catholicism other than the spectacular liturgical celebrations? Reports from Rio de Janeiro give some clues. They state that the recent congress in that city furnished an occasion for the Pope to exhort all the bishops of Central and South America to drastic action to relieve the clergy shortage in that part of the world. In an apostolic letter, Pius XII called this shortage the gravest problem confronting the papal church in Latin America. Religious News Service reports that "nearly all the conference sessions" of the bishops were given over to consideration of this lack of priests. The Pope suggested that the only way to deal with the problem on a short-term basis is to transfer great numbers of priests or other religious from other parts of the world. The bishops agreed, and, according to the R.N.S. report, expect to draw especially on Spain for this additional clergy. An organisation set up there by the Spanish bishops in 1949, the Obra de Cooperacion Sacerdotal Hispanoamericana (the Work of Priestly Co-operation in Spanish America), will send at least 200 Spanish priests yearly to various parts of Central and South America. Aside from the reflections a report of this sort starts on the claims that these Latin countries are not legitimate mission fields, it leads to other and more disturbing reflections on the probable future nature of Catholicism in the southern continent. The Roman Catholic Church south of the Rio Grande is already suffering from too much of the reactionary spirit of Spanish Catholicism.—“Christian Century.”—“The Vigilant,” Melbourne, 14/11/’55.

Luther's Works.

Plans for publication of a 55-volume English edition of the writings of Martin Luther that will require 15 years to complete were announced at the recent 43rd annual convention of the Lutheran Editors and Managers Association in Philadelphia. Co-operating in the project are the United Lutheran Publication House and Muhlenberg Press of Philadelphia and the Lutheran Church—Missouri Synod's Concordia Publishing House in St. Louis. Muhlenberg will publish 24 volumes covering Luther's sermons, letters, tracts and table talks, Concordia 30 volumes containing his Bible commentaries. Vol. 55 will be a general index to the entire edition. Helmut T. Lehman, book editor for Muhlenberg, is directing that press' translations, Prof. Jaroslav Pelikan of the University of Chicago divinity school those of Concordia.

The above information will be something of a surprise to those who have thought Martin Luther was just a monk with a limited education. He was a scholar of the first rank, and none at the University of Erfurt, where he was a professor, equalled him in erudition and scholarly attainments. Just how he managed to find time to record his experiences, write treatises and tracts and translate the Scriptures, sufficient to compile 55 volumes and at the same time carry his Reformation Message by the spoken, as well as the written word, must be one of the marvels of history. One thing is certain, it will establish once and for all that Luther was not only one of the most forceful personalities of the ages, but also one who was profound in intellect and learning.

R.C. Invitation to Join Overlooks Intolerance.

The Church calendar of the Century Baptist Church in Toronto, Canada, printed the following recently:

Archbishop Patrick A. O'Boyle, of Washington, D.C., issued a call to Protestants, Jews and all others who believe in God to put aside their differences and join with Roman Catholics in a crusade of prayer and protest against communist persecution of religion. He suggested that all faiths join together to demand a formal investigation by the United Nations of “this diabolical attempt to exterminate all religions.” But he did not mention Colombia.

Protestant religious life, in an organised fashion, has been practically wiped out in Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania, he said. But he did not mention Italy. Protestant missions and works of mercy in China have been closed. Any believer in God, any person whose conscience rebels against the great injustices of communism is considered an enemy of the great regime. But he did not mention Spain. “May I respectfully and humbly repeat this invitation to all believers in God,” Archbishop O'Boyle concluded, “indeed to all who recognise the dignity and worth of man to unite in a crusade against atheistic imperial communism.” But he did not mention Quebec.

R.C. Pressure in Guatemala.

Roman Catholic Archbishop Mariano Rosselly y Arellana recently demanded that the National Constituent Assembly give his church a “pre-eminent” position over other religions and establish compulsory Roman Catholic education in all schools in the new Constitution now being drawn up. The Archbishop threatened that otherwise the Roman Church would take “a position of estrangement” and non-collaboration, which he said would allow the communists to return.

The strongly worded demand was presented to a seventeen-member drafting committee which had approved, after bitter opposition from church advocates, two articles guaranteeing freedom of all religions “without any pre-eminence” and giving legal status to any religion or religious association. Another article guarantees freedom of education.—“The Churchman.”—“The Vigilant,” Melbourne, 14/11/’55.

PASSING EVENTS.

Eire To-day.

Dr. N. Browne, a former Minister of Health in Eire made the following statements, as reported in the "Irish Times," 11th Feb., 1956.

Speaking at a Fianna Fail meeting in Limerick, Dr. Noel C. Browne said it had been stated that one of the reasons why the Catholic Church lost control in France was because they allowed themselves to be confined to their sacristies. He wondered if there was not a comparable development occurring here in Ireland among a significant number of our politicians and political parties.

It appeared, he went on, that a situation was developing where our politicians were losing effective control of the important decisions of government. There was little or no new thought or national debate on new ideas permitted, or, at any rate, taking place. Seemingly the shrewder politicians tacitly accepted that there were certain subjects which might not be discussed. Even more significant was the fact that the shrewd politicians accepted that there were certain solutions for the really damaging problems of the thousands of jobless and the thousands of emigrants which it was not permitted to us to discuss.

Heterodox View.

"It now appears to be accepted amongst us in public life," he said, "that to hold the heterodox view, or try to debate its merits, will bring about political extinction, either of the politician or his party, or of both. In this way, it appears that the politician in the Republic is allowing himself to be strictly confined to discuss and debate only those matters which are really political irrelevancies in a country so near to financial destitution as is the Republic."

Dr. Browne said we appeared to be afraid to think or talk about or discuss any but the most trivial political platitudes in our political forums and debates. The most devastating condemnation by inference, of our useless social and economic theoretical solutions for the dilemmas facing politicians in a modern democracy was to be found in the Report of the Commission on Emigration. There was shown the cataclysmic decline of our population, the stagnation in our agricultural production. Over 1,000,000 acres of arable land had been allowed to go out of production in the last 50 years; we had the lowest standard of primary and technical education in Europe we had the highest number of unmarried young people per thousand of the population; our marriage rate was the lowest amongst white races; our relatively high preventable disease and death rate figures reflected the inadequacy and the inequity of our health services.

The Present Problem of Overseas Missionary Work—an English Bishop's view put to the recent Church Assembly in England.

The Bishop of Liverpool, Dr. Martin, presented a full report from the Assembly's Overseas Council. The revival of Islam was particularly concerning the Church from Indonesia to West Africa, for in many of those Moslem lands the Church was numerically weak. Islam numbered 370,000,000 adherents and was rapidly expanding, particularly in parts of Africa, where people were turning from tribal religions in search of a stronger faith. Islam did not demand the abandonment of polygamy.

In Africa, Dr. Martin said, there was a resurgence of paganism, sometimes to be found in the form of pseudo-Christian sects. The phenomenon of Mau Mau had brought the whole unfinished task of evangelism into sharp relief. Its stark opposition to the Christian faith had produced a number of African martyrs and their faithfulness unto death would in the end prove to be a source of strength to the Church.

In the Far East the Church worked in conditions of great complexity. In Japan there was a demand for well-trained clergy. The same sort of demand applied to the Chinese dioceses, involving 10,000,000 people and indeed wherever a new kind of social and civil life was emerging in South-east Asia.

Dr. Martin said that missionary work was not the same as it was fifty years ago or even as it was ten years ago. One of the most splendid contributions which people at home could make would be to help overseas students in England, of whom there were about twenty thousand at present. "We want these people to go back in a very real sense as Christian missionaries, but so often the reverse happens because of the treatment they receive here." He begged Christian people to welcome overseas students into their homes.

Dr. Martin recalled that in 1955 the Rev. J. Gilbert Baker, formerly of Guilford, Connecticut, had been appointed general secretary of the assembly's Overseas Council. He would also act jointly with Bishop J. Bentley, of the United States Episcopal Church, in directing Anglican missionary strategy throughout the world.

The Rev. C. N. Frank (London), who will shortly be leaving to work in Central Africa, stressed the need for constant prayer by people in England for those in the mission field. He also made an earnest plea to young priests "to avoid

CORRESPONDENCE.

A Correspondent from Northern Ireland writes to suggest that we augment the title of our paper by an adjective—"The National Catholic" or "The Celtic Catholic", or some similar phrase. The reason is to distinguish us from "Roman Catholic" or "Orthodox Catholic" (Greek). This is an interesting proposal, but we hesitate to commit ourselves to it since we have borne the simple title "The Catholic" for over sixty years. In an issue of over fifty years ago the founder, the Rev. Thomas Connellan, commented on the title, and wrote that no alternative commended itself to him. The simple title he chose implied that old orthodox evangelical Christianity is what we stand for. Old, as opposed to dogmas unknown to antiquity; orthodox as opposed to heresies past and present—Arianism and the other errors about the Incarnation; evangelical as opposed to all perversions of the teachings of Holy Scripture, the Christian's Rule of Faith.

We doubt if we can improve on our title, or find anything which will better define what we aim at. We treasure the word "Catholic" because it is the ancient certificate of scriptural orthodoxy, and Trinitarian faith. We do not surrender it to Rome; rather we deny Rome's claim to monopolise it, for the effect of that, if allowed, will be to acquiesce in the charge of heresy constantly brought against us. We are not heretical. We profess the faith of Holy Scripture and the primitive church: how better can we make that plain than by using the title "Catholic"?

This same Correspondent (whom we warmly thank for the interest shown) also suggests a change of cover. The proposal is that we should have an outline map of Ireland with a St. Patrick's cross in red and a shamrock design in the centre. We have of course a shamrock design already on the cover, but we will in due course take up this suggestion and give it attention.

Another Correspondent from Leeds kindly offers help in distribution of our paper, and we have sent him sample copies, and hope to hear further.

* * *

Yet another Correspondent (London) takes up the question of the word "Catholic" and holds it to be "unscriptural in expression, and non-scriptural in meaning."

We think that the word "unscriptural" means "not in accordance with, or not warranted by the Bible" (Chambers's Dictionary). Such a definition does not apply to the word "Catholic," for it does not contradict anything in Scripture or deny anything in Scripture. "Non-Scriptural in meaning" seems to imply that the word "Catholic" cannot rightly be used in connection with evangelical Christianity—if this is what is intended, we are bound to say that we do not agree, for many reasons, and among them for those stated above in reply to our Northern Ireland correspondent. The word "Protestant" is not in the New Testament, and it has a secular use as well as a religious one, as a dictionary will show. But we are all glad of it, and proud of it. Why should we not be glad of the word "Catholic," and proud to use it in its historic sense of "non-heretical"? Truly defined, the word has no essential difference from "evangelical and scriptural." What is true Catholic faith is what has been believed "everywhere, always, by all"—that certainly cannot be said of the Modern Roman Catholic Creed.

We regret to have to say that nowadays the word "Protestant" is used too loosely, and we ought to remember to say "evangelical Protestant," for we do not want to be put into the same category as Christian Scientists, Spiritists and Jehovah's Witnesses, etc. who may all be loosely termed "Protestant." When the Church of Ireland defined its position as at once "Catholic, Apostolic, Reformed, and Protestant" it was defining itself truly and comprehensively, and setting a headline for Orthodox non-Roman Christianity.

Our Correspondent, Mr. W. H. Harris, further says that his phrase "I believe in the Holy Church of God" (we gather it is in substitution for "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church") is preferable as "it distinguishes between the true spiritual House of God and all earthly churches or companies." We hope such a distinction is always in the minds of Christian people, but we cannot, of course, alter the venerable creeds which have come to us from antiquity.

The recognition that the Church of the Redeemed is not to be identified with any earthly organisation is, we hope, widespread. The Church on earth fails in many ways, and the Articles of the Church of England (and Ireland) truly declare "in the visible Church the evil be ever mingled with the good, and sometimes the evil have chief authority in the ministration of the Word and Sacraments . . ." (Art. 26). However it is to be deplored, we must remember Our Lord's parable of the wheat and the tares—"Let both grow together until the harvest."

Mr. Harris also suggests that it might be possible in quotations to indicate where it is proper to do so, that "Catholic" often means "Roman Catholic." We always hesitate to interfere with a quotation, even by a qualifying or explanatory insertion. But we shall endeavour, as in the past, to make clear that such quotations come from Roman Catholic sources, or are Roman Catholic utterances. This should avoid any misunderstanding.

* * *

A Correspondent who did not give a name (address—Elmhurst Road, N. 17, London) whose letter was not sent to us directly, and whose name we will be glad to receive, had much to say about Roman Catholic infiltration in public life in England. With these comments we thoroughly agree; and deeply regret also the steady vulgarisation of public entertainment, and the tendency prevalent everywhere to deprave rather than to edify to which the letter refers.

The advance of Roman Catholicism in public and in social life in Gt. Britain, and the mixed marriages with all the concomitants involved in the "Ne Temere" legislation of Rome are due, as our correspondent points out, to apathy and pre-occupation with self-centred ends and amusements.

Our paper does not devote space to this aspect of affairs in Gt. Britain because we are not well-enough informed about such current matters. We have always aimed at a deeper handling of the problems confronting ordinary people, by emphasising the teaching of Holy Scripture, by showing, on the best evidence of history and theology, the want of true foundations for Rome's claims, and by answering to the best of our ability the charges which are made against evangelical Protestant Christianity. We hope we do all this in a Christian spirit. Nothing would be gained by abusive or embittered language—it is best to let facts and reasons speak for themselves. Above all, it is best to let the teachings of the Bible be heard.

This correspondent reports experience of visiting two convents in England and finding that 50% of the children attending the schools attached are nominal Protestants. This is a serious situation, and quite unjustifiable. So-called Protestant parents ought to be far more enlightened than they are in such things. Probably they pride themselves on their "broadmindedness," their "liberal spirit" etc. Call it folly, for that is what it is, in a land where there is no dearth of schools of all sorts for all sorts. Some of these parents are Methodists and Congregationalists. That is what English non-conformity has reached to nowadays.

In this letter we are charged with being "more Roman Catholic than Protestant." When we got over the shock of this astounding accusation we looked through the issue of our paper for 1953, 1954, and 1955. How anyone who read recent issues (and all issues back for sixty years) could say such a thing leaves us utterly puzzled. We have constantly and patiently examined doctrines professed by the Roman Catholic Church. By the light of Holy Scripture and the Christian past we believe that we have fairly refuted them, and have always endeavoured to declare the Gospel and the superiority and truth of the evangelical faith founded upon it.

What we have not done, is to employ the tactics of low-grade journalism. We have not scolded or sneered. We have not used the language of exaggeration and overstatement. We have not employed words offensively. What need can there ever be of such things? Yet, it may be that the absence of such things is thought to imply tepidity, and a want of conviction. Far from it.

When we quote a Roman Catholic writer or paper we quote accurately. Protestants know better than to garble or alter quotations. It may therefore appear that we favour what we quote if we do not pen a comment in every case. But our impression was that the source of the quotation made it obvious that it was Roman Catholic, and therefore printed in our columns to show not what we think, but what a Roman Catholic says or thinks on a particular matter.

We do not ignore the Roman Catholic Church's actions in the world to-day. A good deal of space has been given; for instance, to the persecutions in Colombia in the past year or two—also from time to time, to repressive methods applied to Protestants in Italy and Spain. A survey of a twelvemonth will show that we cover a great variety of matters, even if we do not go into details of British politics and British domestic affairs.

We are grateful for the information this correspondent has given to us.

COMMENT I

"DISAPPEARING PROTESTANTISM."

"I assert that Protestantism, as a positive effort to give a Christian answer to life's problems, has ceased to exist, and the discordant voices of men like the Dean of Canterbury and Bishop Barnes are as bells that toll its passing."

"Thus spoke Rev. Seamus McLoughlin, D.Ph., S.T.L., M.A., Boyle, when he addressed members of the First Division C.I.E. Men's Sodality in Adam and Eve's Merchant's Quay, Dublin, recently.

"Dr. McLoughlin added: 'One hundred years from now Protestantism will be as dead as Arianism. It lives now only by compromising with each passing vogue of agnosticism, but it will persist as long in its social and cultural consequences.'

"Dr. McLoughlin said that we were living in 'an age which was predominantly one of crisis, of challenge and of conflict. The world of to-day was a battlefield in which every Catholic had a part to play, and hence rose the necessity of having an understanding of the forces that oppose us and the causes that brought this force into being.'

Father McLoughlin may have heard the story of King Charles II in his last illness, when he apologised to his doctors for being "an unconscionably long time dying." If so, he might take warning that Protestantism is not so speedily on the way out as he thinks.

We admit that it is possible "to give an answer to life's problems," even an answer which is given in a Christian framework, but will it be the right answer? Will it be true? Fr. McLoughlin may reply that the answer of the Infallible Church must be true: but for the non-Roman Catholic world that remains to be proved.

It must be a puzzle to men like Fr. McLoughlin who are reared in and conditioned by an authoritarian church to understand the variations and contradictions of Protestantism (taking the word in a very wide sense), but the fact is that none of us wants to give an untrue answer: each of us seeks to recognise the problems of life sincerely; therefore there are discordant voices in ventilating opinion. Where there is no discordance is in the general loyalty to the living Christ who gives to each faithful and devout seeker the answer appropriate for him.

We offer no universal explanations, and claim no master key which will unlock every problem of the human situation. We have, of course, our objective standard of truth, the Rule of Faith which is God's Word. The guide to the understanding of it is Christ Himself. We cannot hope to comprehend Him within the terms of a dogma. A dogma has no life: it is merely a definition. Christ is the living Lord, and loyalty may be, and is, given to Him among us rather than to a system.

We do not concur with the present Dean of Canterbury in all things—why should we? We respect the freedom of the Christian conscience, and we acknowledge the same Lord to whom we are answerable. We do not concur with the late Bishop of Birmingham, for we believe that he was mistaken in some very important matters, and would have preferred to see him as a private Christian rather than as a bishop. But at least this may be said, that Protestantism, Anglican or otherwise, is not afraid to bring the problems of faith out into the open, and to discuss them candidly. This procedure may be utterly alien to the Roman Catholic mind. It may seem to be "the bell that tolls the passing" of Protestantism, but what are the facts?

Vigorous Protestantism is found the world over. It is stronger to-day in the United States of America than ever before. In Great Britain, especially among younger people, there is far less indifference than there was a generation ago. Dr. Graham's meetings were not failures. He had not to close down in London or Glasgow for want of an audience. In any centre in these islands or the world over he would find a response: not because of himself, but because of his message.

In the new lands Christianity under non-Roman Catholic guidance is steadily rooting itself as for instance, in South India, and in the East Indies.

What about Roman Catholicism in France, Belgium, Italy, South America? Could one not argue from the state of those lands that religion is fading out? Dr. McLoughlin went on to speak of the evils of Communism. We agree with much of what he said, but can only regret the foolish effort to link Communism with Protestantism when he said (if we understand aright) that Communism "took the hatred of authority which marked the Reformation, joined hands with an exploited liberalism, and then deprived men of all freedom to make them cogs in a state machine."

Communism, as we have often pointed out, is a feature of Roman Catholic, or anyway, of non-Protestant States; Spain, Italy, France have had strong Communist sympathies, but democracies of a Protestant character appear to offer it little encouragement.

Communism "used atheism to impose upon men worship of an abstract deity called the state, and dragged those who refused to adore to the torture chamber and to the gallows."

May we be allowed to make an old-fashioned Protestant comment? The Inquisition had its torture chambers hundred of years before Karl Marx was heard of; and gallows and stake were the fate of many a good Christian at the hands of the Church in the past. The persecuting spirit lingers still in some parts of the world as Colombian events show, while the theory of persecution is not without its defenders.

(The quotation at head is from "The Standard" (R.C.), Dublin.)

COMMENT II

"THE UNITY OF CHRISTENDOM."

Christian Unity is a noble spiritual ideal, and all Christians ought to seek its realisation. As things are, the best thing ordinary Christians can do is to pray regularly about it, for we cannot personally influence Church councils or direct policy.

It is easy for the advocate of Church Unity to be impatient of the hesitations of others, and of the will to conserve the traditions of the different communions. He may resemble the old Elizabethan divine who wrote the treatise "Reformation without Tarrying for Any," in that he wants Unity without tarrying for any who are less ardent than himself. Sometimes it is well to think that if you unite two churches into one the result may be three! Parts of churches A and B may unite to form C and leave depleted but determined A and B to continue alongside.

On the other hand, there has been a tendency in some circles to restrain movements towards reunion among the reformed and orthodox churches lest any step should be taken which would prevent the Roman Catholic Church from joining in. We have always held, and have often said, that the only condition for this is surrender. This was not prejudice or anti-Romanism on our part but the simple acceptance of what Popes themselves have said, as, for instance, when the then Pope brought to an end the "conversations" between certain Church of England clergymen and the late Cardinal Mercier, etc at Malines about thirty years ago. Rome will not discuss union with other churches. For it there cannot be "other churches". Rome believes that there can be but one church and that it is that one.

This matter comes before our mind since we have been reading about reunion meetings held in London in January. There is an observance each January of a "week of Prayer for Christian Unity." At one of the meetings a Church of England clergyman spoke on Unity, and was followed by a Roman Catholic clergyman, and then by a Methodist. We take the following report from "The Church Times" (20/1/56.)

"Face Realities."

The Roman Catholic speaker, Fr. Kenneth Allan challenged the audience to face the realities of the situation. The Roman attitude towards non-Roman Catholics, he said, had been compared to apartheid. But the truth was that, though Christians often spoke the same language, they meant something entirely different.

When, for instance, Christians said the creed, they expressed their belief in the Holy Catholic Church. "When a Protestant says this, he believes that it is possible for the Church which Christ founded to be divided visibly. He believes that a particular denomination is part of the divided Catholic Church.

"It is hard for a Protestant to realise that a Roman Catholic, when he says the creed, believes that the Roman Catholic Church is the Holy Catholic Church, and that the Holy See is as much a part of the divine constitution as episcopacy. We believe that those who leave the Church do not remain a part of it, but have cut themselves off from it.

"It may appear that, by glossing over or ignoring difficulties, you can make progress—it is possible for an ecumenist to be untrue to his principles or to forget them. But face vital differences, bring them to the light, and then make up your mind that, whatever happens, they will not be a source of resentment."

While we do not agree with the Rev. K. Allan's assumptions or theology, we believe that he voiced the necessary point of view of his church. The only unity which is conceivable to Rome is the return to it of Protestants and Orthodox as "prodigal sons". This has been said so often that we wonder many good men keep on ignoring it. Union with Rome means that we confess that Rome was right all along and that our fathers and we have sinned grievously. What man who knows the New Testament and Christian history and has experimental knowledge of the Gospel is ready for that? We believe that Christian unity is not just ecclesiastical adjustment or "rationalisation," but fellowship in Christ and in His Spirit. That is the pre-requisite to union, and that means that unscriptural beliefs and systems must be dropped.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

SOME LENT PASTORALS

A Lent pastoral in Ireland is a letter sent by a Roman Catholic Bishop to his clergy to be read in church on the Sunday before Lent. Each year those letters are published in the Irish newspapers and are available to the faithful. They are also available to non-Roman Catholics, and permit them to study the episcopal view-point.

It is not to be thought that the episcopal letters echo each other. Wide variety marks them, from the Roman Catholic Bishop of Galway's references to sin and psychiatry to the Roman Catholic Bishop of Kilmore's statement of the new rules for the ceremonial observances of Holy Week. The variety of subjects discussed serves to show the diversity of problems confronting the world to-day, even Ireland, though it is comparatively isolated from world affairs and very much secluded behind its barriers of ecclesiasticism.

Warning against social evils are numerous, and all men of goodwill can agree with Bishop Coholan of Waterford when he urges young people to be "on guard against drinking, gambling and vicious habits." Drinking and gambling are rampant evils among us. Bookmakers' shops are very numerous in Dublin and elsewhere. Indeed, in some parts of the capital they seem to be nearly as prominent as public-houses. They look to be patronised by many, who, judging by their appearance cannot afford to gamble. That, however, is the sad reality of the disease of gambling —it has its worst economic effects among those least capable of enduring them. As usual the people who carry the burden are wives and children, though it is not unknown for the mother of a family to be an inveterate gambler.

Drinking in this age has acquired a new feature. Formerly the drunkard and the tippler harmed chiefly themselves and their families. Now the drunkard has at his disposal a potentially lethal weapon with which to menace, maim, and massacre his fellowmen. The drunken drivers of cars have now a wicked record of fatalities, and as cars grow more numerous the death roll must grow. As long as it is thought a dashing thing to career about under the influence of alcohol, casualties will continue. It should be said that there is a slowly growing disinclination to accept intoxication as an excuse for, and an explanation of an accident, but until there is a definite change in the public outlook, and a healthy and widespread public opinion against drinking motorists (drunk ones sometimes have sense enough not to drive), tragedies will happen. More than fines or suspension of licence may be necessary to convince some men of the danger of trying to drive when not really fit to do so. Imprisonment is, we believe, the penalty in some countries and it is a not unreasonable penalty.

Vicious habits have come to the forefront in many places of late. It is now correct wear for youths to carry daggers and to use them. Stabbing affrays till lately were extremely rare in this country for nearly a century. We have heard that eighty or ninety years ago dagger or knife attacks were not infrequent as an adjunct to robbing, but the administration of flogging for this sort of violence put an end to it. In a time of far greater general affluence, of universal education, and of ample means of innocent amusement this resurgence of violence is a vicious manifestation of that disregard of human life which is a hallmark of the mid-twentieth century.

Other forms of vice exist as they have always done, and Ireland is still a land in which concealment is required. We have not yet, thank God, reached the stage where vice is considered funny, and its practice open and unashamed.

In this country social relationships are greatly hindered by the contrast and conflict of creeds. Indeed, a degree of frustration results which makes us suspicious and in some places unfriendly. The possibility of a mixed marriage hinders the friendly associations of young people which are natural in other lands. The Protestant churches discourage mixed marriages, and the Roman Catholic church also objects (though it frequently gains by them).

In old days a mixed marriage divided a family. The boys followed their father's faith, and the girls followed their mother's. This was division, but fair division, and no grievance was created or fostered. The introduction into Ireland of the Council of Trent's decree that no Roman Catholic could contract a valid marriage except before a Roman Catholic priest (having been ignored here for about three hundred and fifty years) altered all that. It became obligatory on the Protestant (if he or she was to be married in a Roman Catholic church) to sign an undertaking that all the children of the marriage should be brought up as Roman Catholics. This should have made Protestants determined not to marry Roman Catholics; or, if they felt impelled to do so, to refuse to be married except by a Protestant clergyman. Unfortunately many Protestants have shown themselves easily persuaded to agree to a marriage in a Roman Catholic church. Social pressure, especially in rural parts is a powerful engine for enforcing Rome's requirements. Of course many Roman Catholics have married Protestants in Protestant churches, but the majority have contracted mixed marriages in the Roman Catholic fashion.

We admit that no responsible Protestant regards the mixed marriage as the ideal, for it begins with a ready made cause of friction and embarrassment, yet it is better that the marriage should take place in a church in the atmosphere of prayer and worship: "before God and the congregation." The Protestant and the Roman Catholic believe in the same God, and it can be no mistake to invoke His blessing on the union. So, at least, one would think. But the Most Rev. Dr. Moynihan, Roman Catholic Bishop of Kerry does not share our view. His opinion, as reported in "The Irish Press", 13th Feb., 1956, is that the Church (i.e. of Rome)

"refuses to recognise as married one of her children, who in defiance of her prohibition, goes through a form of marriage in a registry office, or who sins still more seriously in going through a marriage ceremony before a non-Catholic minister of religion in a non-Catholic church."

Dr. Moynihan may be right in saying that his church regards a mixed marriage in a Protestant church a more serious sin than one in a registry office, but what man of spiritual insight and enlightenment will agree? In a world in which secularisation has affected Holy Matrimony as well as most other important concerns of the Christian life, it must be better to be married in the house of prayer by one of God's ministers (though not Rome's) than to be married in the dreary surroundings and by the godless forms of a registrar's office, where the transaction is no more spiritual than any other act of civil registration.

The bishop's statement is evidence of his church's inveterate opposition to any other form of Christianity.

* * *

In pleasing contrast with this is the part of the pastoral letter of Bishop Mageean of Down and Connor quoted in "The Press." He has charge of the Roman Catholics of Belfast and the adjacent counties of Antrim and Down.

"Religious intolerance among Christians, penalising people on account of their beliefs, attacks on people because they attend a particular place of worship, can only be considered as little short of an act of treason against Him who proclaimed Himself to be the Prince of Peace.

"The aim of everyone who aspires to the name of Irishman should be to strive for the hastening of the day when Christian charity, love of God and our neighbour, should form the texture of our public life in this historic country.

"Here in Ireland the chief causes of ill-will between Irishmen in public life are trade disputes, political and religious differences.

"Differences due to a conflict of interests and of ideals there are bound to be; they are a consequence of the present set-up here of Society and of the State.

"In themselves differences of view and aim are by no means a certain sign that the body politic is unhealthy; they may be, in fact, an indication of its vitality.

"But these differences are compatible with tolerance for the opinions of others, and should not prevent us from working together for the common good of the community and of our Motherland.

"The barriers of race and colour, of nationality and politics, differences whether social, economic or cultural, all are demolished by the levelling power of Christian charity."

What we value here is the recognition that differences may legitimately exist if they are held in a spirit of charity. This sentiment, coming from a leader of the Roman Catholic minority in Northern Ireland, is most valuable. The fact to be realised is that the things which unite are far greater than the things which divide. And the other fact that our faith teaches us to "honour all men" is surely entitled to priority over political or sectarian prejudice. If all Roman Catholic leaders in Ireland kept on repeating Dr. Mageean's views, and if our political leaders and publicists echoed them, the present strains would be relaxed, and all might work more harmoniously for the welfare of people brought together by Providence to live in this island.

We do not recall reference in previous years in these pastoral letters to liturgical matters. This year we notice more than one such reference. Significant changes have been made of late in the forms of worship in the Roman Catholic church. This is something which might escape notice. However slight, the tendency is in the right direction. About two years ago the Pope authorised the administration of Holy Communion, with the necessary preliminary of the celebration of the Mass, during afternoon or evening. This was a great departure from tradition by which Mass after mid-day was unknown. The original time of the institution of Holy Communion was thus able to be initiated (i.e. in the evening). This had bearing upon the regulations about fasting. Now the law of fasting in relation to evening Communion is much altered, and abstention from solid food for three hours, and from liquid food for one hour, is the rule.

This point is made by Bishop Quinn of Kilmore in connection with other liturgical changes in the Roman Catholic services of Holy Week. We gather that these now provide that the "Mass of the Pre-Sanctified" (i.e. a service in which the wafer used was consecrated at a Mass in the previous day so as to avoid a consecration on Good Friday morning) is to be postponed to Good Friday afternoon after 3 p.m. Services on the Saturday before Easter are to be later in the day than heretofore. He says "for the future Tenebrae is practically excluded." For the information of readers unfamiliar with this word "Tenebrae" we may say that it means the daily service of Mattins and Lauds united and said in the evening of the preceding day. This is a special observance of Holy Week, and is marked by a peculiar ceremony—a stand of candles is placed near the altar, and one candle is extinguished at the end of each psalm, until only one is left burning. This is then carried away while Psalm 51 is sung. Then a "strepitus" or noise is made, and it is the signal that the service is over. Then the one candle is brought back to the stand.

This then is the ceremony which will be abandoned on the Saturday before Easter.

We learn from the pastoral letter of Bishop O'Neill of Limerick that the liturgical changes do not represent an innovation "but a return to more ancient usages." The idea is to bring more of the Holy Week services into the afternoon or evening, rather than the morning so that more people may be able to be present.

All this, we hope, may have a more obvious "evangelical" significance, by directing, the thoughts and hearts of simple people to Calvary, and to the "full perfect and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world" which was offered there. May they be enabled to realise that the sacrifice of Christ can never be repeated that it was "once for all"!

* * *

Communism was the theme of Cardinal D'Alton of Armagh's pastoral. As far as we have read, it was a timely warning against this atheistic movement, and had a judicious reminder to the workers that unofficial strikes played into the hands of Communists.

* * *

Unemployment and emigration were referred to, and also the need for restraint in politics. The resort to arms to gain political ends is condemned. The recent abortive attack on a Royal Ulster Constabulary station in a Northern Ireland village which might have ended in the murder of a young woman and her children as well as several policemen is evidence that an unlawful army exists in Eire and Northern Ireland. It is the duty of religious leaders to use their influence to put an end to such foolish and wicked enterprises.

We have long been accustomed to the annual reminder to Roman Catholic parents and students that Trinity College, Dublin is "out of bounds" and that it is a mortal sin to go there unless special leave to do so, for grave reasons, is granted by the Roman Catholic bishop.

The condemnation of mixed education (not education of boys and girls in the same school or college, but of Protestants and Roman Catholics together) reappears. The inconsistency of all this is shown by the fact that Queen's University in Belfast, one of the "godless" colleges founded here over a hundred years ago by Sir Robert Peel is not condemned, and Roman Catholic men and women are not debarred by their church nowadays from attending (they once were). Queen's University is probably far more Protestant than Trinity College in which many important professorships and lecturerships are held by Roman Catholics. Strange to say there are hundreds of Roman Catholic students in T.C.D. in spite of the ban. Further, it does not appear that the Protestant universities of Scotland are "out of bounds" to Roman Catholics, nor the secular universities of England and Wales. Roman Catholicism has a complex about Trinity College. Attendance there might of course weaken some of the provincial dread of "hearing the other side," or at least of meeting the other side on neutral ground!

It is a great pity that our fellow countrymen cannot have a normal approach to T.C.D. No one is proselytised there. No one's faith is insulted or even slighted. No one's morals are endangered. It is the one place in Eire (perhaps in Ireland) where the real world which lies beyond the shores of Ireland can be met, and its thoughts examined, challenged, and if need be, refuted.

* * *

In Ireland too often the way to resist evils is to flee from them. This is not heroic. We should resist evil so that it will find us too strong for it. Only thus can our prevailing nervous dreads be overcome.

THE COVENANTS.

What is a Covenant? A solemn and binding promise made and accepted by two parties, or more, who agree to honour the obligations undertaken.

In Scripture we generally recognise that God has, of His free grace, made promises to His people. Some of His promises are contingent: i.e. their fulfilment is conditional upon the people who are to benefit keeping to their duties and responsibilities. But above all this God has covenanted, for the sake of the love He bears to His people, to redeem, to restore, to enrich, and to render immortal. Calvary and its blessings are not earned by us, or merited. They are gifts of Divine mercy and love—"God so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Many solid, venerable, and valuable theological works exist which treat of God's covenants. Our purpose is not to imitate them or to expound what old theologians called "federal theology" (i.e. theology of the "foedera" which is Latin for covenants). We wish to outline briefly and simply what the Bible tells about the covenants so as to see the supreme and glorious promises of God in His Son, Jesus Christ, as our security and joy.

* * *

(1.) We associate with a covenant a fresh measure of Grace to enable us to value it and respond to it—We see this illustrated in the story of Abraham in Genesis ch. 15. There we read of God's promise "I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward." There we read of Abraham's anxieties, and of the promise of great possessions, and at length, when Abraham's faith was demonstrated, we read "In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abraham saying 'unto thy seed have I given this land from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates.'" The gift under the covenant has increased. This symbolises added grace.

We may turn to Romans, ch. 5 (the epistle in which the faith of Abraham is shown to be the Christians' model); and read there that "where sin abounded, Grace did much more abound." God covenanted to give victory, and the grace which makes it certain.

(2) Scripture of course bears out what we said at the start, that a covenant has usually two parties to it. For example, in Genesis ch. 21 we learn that Abraham and Abimelech, once in opposition to each other, made a covenant to live peaceably. They made it at Beersheba, and the well itself (Beer=well) was witness to the agreement. But we should not over-emphasise the covenant as an agreement and condition between two parties, for it is plain that election and redemption are not the results of a bargain between God and us. While "we were dead in trespasses and sins," and therefore incapable of active response to a covenant, God sent His Son to be our Saviour. We are debtors to His grace, and will always be.

A further illustration of a covenant between men is given in 1 Samuel, ch. 18—"Jonathan and David made a covenant." In ch. 20 we read that they renewed it. Jonathan's regard for David's present safety was to be rewarded by David's favour to Jonathan's family in days to come when David had won his kingdom. The bargain was struck, but it was not a bargain in the common sense of the word: it was an agreement between friends who loved and trusted each other.

When we read an older story of a covenant (or what we may call a covenant) in Genesis ch. 28 we are not impressed by the spirit of bargaining in things concerning God. We read the story of Jacob going into exile, and having his heavenly vision at Luz, and how "he vowed a vow, saying if God will be with me, and will keep me, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come to my father's house in peace; then shall the Lord be my God, and of all that Thou shalt give me I will surely give the truth unto Thee." Had Jacob not tried to bargain thus, his reputation would be higher. But from Sunday School onward we cannot avoid having the impression that Jacob was unpleasantly full of self-seeking.

(3.) The Old Testament covenants may have generally called for the concurrence of God and man, and if man failed then the covenanted promise on God's part might be rescinded. That is certainly true of legal covenants everywhere. We can see an Old Testament example of it in 2 Kings ch. 17—

"The Lord testified against Israel and against Judah by all the prophets, saying "turn ye from your evil ways and keep My commandments." Notwithstanding they would not hear, but hardened their necks, like to the neck of their fathers that did not believe in the Lord their God. And they rejected His statutes, and His covenant that He made with their fathers, and they followed vanity, and went after the heathen concerning whom the Lord had charged them that they should not do like them. Therefore the Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of His sight; there was none left but the tribe of Judah only. And Judah kept not the commandments of the Lord."

The consequence of Israel's rejection of the covenant was their conquest by the Assyrians, and disappearance. Judah also culpable was later conquered by the Babylonians, but was restored. Shortly before Judah's overthrow the prophet Jeremiah who had foretold the exile to Babylon and its seventy years' duration, held out a glorious hope for the coming days. In Jeremiah ch. 31 we read "Behold, the days come saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah. Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them out of the land of Egypt; which My covenant they brake: but this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel: I will put My law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be My people."

In this passage we think we are right in finding a new significance of covenant. We find God committing Himself, and ensuring that His people will respond, because He Himself will put His law "in their hearts." Not again in tablets of stone, but within us. That is grace.

(4.) The covenant which is new is the final undertaking of God. It is "in His Son." It is not a covenant of works on man's part, but a condescending act of love on God's part. It is an immutable covenant, as is set out in the Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. 6. As a result we, that is, Christians, God's new Israel, have "a hope which is an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil; whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus" (Heb. 6, 17-20).

We can be certain of the new covenant, and certain that our frailties will not annul it, for it is sealed to God's people by sovereign grace; by the Precious Blood shed for our salvation; and by "the great love wherewith He loved us." Our part is "to walk in newness of life;" to seek "the things that are above;" to remember that because Our Redeemer lives, we shall live also.

Recruiting the Ministry—Church of England's increase of Candidates.

The Bishop of Bath and Wells, Dr. H. W. Bradfield, told yesterday's session of the Church Assembly at Church House, Westminster, that the increase in men for the ministry, and also a marked improvement in their quality, were causes for deep thanksgiving. Last year 891 candidates attended selection centres, and 692 were recommended for training, compared with 427 accepted in 1952.—"Manchester Guardian," 10th Feb., '56.

Protestant Church damaged in Co. Dublin—Stern warning to those guilty of sacrilege.

A warning that anybody found guilty of interfering with Church property would be sentenced to twelve months imprisonment was given at Dundrum Court by District Justice Reddin. He dismissed a charge of larceny of lead and malicious damage to Rathmichael Parish Church, Shankill, to the value of £86, against Patrick Doran, no fixed abode.

District Justice Reddin said that he was not satisfied that the State had proved its case, but he had a strong suspicion that the accused was, in fact, guilty, and would dismiss the case without prejudice so that if the Civic Guard could unearth further evidence, sufficient to bring the case again and accused was found guilty, he would get a sentence of 12 months.

"I want to warn the boys who are going around stealing lead off the roofs of churches—and there are far too many cases of this—that anyone of them who comes up before me and is found guilty, will get twelve months hard labour. It is a sacrilege to interfere with any Christian Church, and these boys who do so will learn their mistake," said District Justice Reddin.—"Irish Times," 11th Feb., 1956.

Malta—Roman Catholic opposition to integration with Great Britain interpreted by the Maltese representative in London.

Mr. Edward Ellul, Malta's Commissioner-General in London, said yesterday that Mr. Min-toff and his Cabinet were still determined to resign if their referendum on the integration of Malta with the United Kingdom was not carried by a "sufficiently clear and unmistakable majority." Voting on the referendum, which includes a proposal that three Maltese M.P.'s should be sent to Westminster, is due to take place this week-end.

Mr. Ellul said that this was not an idle threat, nor was it an attempt to "blackmail" the electorate. It was a warning to the Roman Catholic clergy on the island that if they discredited the Government (with the result that fewer people than were expected voted in favour of the Government's proposals), then "the clergy must in future carry the political and economic burden of the country themselves." He maintained that during the referendum campaign there had been instances of the clergy frightening the Maltese with spiritual sanctions—threatening to withhold absolution, even threatening excommunication if a person voted for integration. If by frightening the electorate, the clergy thus interfered with the free expression of opinion and the referendum was not strongly carried, then the Government would resign.

New Party?

Was the phrase about the clergy carrying the economic and political burden meant seriously? Mr. Ellul said it was, though he could not say whether or not the Maltese Parliament would be dissolved in the event of the Government's resigning and the clergy be invited to form a political party to stand at a general election.

Would not the resignation of the Labour Government be followed by an attempt by Dr. Borg Olivier's Nationalist party to form a coalition Government? Mr. Ellul said that a government based on a minority party would be impossible to operate.

But Mr. Ellul appeared to regard these questions as quite academic, if not downright fantastic. "In spite of all the interference of the clergy and Miss Mabel Strickland's party of Progressive Constitutionalists, and the attempt of the Nationalists to confuse the issue of the referendum, I am convinced that there will be an amazing and astonishing vote in favour of the union scheme," he said.

He explained why Mr. Mintoff had refused to grant the Archbishop of Malta's request for a postponement of the referendum and the request for certain written assurances about the Church's rights in Malta. In effect, the assurances he required would "freeze half the legislative area which had been covered for many years by the Maltese Government." They would remove from the control of Parliament, for example, all the privileges and exemptions from taxation enjoyed by the clergy. These were matters which clearly came within the jurisdiction of civil government. Speaking personally, Mr. Ellul could not see Mr. Mintoff's Government accepting dictation from the clergy on "non-religious and purely political matters."

Another objection to the part some of the clergy were playing in the referendum campaign, was that many active members of the clergy were known to be pro-Italian in their sympathies. This criticism also applied to the lay organisations of the Church. (Mr. Ellul cited the case of Dr. Herbert Ganado, "the very active head of Catholic Action." He alleged that not only was Dr. Ganado "the most ferocious of the pro-Italians," but that he was formerly a "pro-Mussolini man who had been interned and deported by the British Government in the last war.")

The Nationalists party, which had boycotted the referendum, also had strong leanings towards Italy, though not all its supporters agreed with this policy. There were, he thought, many "conservative" Maltese, who voted for the Nationalists at the last general election because they disapproved of Socialism, but would now vote for the Government on the question of integration with the United Kingdom.

The last question at Mr. Ellul's press conference yesterday was whether Mr. Mintoff's Government intended to recognise the rights of members of the non-Roman Christian churches, especially in regard to marriage. (At present Maltese law does not recognise a marriage between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant unless it is solemnised in a Roman Catholic Church, even if the Roman Catholic is willing to be married elsewhere). Mr. Ellul replied that he did not think there were very many cases in Malta of difficulties over "mixed marriages," and as far as he knew the Government was not considering altering the law. This did not mean, however, that the Government could not alter the law if it wished.—"Manchester Guardian," 10th Feb. '56.

Malta—a change of tactics?—Archbishop of Malta is answered.

Malta's Labour Prime Minister, Mr. Dom Mintoff, said in Valetta last night that Archbishop Gonzi was not making it "a mortal sin" to vote in favour of integration with Britain in to-day's referendum.

Broadcasting a reply to what he called "a violent outburst" by the Archbishop on Thursday night Mr. Mintoff said the Labour Party also wanted guarantees in the constitution as to the future position of the Catholic Church. If people did not vote "yes", how were they going to obtain these guarantees, he asked.

Archbishop Gonzi is now leaving the question to the individual consciences of Catholics after warning them. Clergymen believe that many Catholics will vote for integration, because it promises better living conditions.—"Irish Times," 11th Feb., '56.

Protestants in Eire—A Presbyterian Minister's view.

(The Rev. C. A. Meldrum is Minister of First Monaghan Presbyterian Congregation. His speech, given in Belfast, was widely reported).

January, 1956.

Mr. Meldrum said that "the great tragedy of Protestant emigration from 'Eire' was that it was mainly the farming stock who were leaving. Apart from cultural, political and social reasons, rural Protestant emigration was brought about by three things—the crippling burden of land rates, the scarcity of farm labourers, and the comparatively low returns for agricultural produce.

"Protestants," said Mr. Meldrum, "were welcome in 'Eire' by the State and by 'Roman' Catholics. They were not looked upon as a minority so much as was imagined, nor were they regarded as so many splashes of uncertain colour in an otherwise drab green scene. They were regarded as the best of citizens. Their innate habits of industry, temperance, neighbourliness and moral decorum earned them the respect of their fellow-countrymen."

Protestant devotion to religion, freedom of conscience and liberty of utterance was not only respected but envied. He believed that Protestantism could best serve itself and the future in "Eire" by remaining quietly loyal to the regime under which it must live, by giving ecclesiastical rather than political pronouncement, by being utterly faithful to the aims and obligations of an evangelical faith, and by giving the Gospel primacy over every institution of man.

"Under such conditions," the speaker continued, "Protestantism would be accepted and welcomed in 'Eire'." He believed that "Eire" was moving towards a religious awakening. It was a land of spiritual darkness; a land ripe for Communism, and, indeed, there were Communist cells already in action.

It was a land desperately seeking truth, and already it was turning with a new wonder and a searching hope to a Protestant interpretation of life.

Concluding, Mr. Meldrum said: "Protestantism holds firmly on in the Republic, and our own Presbyterian Church, though small in number, makes up that deficiency by a fierce loyalty and a sustained generosity. To Protestants in the Republic, their Church is the centre of their life. Those Churches must be supported and must be kept open at all costs, for it may well be that they hold the key to the Republic's future."

Methodist concern about Malta—Law on mixed marriages.

Concern about religious liberty in Malta, and the fact that British subjects have not the same liberty in regard to marriage there as they have in the British Isles, is voiced sharply in the current issue of the "Methodist Recorder." The paper says that "Roman Catholic law and practice cannot overthrow the civil law in Britain, but in Malta it governs it. It would be a scandal of the first magnitude if, in a country integrated with Great Britain and sending members to Parliament, this abuse were allowed to continue."

The facts are that in Malta a mixed marriage between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant is not recognised as legal unless it is solemnised in a Roman Catholic church. Ecclesiastical law and civil law are at one in Malta on this point, and the position frequently causes hardship to British subjects in the island. If as is proposed, Malta is incorporated within the British Isles, there will be an infringement of religious liberty as it is understood and practised in Britain. The "Methodist Recorder" says that Parliament must scrutinise this position very closely, for to permit this position to be accepted within the British Isles—of which Malta would form part—would be "a betrayal of both civil and religious freedom."

Northern Ireland's educational system—Roman Catholic Bishop's praise.

Speaking at the annual dinner of St. Columb's College, the Most Rev. Dr. Farren, Roman Catholic Bishop of Derry said that the Grammar School system in Northern Ireland was "an excellent one indeed."

"We ought to pay that tribute to the Ministry of Education that they have devised a very good system of secondary education.

"But in the case of all things that are good, you always have people coming along who want to make them better and the danger at the present time is that there is so much tinkering with the system that it will be made unworkable."

Very Rev. A. C. McFeely, President of the College, said he agreed with the Bishop's statement that there was very much to admire in the efforts being made for education in Northern Ireland.

"Far be it from us Catholics who are the heirs of those who throughout the centuries have been pioneers in this matter to accept stagnation in education. We welcome progressive development."

—"Belfast Weekly Telegraph," 13/1/56.

[We are glad to record this tribute to the policy of the Northern Ireland government. In some quarters it receives little but adverse criticism. Bishop Farren's words ought to be widely known.]

PASSING EVENTS.

Sean O'Casey Irish dramatist and Dr. Soper.

(The following is from the London Letter of "The Irish Times", 16th Jan., '56.)

Dr. Soper.

No one would call Sean O'Casey an admirer of "the clergy", although he did have a good word—many good words, in fact—for the late Dr. McDonald, of Maynooth. Still, there is one living parson that O'Casey doffs his hat to. The Very Rev. Dr. Donald Soper, former president of the Methodist Conference, is, to put it mildly, often in hot water. But not with O'Casey. A recent sermon given by Dr. Soper in Kingsway Hall brought its usual "No one agrees with all Dr. Soper says," from the more conservative of Wesley's followers. But O'Casey, who read the sermon, forwarded to him by a friend, had nothing but praise: "A brave sermon from a brave man. But I'm afraid it won't bring in any garden of roses to the doctor; too damn honest and too damn true."

Dr. Soper will be in Dublin from February 24th to February 28th, to speak in the Central Hall. I wonder if he will find an open-air pitch to have his say. He made some effort to speak in the Red Square in Moscow when he was there last year. But it did not come off. In his meetings in Hyde Park and at the Tower Hill, the doctor is always quick to spring to the defence of the Roman Catholic Church when attacked by the more partisan Protestant heckler.

[If the statement is correct that Dr. Soper "springs to the defence of the Roman Catholic Church" our observation is that Rome can scarcely need an ambiguous ally such as a Methodist Minister, and that Dr. Soper should stick to his last—this is chivalry which might well be dispensed with. The Methodist divine, we fear, will not find many to spring to his defence.]

Grants of $10 millions for theological education in the U.S.

From a Correspondent

Gifts and conditional promises amounting to over $10 millions from Mr. John D. Rockefeller's Sealantic Fund for theological education in the United States have been announced in New York. Six inter-denominational seminaries are the principal beneficiaries and most of the gifts are conditional on large additional sums being raised by the institutions themselves.

The Vanderbilt School of Religion at Nashville, Tennessee, receives $2,900,000; the Federated Theological Faculty in the University of Chicago, $1,250,000; the Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, California, $1,000,000; the Union Theological Seminary, New York, $1,000,000; and the Yale Divinity School, $1,000,000.

Harvard Divinity School receives $500,000, to be added to Mr. Rockefeller's personal gift of $1,000,000 in 1954, and the American Association of Theological Schools is to receive $725,000. These outright gifts are also accompanied by challenge offers on a dollar for dollar basis which will bring the total Sealantic Fund grants up to $10,375,000.—'Manchester Guardian,' 27/1/'56.

"Faith of Our Fathers."

Lapses from it.

In the "Evening Herald" (Dublin) 29/2/56 we read a short article by the Rev. D. Breen of the Society of Jesus on the above subject. We extract the following paragraphs—

"This very night many Irish priests are preaching and hearing confessions among our fellow Irishmen in England. All this day they have been travelling from house to house, visiting workshops and factories, to bring to the missions many who have not spoken to a priest for years. The story these missionaries have to tell is a sad one, they tell of many who have ceased to go to Mass and the Sacraments, who have hardly prayed since they left their homes in Ireland."

"Why this failure? Did our ancestors not keep the Faith though threatened with torture and death? Did they not refuse every enticement and bribe, knowing the value of their religion? But where force and violence failed a Godless atmosphere of cold religious indifference is succeeding."

[The question "Why this lapse from the performance of religious duties?" suggests itself. No one in England forbids young Irish people to go to Mass and Confession. It is the new sense of freedom away from home. No Christian wants them to fall into indifference, so why do not the many Christian bodies in England seek the opportunity of taking the New Testament faith of evangelical Christianity to them. England should not be a place where faith is lost, but rather a place where a real faith may be found.]

Flaws in Censorship described at meeting.

The machinery of the Censorship of Publications Act does not need much alteration, but the attitude of mind of the censors themselves does, said Mr. Sean O Faolain, when he spoke to a paper on censorship at a meeting of the University Philosophical Society at Trinity College, Dublin, recently. He referred to the enormous amount of literature which had grown up about censorship in general and added that it was evident that the subject had troubled men's minds for a long time. In general, many people could agree on censorship, but when it came down to particulars the difficulties arose.

Censorship in Ireland showed a lack of discrimination. There was not sufficient legal definition of indecency or obscenity. The reason for that was that the law liked to be logical—"but sex itself is not always logical, and all its possibilities cannot be easily seen," said Mr. O Faolain. One legal definition, made by Mr. Justice Cockburn in 1868 was that it meant anything which was inclined to deprave or corrupt those whose minds were open to that. People whose minds were open to such influences, however, might have erotic, orgiastic tendencies at the sight of a petrol pump.

Various Concepts.

There were various concepts of indecency and the suggestion of the legal conception that all people had the same conception was nonsense. It was impossible to assume that there could be one homogenous view on the subject. In his opinion the most important statement about obscenity had been made by an American judge who said, in effect, that obscenity meant only what the community had decided it should mean at a given time.

If the courts imposed an unreal standard of morality then the situation became dangerous. Prohibition in the United States did immense harm and was caused by the Government taking an unrealistic view of society. It was true to say that evil could not be fought by ignorance. The censorship board was not an evangelical body. Fostering ignorance by protecting alleged innocence could be one of the greatest instruments for the corruption of youth ever introduced.

Young people left Ireland every year to go to England in such a total state of ignorance that they had to be pursued by missions in order to save their souls. The concept of censorship here was simple-minded and out of date. The censors were living in an ivory tower divorced from the realities of life. The responsibility of the Church was very great in this matter. All the members of the censorship board were Catholics and the Catholic Church had a grave responsibility, but the Church was not doing its duty in not realising that times had changed. He had found in the United States, where censorship boards were being discussed, that even American Catholics were dismayed about censorship in Ireland.

The Irish Censorship of Publications Act was a sensible Act and could do a great deal of good in the control of pornography. If such an act was being administered in France or Germany there would be no complaint about it, but the administration of it by people in Ireland was at fault. Those who administered the act ran roughshod over it. The board here had to take the place of the courts and consequently a writer's works were banned in secret. He could not plead his case personally nor could his solicitor do it for him.

The appeal board had done some good work to remedy some of the evils of the censors, but the act itself needed some clarification. It stated that the board should "examine" books. What did that mean? The censors should be made to read all the books they "examined," and sign a document saying that they had done so.

Not Enough Concern.

Dr. Fergus Pyle, F.T.C.D., said that if each list of books banned was immediately appealed, some good might be done, but it was disappointing that there was so little concern about the matter. The "Irish Times" published a list of the books banned from "Iris Oifiguil," but the other daily papers did not, as far as he knew.

Referring to the banning of newspapers and periodicals, he said that the appeal board should see exactly the same copies which the censorship board had banned. They often did not, and so appeared to be at loggerheads. He suggested that writers themselves should be represented on both boards. Then they could see that pornography, deliberately written to titillate people's instincts, could be banned. The writers, too, must come out of their ivory towers and accept their responsibilities in such matters. If they did take places on the boards they could ensure that the literary value of books could be weighed before a book was banned.

In his paper on censorship, the hon. registrar of the Society, Mr. C. A. Chapman, said that the Government did not need to arrest editors for what they published: it merely withheld newsprint. This was the case at present in South Africa, but was not the case in Ireland. Referring to the Censorship Appeal Board, he said that all its members were men, whereas 50% of the readers were women. In 1952 the board examined 838 books, of which 640 were banned. A total of 93 books was examined at each meeting, a herculean task. Of the books examined, 749 were brought to the attention of the board by complainants. These were a group of puritanical people who spent their time looking through books for something indecent. Banning these books was done to appease the few to the detriment of the many.

In Ireland censorship of the theatre was left to the discretion of the producer and the management. Films in this country were censored by a Government-appointed censor, whereas in the U.S. and England they were censored by boards set up by the film industry. —“Irish Times,” 24/2/56.

THE EVIL OF SUSPICION.

By Rev. John W. Bradbury, D.D.

(Editor: "Watchman-Examiner," New York)

It will be a terribly evil day when no man can trust his fellow, whether in business, in the nation's citizenship, or in church fellowship. The deliberate breeding of suspicion is one of the greatest evils than can afflict mankind. It leads to all sorts of excesses. The time comes when no one is believed and no one's word can be relied upon. Rumour becomes evidence, slander is fact, base reports of institutions, organizations and individuals become common gossip. If such an atmosphere is cultivated, the time will come when every man's hand will be turned against his brother. We know of nothing that is distinctively more un-Christian.

Morale Undermined

What is happening in this country at the present time is illustrated in an article by W. H. Lawrence in the "New York Times" for April 13th on the "Let-down in Morale of Aides" in Federal employment. The writer states that "the Eisenhower administration is faced with a morale problem among Federal employees that appears to be curtailing the efficiency of the American diplomatic and propaganda efforts both at home and overseas at a critical moment in the 'cold war'." One report of the "Times" survey said that the morale of workers had been so undermined that some of them believe that "orderly processes of government have given way to a vendetta on a grand scale." Fear of reprisals has become so widespread among Federal workers that the "New York Times" correspondents, seeking information in Washington, New York, and several overseas centres of American activity, found that persons critical of the system were unwilling to be quoted by name in describing prevailing conditions.

Those who sow seeds of suspicion, especially when not really based on tangible facts, assume a great responsibility, particularly so when it involves the welfare of the nation, an institution, a denomination, or a church. It was Theodore Roosevelt who taught the philosophy that pure Americanism required that Americans have faith in each other. He also advocated that the democratic processes involving free speech, free Press, and free association would be self-corrective. We need to return to the simple propositions of that great former President. World democracy cannot operate peacefully and successfully without mutual tolerance in the midst of mutual correction. If a man is in error, democracy gives us a way of straightening him out.

Suspicion employs the sinister, and the sinister is always evil. It panders to the worst side of our human nature. Restraining gossip is one of the hardest tasks for all moral teachers, whether they be preachers trying to run a church, or statesmen trying to operate a country. It is for that reason we have laws which protect citizens against slander or unproved accusation. We are living in a day when one of the Congressional investigation committees receives accusations against citizens, apparently makes no attempt to find whether they are justified, and releases them on its own stationery, signed by one of its officers, as if there were validity in the accusation. This is putting us back in the Middle Ages, when in the days of intolerance any man in favour with the prevailing power could make an accusation and see his victim suffer.

In the Churches

When suspicion is fostered in the circle of our churches, it is just as evil, if not more so, as when promoted in our democracy. No man is perfect. There are few men, who, if they had their lives to live over again, would not live them better, in the light of their experience and developed wisdom. A great deal of criticism which provokes a simulated righteous indignation now in circulation is not based on factual evidence; it stems from conditions which are obsolete and, therefore, no longer realistic or true.

What is hard to understand is the suspicion placed upon those who were friendly to Russia in the years 1937-1946. If some were guilty, then nearly all in this country were equally guilty, certainly among the leaders. Our Government had established diplomatic relations with Russia. Every encouragement was given for people in this country to fraternize with Russia, with the official consent of the Government. Travel parties were encouraged to go to Russia. These brought back all sorts of favourable reports, together with some criticisms. The questions of Communism and atheism were in the air, and they were still problems facing our national policy. But in those years our American Government encouraged its citizens to deal in a friendly manner with the Russian people and their Government. This seems to have laid us open to a broad conspiracy in which certain Communistic elements established cell groups in various parts of our national life. It is reported that they were in the labour movement, in the colleges, and latterly in the churches. We have found that all of these units, by the democratic institutional idealism which governs them, have corrected the situation with courage, enlightenment and dispatch.

Attack on Protestants

Protestant churches are now being attacked as if their organizations were riddled with secret Communists undermining both religion and the State. This is ridiculous on the face of it. We see it, not so much as a witch hunt, but as a definite campaign to slander certain Protestant churches and churchmen, and to make the citizenry of this country suspicious of the various Protestant denominations. Not for one moment is it expected that any Roman Catholic organization, or church, or individual, will be brought into the picture. On the other hand, that church is being set up as the sanctuary for all converts from the Communist creed. Meanwhile, the seeds of suspicion are being sowed widely. They are taking root in the churches and denominations.

To the unchurched, Protestants are being placed in an embarrassing situation, which some Protestants are, with mistaken zeal, seeking to promote. It is impossible to keep abreast of, or to counter, all the rumours that are peddled around regarding some leading churchmen—bear in mind, always Protestant.

We believe in Protestant denominations to the extent that they have inherent power and wisdom to deal with any man who interprets his religion in the terms of Communist aggression and deception. We do not believe that a man who has such a code can last very long in any prominent position. Therefore, for this to be made so important as to require a Federal investigation by the House Un-American Activities Committee becomes a slander of major proportions against the Protestant denominations in the land.

We must return to our atmosphere of mutual honesty, sincerity and common trust. It is in the atmosphere of holiness, virtue, truth and justice that all who follow the Communist road will appear in their true light and can easily be dealt with. But no man ought to be maligned, persecuted, or misrepresented because his main concern is the application of Christianity to mitigate the lot of the under-privileged and the poor, or because he is active in the areas of international justice and world peace.

The Threat

Finally, unless men of balanced judgment come to positions of influence in the counsels of State, Church or Society, we may find ourselves subject to the most appalling tyranny. Every liberal—and we use the word in its pure sense—will be silenced or cowed under threat of oppression. We shall then live under an awful cloud of mutual suspicion. If that condition should mature, the high places will be filled with charlatans and exploiters—as history has many times demonstrated. The result in Christianity will be disastrous. The fruit of the Holy Spirit will be rejected in the very places where it is most needed. The virtues of Christ are despised where men breathe the poisoned atmosphere of suspicion. The love of God is thwarted where men cultivate sinister opinions of their fellowmen. We need to raise again the standard of a pure faith—the same faith that Jesus had when He died to make men holy and free.

AN APPRECIATION OF ONE OF OUR PUBLICATIONS.

"ST PETER AND ROME"

By the kindness of a regular reader of "Bulwark," whose grandfather, a minister of the Church of Ireland, was a convert from Rome, a fine and very interesting little book, with the title given above, has come into my hands. I hasten to commend it to our other readers. It costs 3d. only, and may be had from the Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin. Postage is extra. The author is the Rev. Canon J. B. Shea.

Canon Shea is a converted Roman Catholic. When he left the Church of Rome he was compelled by persecution to emigrate to the U.S.A. In time he returned to Ireland and was ordained in the Church of Ireland. For many years he was minister of the parish of Newport, County Mayo, but is now retired. Occasionally he acts as supply in various Protestant pulpits in the City of Dublin. He has been described as a fine old Protestant warrior and soldier of the Cross, and is as uncompromising as ever for the truth. He is a Gaelic poet and writer of ability, and has written several booklets, of which this one is the latest.

Canon Shea begins by telling us the sort of things that Roman Catholics say of the Pope. Some of them, one would say are actually blasphemous, indicating that when the Pope speaks, God speaks. For "he is not only the head of the Church, he is the Church." But, of course, there are always irresponsible people who indulge in this kind of fulsome flattery, as when Romans used to hail their emperors as gods, or as Herod was told that his voice was the voice of a god. Is this something of the same kind? Not a bit of it! The whole thing is seriously meant, as when "the Lateran Council told Leo X, 'All power is given to thee in Heaven and in Earth.'"

Then follows the familiar argument on which the papal claims are based. "Our Saviour made Peter the chief of the apostles. This primacy of Peter's was transferable, so that his successors had the same rights and powers as he had. Peter was Bishop of Rome, and remained such until his death. The Bishops of Rome are successors of Peter, and as such they inherit every power that Peter had." The Canon points out that it is a difficulty to think of an apostle becoming a mere bishop, and settling down as a bishop in a diocese, a thing that no other apostle is represented as doing.

The onus of proof of these claims does not rest on those who repudiate them. It is not for us to prove that they are not true. It is for Roman Catholics to prove that they are. They have not yet succeeded in doing so. Tradition says that Peter came to Rome, was bishop there for twenty-five years, and then died a martyr in the Neronian persecution. Quite plainly the tradition cannot be true, for Peter certainly did not come to Rome before Paul or the Epistle to the Romans would have been addressed to the bishop; while that he came after Paul is still unproved. It is possible enough that he did come to Rome towards the end of his life and was martyred there. But even if he did die in Rome, that is far from showing that he was bishop there.

Next, with a very real weight of learning, Canon Shea traces what the early Church Fathers say of Peter. It is an interesting argument, but it would be impossible to summarise it here. From the Fathers he passes on to the pious legends invented to bridge the gap caused by our almost complete ignorance of the lives and deaths of the apostles. These had a great vogue, and many of them exalt Peter and his deeds. Hostility to Paul tended to make him the great opponent of Peter. It was necessary then that Peter should go wherever Paul went, and so to speak, should go one better than Paul. In this way rose the well-known legend that Peter came to Rome and died there. There then the matter rests. Canon Shea's view is just as likely to be true as the more usual and better known view. We do not know, and that is all we can say about it. It would certainly explain, in the most natural manner, the greeting in I Peter from the Church at Babylon, which in the "Rome" theory, is usually taken as a mystic name for Rome.

It is "somewhat amusing," then, to find the gigantic assumptions about the "See of Peter" rest on nothing more solid than a perhaps. "Peter could not have been in the modern sense of the term a bishop at all," and "there is no proof that he ever saw his celebrated See." A summary, such as I have given, of such a closely reasoned book is bound to be unsatisfactory. To do justice to it you must get the book and study it for yourself.

THE RISEN LIFE.

The Christian faith is founded upon Christ's Resurrection. St. Paul wrote to the Church in Corinth: "If there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen: and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ: whom He raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not". (1 Cor. 15: 13-15).

In the Epistle to the Romans the same apostle wrote that Our Lord Jesus Christ was "declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead" (1: 4). Christ's own proclamation was the ground for St. Paul's words: in fact, St. Paul is quoting Him, for He said "all power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28: 18.). This sequel to the resurrection shows, we think, that St. Paul was not so unfamiliar with the words of Jesus as some theologians think. It is inconceivable we may say in passing, that St. Paul could have been a follower of Jesus and at the same time devoid of a desire to know what He said. How could he have consorted with Peter and other apostles (Acts 9: 27-29) and not have learnt a great deal about Our Lord's teaching? How could he have met Christians in many places and not have shared with them the memories of the perfect life lived on earth by Jesus, "the gracious Words", and the mighty acts? The only answer is that Paul wrote nothing in his letters about such things—but maybe his churches had other and recognised means of knowing about the life and teaching of Our Lord, such as manuscripts, portions of what were afterwards 'Gospels'. We recognise St. Paul's proper concern with the contemporary Christ, that is, the risen Lord, at the Father's right hand, and reigning, and to return. Not the Christ of the past, but the Christ now present with His people by His Spirit, is the chief concern of the Christian. So the implications of the Resurrection are of first importance for the disciple—"Because I live, ye shall live also" (Jn. 14: 19) is the promise of the fuller life here and now.

When it is said that the faith we profess is founded upon the Resurrection there is no intention of minimising the Incarnation. The Incarnation was of course the essential preliminary to the Cross and Resurrection. It was also the revelation to us of the possibilities of human life. Our Lord taught us that life is not merely physical, but spiritual; and that conduct is not irrelevant, but is the fruit of the right faith, or the lack of it. We cannot properly be indifferent to the lives of others, their needs and aims, if we take seriously the fact that "the Word became flesh and dwelt among us" (John 1, 14).

Half a century ago it was commonplace to belittle the evangelical emphasis on the atonement, and to say that Christianity is the religion of the Incarnation. That was a foolish contrast to make, because the motive, so to speak, for the Incarnation was the Atonement. Let us be wiser, and say that Christianity is the religion of the Resurrection, for that must include both Incarnation and Atonement. What we should always try to avoid is sectional interests in the Gospel: we need it all, and cannot afford to set aside anything God has made known to us of His eternal and temporal purposes.

If the Christian faith is the Resurrection faith it behoves us to make sure that we are not substituting a backward glance at the Empty Tomb for the present reality of the Risen Life. "Ye shall live also" is not explained by saying that there is a life beyond death and the grave. It must be explained in terms of the present possibilities and experiences of those who are trying to live the overcoming life here and now. Without such explanation much of the New Testament is incomprehensible. The regenerate are called to live a heavenly life, under present conditions of existence—that is the challenge and the adventure of our faith. Christ sits at the right hand of God, "from henceforth expecting (or waiting) till His enemies be made His footstool" (Hebr. 10. 13), but we are summoned to labour "to enter into that rest" (Hebr. 4. 11), and to "run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith, who, for the joy that was set before Him endured the Cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the Throne of God" (Heb. 12. 2).

The Christian life, that is, the life of the regenerate, is the response to the call to be fellow-workers with God (1 Cor. 3 : 9. R. V.). We must therefore walk worthy of our vocation. (Ephesians 4. 1).

* * *

How then shall we describe the risen life of the Christian? We may pay heed to St. Paul's various descriptions of it so as to see what is required of us, and what we may expect, and how we are to respond.

First of all, we learn from Romans 8, 11 that a characteristic of the risen life is a new inward power—

"If the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."

The indwelling Spirit is the inner power which is the transforming agent in life. Where once we liked sinful things now we hate them. Where once we disliked pure and holy things, now we rejoice in them. In contrast with the time when Christian duties were a nuisance, now our chief regret is that so many opportunities of Christian service were lost. Once selfish, we now put self in the background.

Not only do we come to love virtue, goodness, faith, hope, but we receive from the Holy Spirit power to make our dreams come true—that is, we become able to live by new faith and hope. We become able and willing to seek virtue and goodness. We make the Christian life a field of manifold activity to the glory of God.

"To quicken our mortal bodies" is, we think, a mode of saying that we become people of spiritual energy—"Zealous of good works" (Titus 2. 14), for the context of this verse shows that St. Paul is referring to the present life, in verse 10 he had written of the indwelling Christ—"If Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness."

* * *

In the second place, the risen life of the Christian is progressive. There is always something going on in it: something being created and built up, for the achievements of the Christian course are not sudden. Conversion may be sudden, but its fruits are of slower growth. The supreme attainment of the risen life is 'Christlikeness'. So we learn from the words of 2 Corinthians 4, 10—"Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body."

The imitation of our Lord, in humility, self-discipline, love, not in pretence or sanctimoniousness, is set before us here. We should have this mind in us which was in Christ Jesus, "Who made himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death" (Phil. 2 : 7-8).

Our Lord is our model, and we are to follow Him, though we must keep in mind His warnings against pretentious piety (Matt. 6). The healthy, robust going ahead in the Christian life is far better than the morbid and introspective habit. This world is not to be despised or hated, but used as the field of opportunity and service God has given us. To bear about in the body "the dying of the Lord Jesus" seems to be closely related to the Lord's words "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me." The Cross must always be in our hearts to remind us that "we are bought with a price."

Thus the life of Jesus, His humility and grace, His love of men and of the Father, His service and sacrifice, may be imitated, for He assured us that He "is the Way".

We have also to note another similar prospect, or the same put to us in other words—St. Paul said to the Galatians "my little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you" (4. 19). He describes them thus, and we should note the word "again", for it refers no doubt, to the fact that St. Paul had once brought the Galatians to the knowledge of the truth in Jesus. Then they fell away when seducing spirits bewitched them, and the apostle had to do his utmost to reclaim them for Christ. So he had to speak of again bringing them to the new birth as genuine Christians. Only in that way could the image of Christ begin to be formed in them, and enable them to be recognisably Christian. To build up in them a Christian personality was no easy task. Such a task confronts every missionary working among non-Christians to-day, and the difficulty is to implant in the mind of the non-Christian an idea of what a Christian character is and entails.

Thirdly, the risen life is not an opening up of illimitable prospects of "free enterprise" in the spiritual sphere: it is an emancipation to enable us to serve God in the freedom of the spirit. His service "is perfect freedom"—and that defines the nature of 'perfect freedom'. The man who casts off all restraints is not thereby free. What he has done is to bind his personality with the chains of his lower nature—he becomes the slave of sin, and the apostle has accurately described such a man in Romans ch. 1.

Of course there are others who put off God's service because they think it intellectually or rationally discredited. They may not indulge their liberties by sensual means, but they can be the slaves of wrong policies and of false ideologies. Only the man who knows that he will only reach his best when he is under the Master's guidance and control is the discoverer of true freedom, for he has moved into harmony with God, and conflict and discord have ceased. We therefore turn to 2 Cor. 5, 14 and 15 to find this truth clearly expressed—"For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: and that He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them and rose again."

To live "unto Him" is the noblest ideal of man's life, as well as the test of true discipleship. The training of living "unto Him" here is the best preparation for eternity, for our Lord has told us that God is not a God of the dead, but of the living, for "all live unto Him". All who have died in faith are "alive unto God," just as we now may, and ought to be "alive unto God" through Jesus Christ our Lord. (Rom. 6. 9).

* * *

The fourth point to be made is that if we are not living unto ourselves, but unto Him; we have a new ambition.

Ambition is often put before the young by parents, teachers, and friends—by it is usually meant material success, with social achievement as a necessary concomitant. It is not often said that a boy should be a great servant of his fellowmen, rather, he is encouraged to climb up over them. It is thought more important to encourage a young man to be a competitor of his fellowmen rather than a benefactor. "Every man for himself" is considered wiser than "ye are members one of another".

So also, a person is considered weak, or eccentric, or muddle-headed, or crazy, if he thinks and speaks more of the Christian life as the proper ambition for all who are on the threshold of life, while the young man or woman who puts Christ first to-day, is likely to be as little esteemed as the Master in the days of His ministry here.

Does the ruthless careerist, who is found in all walks of life, even in the Christian Ministry, achieve real success, or is his success only illusory? We ought to judge by the amount of happiness, health and contentment he can contribute to his fellows. The man who puts first, the Kingdom of God and His righteousness; the man who lives in the spirit of Christ's beatitudes, is the man who makes most contribution to the welfare of others. At the lowest he does no harm—of how many seekers after worldly success can that be said?

The ambition of the risen life is not seeking money or power or popularity or the satisfaction of vanity—it is simply put by St. Paul—

"If ye then be risen with Christ seek those things which are above where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God." (Colossians 3. 1).

Seek heavenly virtues, seek heavenly rewards. Seek the gifts of the Holy Spirit, ("every good and perfect gift is from above," James 1. 17). Seek the Father's "Well done" (Matt. 25. 23). Faith will show us more and more of the things which are above, and God will give us the graces more abundant than we ask for, or think of. The ambition to be accepted with God is the highest man can have. It is a sad fact that the many are unaware of it.

* * *

The next verse to the one we quoted from Colossians ch. 3, is "Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth". The risen life brings with it new affections. The old standards are replaced by better ones. The old tastes give way to ones of greater worth and more refined quality. What we once delighted in no longer does so, for its shoddiness is revealed, and the genuine spiritual thing replaces it.

"Solid joys and lasting treasures" such as John Newton had in mind in writing his splendid hymn, are the objects of the new affection, but must we not say that the supreme, the exclusive object of the new affection must be God Himself, our Triune Jehovah?

* * *

The life of the spirit; the re-born life; the risen life: such phrases serve to indicate the difference the resurrection of Our Lord has made. Life here has new value and enduring eternal significance because He is raised from the dead and is alive for evermore. No wonder St. Paul could say "Rejoice in the Lord alway, and again I say Rejoice." (Phil. 4. 4).

"THE CHURCH'S WORSHIP"

Worship of God is either public or private: either in fellowship with others, or alone. Historically, worship in fellowship seems to be as ancient as worship in solitude, or nearly so, for family worship must have existed from the earliest times. We believe that the "two or three" gathered in the name of Jesus may signify the simplest and most natural act of worship when parents and child join in devotion to the Creator and Redeemer.

The Old Testament certainly shows us family and corporate worship as acceptable to God even when in the simplest setting. It may have been very 'primitive', but if it showed an awareness of the Creator—creature relationship; if it explicitly acknowledged the divine perfections; if it was directly addressed to God; if its motive was sincere and humble, then it held the possibility of acceptance, of ethical progress, and of spiritual efficacy.

The common Old Testament word for worship, and the common New Testament one as well, suggests adoration as shown by bowing down. That means that humbling oneself before God is basic in all worship.

We may rightly include in worship such elements as 'confession', 'intercession', 'supplication', all of which recognise the existence and personality of God, for 'praise' is not the sole expression of adoration. At a far more advanced level (in Jewish and Christian observance) the use of exposition, or preaching of received truth, is an act of worship. Within worship we must find place for the emotions—wonder, awe, fear, gratitude, joy, inner peace, and other states of feeling need to be expressed. The practice of worship among the Hebrews is very well known to us, and the character of their worship distinguishes them above other peoples. If we contrast Hebrew thought of God with the classical mythologies (professed among peoples of far greater 'culture' than the Hebrews) we see the difference made by possessing true revelations, and true prophets. There were times of course, when Hebrew worship fell down to heathen levels, as under Ahab and Manasseh (2. K. 21. 3), but there were always people guided by the Spirit of God to recall Israel to its older knowledge of the one true God and His commandments against polytheism and idolatry.

Worship in the Old Testament involved the practice of sacrifices in various forms, but there never was wanting a voice to remind Israel that sacrifices of the law were types and shadows, and that their benefits were nugatory if there was not a cleansed heart. The prophet Micah was conclusive—"What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?". The Psalms contain numerous verses which instil the same lesson. The lessons of the Old Testament are usually practical, and God is mainly thought of as man's benefactor—"Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits" (Ps. 103. 2). Here there is some difference from the New Testament, in which we find at times a more 'philosophical' thought. We must at the same time say that in Proverbs and Job we have a 'philosophical' thought of God which is inspired in no less degree than the teaching of the New Testament.

* * *

The New Testament emphasises the freedom of the Christian worshipper—they that worship God "must worship Him in spirit and in truth" (John 4). His worship is not confined to sacred places (and therefore not to particular forms and rites). We think it is true to say that acts of worship have no validity apart from the worshipper's conscious will to offer God worship "in spirit and in truth". A hymn of praise played over on a gramophone record in an empty room is not worship in any Christian sense—the mind and soul of man must be present and active, not remote or mechanical. A quiet spot on a river bank "where prayer was wont to be made" could serve for God's worship as well as, or better than, Herod's Temple, yet had circumstances permitted a glorious dedicated building could not have been wrong. Solomon knew that "the heaven and the heaven of heavens" could not contain God, and how much less the temple he built, yet it was God's will that he should build Him a house.

The Psalms appeal deeply to Christians as acts of worship because they show the great range of God's activity, His interest in man, and His mercy and providence. He is not revealed in the Psalter as 'Deus absconditus' but as One Who is everywhere, and to be found by all who seek Him.

* * *

In the New Testament God is more fully revealed, and Our Lord Jesus Christ transformed the Worship of God by showing Himself to be God incarnate, and promising to be with us, to the end of time. He gave us another Comforter, the Holy Spirit "proceeding from the Father and the Son," to abide with us for ever, so that we can learn another lesson about God, that "in Him we live, and move, and have our being." Our worship as Christians is deepened by the fact that we have greater knowledge of God, and greater ability to respond to His grace. Saved by grace, we can come boldly to the Throne of Grace because it is our proper place. The personality of the Saviour Who brings God down to us, so to speak, also brings us up to God. Hence there is an assurance of faith which is not presumptuous. It is a simple grasp of the fact that God does not leave His people in suspense all their lives—that 'eternal life' may be ours now.

It seems plain that worship may have many forms as it has many occasions. It may be expressed in liturgies or in the simplest ways. Its atmosphere may be austere or warm and intimate; it may be adorned with the noblest music, or with none. It may be offered in majestic buildings or in modest rooms or in the open air. The essential thing is in none of these; it is in the heart and mind of the worshipper. Nothing can modify or discount the divine requirement "in spirit and in truth." Where either of these is wanting we have something unsound, and the doors are open for the intrusion of wrong ideas and wrong interpretations of our faith. Not only sincerity, but faithfulness to objective (i.e. revealed) truth is needed.

It is sometimes thought that private devotions are not under the same necessity of conforming to revealed truth as public devotions are; but this is wrong. Pious fancies are not made better just because they are pious. Eccentricities in religion, quaint beliefs, odd practices, individualistic traits, are not justified because they are religious, or because good men foster and observe them. Our observances must be in harmony with the New Testament and with the evangelical tradition which constitutes personal religion. By this we do not mean something which began in the eighteenth, but something which began in the first century. We do not mean a faith which began at the Reformation, but the faith which made the Reformation possible, the faith which Tyndale, Luther, Ridley, Calvin, Cranmer, and others recovered.

* * *

The task of conscientious Christians is to see that their worship does not fall below the New Testament level. What is true loses nothing by being venerable: what is venerable profits nothing if it is not true. The worship of God is no light thing, and its expression ought not to be a routine. Ancient forms are not ends in themselves, so the spiritual sincerity and alertness of the worshipper must be means of filling the service with life and giving it reality.

If prayer and exposition are acts of worship just as praise is, then prayer and exposition associated with the observance of the Lord's Supper are definite parts of Christian Worship. We shall not discuss the relative importance of one part or another of worship, but say simply that our worship, whatever the occasion, must be "in the Spirit", and must not ignore the contrast between spirit and letter. When Our Lord spoke the discourse we have in the sixth chapter of the Gospel of St. John on "The Bread of Life" He used many phrases which a crude literalism applies to the Lord's Supper—"eating the flesh of the Son of Man" was in the past used to establish a literal sense of the Words He used of the bread at the Last Supper—"this is My Body".

A study of the account St. John gives of this discourse shows that Our Lord expected His hearers to understand what He meant; but how could they have understood it as a reference to an event in the then distant future: moreover an event which they had no reason to expect? It was in the sequel to this very discourse that Our Lord said "It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life" (John 6. 63).

If we were to offer worship to the sacramental elements as a result of taking literally the words "This is my Body: this is my Blood" we should be under a grave misunderstanding, as well as missing the point of those words we quote from John 6. 63. Bishop Nicholas Ridley (bishop of Rochester and of London, martyred 1555) after long and patient study of Scripture and the old Christian writers came to the conclusion that "This is My Body" has the meaning "This represents My Body." In further study he was greatly assisted by a ninth century treatise on the Holy Communion by Bertram of Corbie, a monastery in France. He spoke of this Bertram (or Ratramn) as the one who led him to a spiritual, not literal, sense of the nature of the Lord's Supper; Christ in it is apprehended by faith. The great Irish Archbishop James Usher, in the century after Ridley, went over the same ground of Christian literature and history (as we noted in recent numbers of this magazine), and reached the same conclusion. It should always be remembered that the theory which, if true, would justify offering the Sacramental elements the same worship as we offer Our Lord, was not imposed on Western Christendom as a dogma of the faith till the Lateran Council of A.D. 1215. For nearly twelve centuries after the Last Supper in the Upper Room Christian men and women lived and died and went to Heaven without having any compulsion on them to believe in transubstantiation. They might regard with profound reverence the signs or symbols which to faith represented the Body and Blood of Christ, but over more than half the entire existence of the Church of Christ men were free to receive Christ's words and gifts in the spirit, not in the letter.

In the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England and in kindred Reformation Confessions of Faith we find a definite rejection of 'sacramental worship', and a return to more spiritual ideas of religion. Once more the sense that God is Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth, comes to the forefront. In the Churches of England and Ireland the Ten Commandments were put in a place in the Book of Common Prayer which ensured that they would be read every Sunday. They were also painted on panels and set up in the church wall behind the Holy Communion Table. There they were a constant reminder of the truth that God is spirit, and that images of Him or of objects for worship are forbidden by Him. The Catechisms of the Reformation keep the Commandments in their complete form before the minds of the young. This has been a great means during four hundred years of keeping us conscious of God's law, and therefore of the limits imposed in the character of Christian Worship. Exuberance, fancy, and legend are restrained by the recurring thought that our God is the God of truth, "Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see" (1 Tim. 6. 16).

THE KNIGHTS of COLUMBUS and the BLESSED VIRGIN MARY

We recently saw an advertisement in an American magazine. The title of the advertisement was "Yes . . . The Mother of God will help you!" This is an appealing suggestion, especially to the many who are ill, care-worn, distracted, sorrowful. It may appeal also to the eager, hopeful, undecided and tempted. It is addressed obviously to those who are ready to consider spiritual aid; that is, to those who believe in God and in prayer.

The advertisement (occupying a space about the size of one of our columns) is equally obviously addressed to Protestant Christians, for it begins by saying "You may not approve of the age-old Catholic devotion to the Blessed Virgin." We make our first criticism at this point: there is no really ancient Catholic devotion to the Blessed Virgin, but there is of course abundant fairly modern Roman Catholic devotion. The surviving records of ancient Catholic Christianity tell us extremely little about Our Lord's Mother. The Gospels which are the authentic source of Christian knowledge show no trace of, and give no encouragement to, 'devotions' of the kind now general. We find occasional traces of popular devotions here and there outside the main stream of the Christian faith, but not till long time had passed do we find popular devotion becoming associated with dogmas.

Early Christian writers referred to the Blessed Virgin as "the Second Eve". This was not improper as an analogy, and called for no doctrinal deductions. Only long after did this phrase become a step in the way towards the late claim that Mary is co-redemptress of the human race.

True Catholic devotion is honouring the memory of the one who was Christ's mother. But the extreme lengths to which devotion has been carried in our day do not merit that description. The Knights of Columbus, being an organisation for Roman Catholic Church propaganda, do not see the problem created for thinking people by the silence of Christian tradition on the subject. They try to create the impression that there is evidence in the Bible, or that inferences may be made from it to support their beliefs.

They face the charge that their case is unscriptural by inviting the reader "to look at the facts" so as to see that it is untrue to say that devotions are "unscriptural". They do this in spite of the attitude of many Roman Catholic divines who acknowledge that scripture and tradition give them little or no support.

If "we look at the facts" then we "will realise that Mary can exert a wonderful influence in our personal life." The memory of the Blessed Virgin "the handmaid of the Lord," must exercise a beneficent influence over every Christian woman. We must hold in high honour and respect one who was chosen by God for the august office of being the Mother from whom Our Lord Jesus Christ assumed His human nature. We except as the truth the further statement of the Knights that "Mary did not give Jesus His divine nature." We ask, as a consequence, how then do they call her "the Mother of God"?

It is plain that where we differ from some parts of this advertisement is in the idea of time: the Knights mention "the unique place she occupies in God's plan for our salvation"—we say that she occupied, in the past, two thousand years ago, a unique place in God's plan for our salvation, but that she is not now taking an active part in that plan. When she gave birth and nurture to Our Redeemer she fulfilled the unique task God assigned to her. Just as Moses' work was done when he saw from "Nebo's lonely mountain" the land of promise, so Mary's wonderful responsibility was fulfilled on that day (if not earlier) when Our Lord answered the one who said "Blessed is the womb that bare Thee" by the words "Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the Word of God and keep it," or when He declared that those who do the will of God are His mother and brothers and sisters, (Luke 11. 28, and Mark 3, 35). The family relationship to one household and one parent was now transformed into a relationship to all humanity. He Himself declared it.

The next point the Knights make is to defend prayers to the Blessed Virgin by saying "there is no law of God which commands us when we go to Him in prayer that we must go alone"—This appears to mean that we may have with us someone to intercede for us. This is true indeed. Not only has God not commanded us to come to Him alone; He has given us an Intercessor "able to save them to the uttermost who come to God by Him" (Heb. 7, 35) for He ever lives to make intercession for us. God has not left us to plead for ourselves—"If any man sin we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and He is the propitiation for our sins" (1 John 2, 1). That is the answer to the Knights of Columbus which the Scriptures give.

The Knights however invite us to follow St. Paul's example. He said "Brethren, pray for us"—why not then ask the Blessed Virgin to pray for us? Paul asked men who could hear or read his request: what evidence is there that the saints in heaven hear us? None. Is not our glorified Redeemer sufficient? Has He not invited us to "ask in His name"? Who else besides the Triune God is designated in Scripture "the Hearer of prayer"? No one.

perary, referred to recent discussions at county council meetings on the tenure of scholarships at Trinity College.

He said that the authoritative teaching of the Catholic Church on the matter was contained in Canon 1,374 of the Code of Canon Law: Catholic youth should not frequent non-Catholic, neutral or mixed schools—that is, those which are open to non-Catholics.

"It is for the local bishop alone to determine, in accordance with the instructions of the Holy See, in what circumstances and with what precautions—so that the danger of perversion may be avoided—attendance at these schools may be tolerated," he said.

"Trinity College comes directly within the scope of this prohibition. It is, of course, a non-Catholic school. Little, if any, change has taken place in its outlook and spirit since Judge Webb made the oft-quoted statement: 'Our university was founded by Protestants for Protestants, and in the Protestant interest. A Protestant spirit has from the first animated every member of its body corporate. At the present moment the genius loci, the guardian spirit of the place, is Protestant, and Protestant may it ever remain.'"

Dr. Kinane said: "Lest there be any doubt, the Irish bishops in plenary council at Maynooth in 1927 expressly put Trinity College amongst the schools forbidden to Catholics by a decree afterwards confirmed by the Holy See. Except in very special circumstances, in which the bishop concerned grants permission, Catholic students sin gravely by attending Trinity College; and Catholic parents, by sending or permitting their children to become students there, are likewise guilty of grave sin.

"This legislation," he said, "was not due to any ill-will towards non-Catholics, but to safeguard Catholics from danger to their faith and morals."

The Church was convinced that the attendance of Catholics at non-Catholic schools led to indifferentism in religious beliefs, sometimes even to complete apostasy, and consequently also to a decay in morals.

Referring to county council scholarships in relation to Trinity College, Dr. Kinnans said: "I know that councillors are influenced by many considerations not connected, at least directly, with religion in refusing to permit their scholarships to be enjoyed in Trinity College. As archbishop, I am not concerned with these reasons, nor have I anything to say about the attitude of county councillors towards non-Catholic students.

"I am concerned solely with Catholic students, and I want to impress on Catholic councillors that the prohibition against attending Trinity College in the circumstances indicated is gravely binding in conscience, and that it would be sinful for them to co-operate in bringing about a violation of this law."

—"Irish Times," 12/2/56.

[For many weeks past there has been constant reference in the press in Ireland to Trinity College. One of the issues has been the request of T.C.D. to County Councils and Corporations that the University Scholarships they award should be tenable in Trinity College as well as in one of the Colleges of the National University of Ireland. As the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland has condemned Trinity College as a dangerous place, and has forbidden Roman Catholic students to resort there, some Councils have had to consider the question whether they shall debar Roman Catholic holders of their scholarships from attending Trinity College and permit only Protestant holders to go there. It has been suggested that they have no right to consider religious aspects. But evidently Dr. Kinane (see his last paragraph) holds that R.C. Councillors ought not to ignore their church's attitude.

We are glad that the Roman Catholic Archbishop regards Trinity College as a Protestant institution, for in recent years there has been a tendency to describe it as "free-thinking and agnostic"]

PASSING EVENTS.

Haiti.

Haiti, meaning mountainous, lives up to its name, for on this small area of earth's surface are to be found three ranges of mountains. Some of these are arid and stony, but the majority fertile, usually inhabited and cultivated to the summit. This island is 800 miles south and east of Miami, covering an area of 10,200 square miles and populated with three to four millions of people. Haiti is a land of contrasts: extreme poverty and exquisite beauty go hand in hand. The populace living on the mountains and in the valleys average 300 per square mile, thus over-population is an ever-present problem. Royal palms and other tropical verdure grow in profusion, giving to this land a natural beauty ever attractive to the visitor.

Since 1804 Haiti has been a Negro Republic; formerly it was the richest colony of the French Empire. The majority of the present population are descendants of slaves taken by the French from the Congo and other West African markets. A people accustomed to domination by tribal chiefs in Africa could not endure the intense cruelty to which they were subjected by their slave masters. Thus, after a heroic struggle they gained personal and political freedom from foreign powers. But, alas, the even more bitter and tragic slavery to sin has never been broken, hence the messenger of the Cross, able to offer freedom through faith in Christ Jesus, dare not disregard them if he would be faithful to His Lord and Master. Compared with other fields this one can be classed as a Samaria, for it needs our message just as much as Samaria needed Christ in His day.

As soon as our thoughts turned to this land it opened in such a remarkable manner we concluded it was the Lord's doing and marvellous in our eyes.

To date we have seen 20,000 won to Christ! —“Light and Life,” April, '56. (Unevangelised Fields Mission).

Protestant Mission Schools.

In a Belgian Government publication, entitled “La réforme de l'Enseignement au Congo Belge”, appears a report presented to the Colonial Minister. An extract relative to the educational work in Protestant Missions has fallen into our hands. We have translated it into English. It reads:—

“As far as we are concerned, the comparative success of these undertakings remains an enigma. On the one hand there is a distressing paucity of outward and material advantages: wretched buildings, ignorance of French, seemingly rudimentary teaching methods, etc. On the other hand, completely unbiased observers like the Army and the Union Minière, as well as commercial settlers and intellectuals, are unanimous in lauding the results of their formative work, especially in the moral realm. It is probable that the reason for this lies in the educational atmosphere produced by uncomplicated and regular personal contacts with the teachers' family life carried on in unhampered proximity to the scholars. “The voice of the heart which alone reaches the heart.”

“In any case the results are there, and are worthy of study. We can only hope that in the long run the academic aspect of these schools will compare with their moral standing.”

While we would oppose the statement that our teaching methods are rudimentary, we note with pleasure that those outside are unanimous in lauding the results of our schools in building Christian character. The “enigma” is the power of the Gospel in the human heart. —“Light and Life,” May, 1956. (Unevangelised Fields Mission).

Education in Argentina.

It is good news that the new Government in Argentina has decided to uphold the principle, as embodied in the law, of non-confessional teaching in public education. This ruling has prompted the Union of Christian teachers to send a message of greeting to the President. The Government has affirmed afresh its adherence to the law which lays down that youth are to be educated "according to the universally acknowledged principles of Christian ethics, and that dogmatic teaching of any sort is to be banned." Protestant teachers point out that the law guarantees freedom of teaching. The Government's attitude, they also point out, is all the more welcome since it prevents Argentina from burdening itself with a new problem at a time when nothing is so necessary as unity and the concentration of all efforts on the reconstruction of the Republic.

Known Papal Fear of Communism—New Line-Up Warning.

The Rev. M. Campbell, of Esolis, Conon, Ross-shire, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, told the assembly which opened in Edinburgh that the policy of the Roman Church in the presence of world danger was, true to its nature, largely concealed.

"In the sphere of propaganda, he added, it poses as the champion of Christian existence and freedom against the menace of communism, but its own sacerdotal totalitarianism has been more responsible for the growth of communism in Europe, and especially in Italy, than any other influence.

"It is ironical that the Roman Church in those places where its force is supreme, is persecuting—in some instances to death—Protestant minorities whose only fault is that they want to preach the Gospel in their own way. It is therefore, sad that unwary souls, unfamiliar with the spirit of Roman heresy and caught up in the toils of its own propaganda, look to it for protection against world disaster.

More Conciliatory Mood

"It now appears that the known Papal fear of communism has led it unto a more conciliatory mood towards that system. If this new line-up between Moscow and the Vatican becomes a practical reality, protestantism and democracy may have reached the point of their greatest danger.

"Those who believe, that by patience and understanding, Russian communism and the

THE ANTI-CHRIST.

In a recent article on "the last days" we said that we would leave the subject of "the Anti-Christ" for another occasion. We may now bring together the New Testament teaching on this subject, and present it as fairly as we can.

* * *

The first point to be noted is that the phenomenon called in Scripture "Anti-Christ" is not something exclusively associated with "the last days": a factor in human history due to appear when human history is near its end. We learn that from the days of Our Lord on earth the spirit of Anti-Christ has been operative among men—see 1 John 4; 3: "Now already it is in the world." The Anti-Christ spirit militated against Our Lord in the days of His flesh; denied the fulfilment of prophecies in Him; reprobated His teaching; betrayed and denied Him; and crucified Him.

We may also say that any rejection of moral truth, such as throwing aside God's Commandments, is due to the spirit of Anti-Christ. The condemnation of any truth Our Lord approved is anti-Christian beyond doubt for He gathered together and expressed all divine truth.

The anti-Christian spirit is not like an impersonal force of world-wide effect. It must do its evil work through persons, through rational intelligences rather than through force, like earthquake, fire or flood. So St. John tells us that "there are many Anti-Christ's" (1 John 2: 18). We are justified in holding that this spirit acting upon, and through, human personalities; and being moulded in various ways by its mediums, shows itself in every effort to undermine the cause of God and the progress of Christ's Kingdom.

Atheism is a fruit of the Anti-Christian spirit; not so much a dissent from Christian orthodoxy, as a denial of the great truths to which not only Christianity, but Judaism and Islam bear witness. Agnosticism, i.e. the plea of ignorance—learned ignorance if you will, is seldom fairly balanced between faith and doubt, between affirmation and negation. It tends to lean towards negation. It is anti-Christian, a fruit of the same spirit, but less forthright. A man who says "there is no God" is possibly more likely to be converted to the Christian faith than the man who says, "I don't know." But the spirit of Anti-Christ can work by creating a condition of apathy as well as by stirring up antagonism to the faith. Sinfulness of any sort is practical denial of holiness, love and faith, and here too we perceive the spirit which wars against Christian principles. But we must come closer to the ground: substitute for atheism, agnosticism, sinfulness, the real culprit, the atheist, the agnostic, the sinner, and you see how the human personality and not the abstract quality, is the enemy. It may be worth while to say that Our Lord rarely spoke of abstractions, but nearly always of people, whether good or bad, for people are the main agents in this world of God or of the devil.

St. John (2 John 7) reminds us of what we may often overlook: that Anti-Christ is "a deceiver." This warning is essential for young and old. Satan can be transformed into an angel of light, and sin would not allure us if we saw it in its true colours and in its consequences.

Generally, the spirit of Anti-Christ, as St. John tells us, is denial of God, and of the relationship (Father—Son) of Christ to Him. This attitude may vary with different persons (as we may see, for instance, in the early centuries and during the formation periods of Christian theology), but while some may be less affected by it than others, the fact remains that it is anti-Christian to deny the unique essential relationship of Christ and the Father. The doctrine of the Holy Trinity is revealed truth which it is sinful to deny.

While, as we have shown, the spirit of Anti-Christ has been operative since Our Lord's days, and was plainly recognised in the apostolic age, we are not to assume that Anti-Christ is merely doubt or sin or indifference, and that it will maintain the same character till the end. There is a final Anti-Christ who is yet to come. St. John who tells us of the presence of Anti-Christ at the date of which he was writing also tells us that Anti-Christ shall come (1 John 2: 18). We may perhaps distinguish "the spirit of Anti-Christ" from "Anti-Christ," and regard the first as a manifestation during the Christian age of a power which will one day be fully revealed and fully engaged in total war against Our Lord, His Word, and His people—"The man of sin shall be revealed" (2 Thess. 2: 3). The time of this revelation is "at the last time," or "in the last days."

What are we to make of the expression "the man of sin"? We remember reading in the "Dictionnaire de Théologie Chrétienne," a Roman Catholic work of importance, that the first eminent Protestant scholar to refute the Protestant view that the Pope was "the man of sin" was James Henthorn Todd, D.D. who was Professor of Hebrew in Dublin University over a century ago. Dr. Todd delivered a series of lectures on Old Testament prophecy "Discourses on the Prophecies relating to Anti-Christ in the writings of Daniel and St. Paul, preached before the University of Dublin" 1840. We possess Dr. Todd's own copy of this work with MS. notes intended for a new edition. It is not a very readable volume today, for religious interest has moved far from its subject-matter, but we may quote the substance of a passage in the first lecture. Todd says that the opinion (about Anti-Christ) which originated in the twelfth century among sects which had separated from Rome was not exactly that which became popular after the Reformation: it consisted in the assertion that the Church was the beast predicted in Revelation; and that the recognition that Christians might hold temporal possessions was a departure from the pure doctrine of Christ and His apostles. Then the individual pontiff might be called Anti-Christ if he persecuted such people. Then at length the view was reached that the whole series of Roman bishops was intended in the prophecies of Scripture. Todd enumerates various mediaeval sects which held such an opinion and outlines other beliefs they held (not likely to appeal to us). He then describes a Franciscan movement which grew up in the Church of Rome, and adopted erratic opinions which Popes tried to correct. The result was that these Franciscans declared their church to be "the synagogue of Satan." They held that St. Francis had given them the true gospel. Naturally they were repressed by authority. Todd asks if they were the sort of expositors from whom the Church of Christ is to receive the true interpretation of the prophecies. He said that according to Mede's hypothesis (Mede was an exponent of prophecy) fourteen centuries had passed since the Church was delivered into the hands of Anti-Christ, "and yet it is still capable of being questioned whether Anti-Christ be come or not." Mede's date for the church falling into the hands of Anti-Christ must therefore have been some date in the fifth century. Todd goes on—

"That Anti-Christ shall come is a truth that may almost be said to be an article of faith, so universally and unanimously has it been received in all ages by the Christian Church. It is true that when we enquire into the time and manner of his coming we meet with great and various differences of opinion, but these respect rather the circumstances of the doctrine than the doctrine itself. The belief that there shall come a power implacably hostile to Christ's religion, thirsting for the blood of the saints, and leaving no means untried to subvert the truth, has been held by all Christians, ancient as well as modern. Thus far there has never been any difference of opinion in any period of the Christian Church; but with respect to the nature of that power, its head or leader, its duration, the date of its appearance in the world, and the mode or degree in which it shall seek the subversion of the truth; whether we are to look for an individual Anti-Christ, or a succession of individuals, or a body of men leagued together against religion, whether we are to expect a power openly and avowedly professing atheism, and blaspheming the very name and semblance of Christianity; or whether we are to look for this enemy in the garb of a friend, naming indeed the name of Christ, and professing to act in His name and by His authority, but in reality a deadly foe, undermining true religion by insidious fraud, and propagating under the name of Christian doctrine, the most damnable and fatal errors;—these are questions upon which there does indeed exist, and upon which there has long existed, much diversity of opinion in the Church."

It may be observed that now, a century and more after Todd wrote, the first alternative he put forward very accurately describes materialistic communism and its plans for world dominion. The present day outlook is, of course, far different from the outlook of Todd's day. What men then gave serious attention receives among us scant notice, and even religiously-minded people will consider the question of Anti-Christ as wellnigh meaningless. Still, it may be no harm to quote some words of Faber, a Church of England investigator of prophecy of Todd's day (and not to be confused with Fr. Faber the Roman Catholic hymn writer)—"The predicted Anti-Christ is an infidel and an atheist. Under this precise and definite aspect he is represented both by Daniel and by St. John. Whatever, therefore, may have been the delinquencies of the Papacy, the character of Anti-Christ, at all events, belongs not to it."

The fact is that this type of prophetic study has been abandoned by most Christian bodies, and the current interpretation, as far as we have learnt, take no notice of this question which Todd is said to have answered in a fashion new to his day. We content ourselves with indicating that there was formerly a strong Protestant tradition which Todd set out to controvert, and he seems to have succeeded, for the Christian public has little interest in such discussion.

How we identify "the man of sin" will not affect the reality of the world-menace ahead of us, and it is far more important to take heed to ourselves, to watch and to pray and to be ready, than to try to settle a matter which has since the start perplexed and confused many earnest and faithful men.

An enquiry about where the Anti-Christ is to arise may be tentatively answered by saying that the scene of that dire event will be the eastern hemisphere, and students of these matters hold that it will be somewhere in the Mediterranean Sea. They base this on the opening words of ch. 13 of the Revelation—"I stood upon the sand of the sea and saw a beast rise up out of the sea having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy." Whatever may be the precise meaning of this, the place indicated is definite enough, and the usual expectation of prophecy interpreters is that the momentous final acts of this age will begin in Palestine, or about the eastern shores of "the great sea."

* * *

The character of the Anti-Christ is no secret, and its various aspects should be a guide to the correct interpretation.

1. "A denier of the Father and the Son" 1 John 2: 22.
2. "A denier of Christ" 2 John 7.
3. "The Lie" 2 Thess 2: 11.
4. "That wicked one" 2 Thess. 2: 8
5. "The man of sin" 2 Thess. 2: 3.
6. "A deceiver" 2 Thess. 2: 9, 10.
7. "A blasphemer" Rev. 13: 5 and 6.
8. "A miracle worker" Rev. 13: 13.
9. "Satan's masterpiece" Rev. 13: 4.

These qualities must not be treated as isolation, but in harmony with the activities we read of in connection with Anti-Christ's work.

1. Anti-Christ will take on great power Rev. 17: 10-13, 17. This power will be (a) political—Rev. 13: 1 & 2. (b) commercial—Rev. 13: 16 & 17. (c) religious—Rev. 17: 1-11.

2. Anti-Christ will corrupt his associates by the prosperity he gives. Dan. 8: 25 (A.V.M., R.V., S.R.V.).

3. He will inaugurate and prosecute great wars. Dan. 11: 21-45.

4. He will destroy many Christians. Matt. 24: 15-22.

5. He will attempt to overthrow Christ. Rev. 19: 19.

This selection of references will show that much of the Anti-Christ's work will go far beyond what has been traditionally thought. The events of our day and the ideologies now prevalent were, if not unthought of, at least unheard of, fifty years ago. In the nineteenth century it was usually expected that the Christian faith would have uninterrupted if slow progress to world dominion. It has typical of the outlook of fifty or sixty years ago that the Student Christian Movement could have the slogan "the evangelisation of the world in this generation." It was a glorious aspiration. It failed, partly through lack of faith and self-dedication, but also through an inadequate grasp of the realities of the situation. To-day we see plainly that the victory of the gospel is not to come about by men's efforts, but by divine intervention. In saying this we are not denying the fact that God has always been intervening, for He has worked through dedicated men in every generation.

* * *

It seems to us that our idea of Anti-Christ must not be restricted to future history of Europe. In older days men scarcely thought at all of the vast continents and innumerable peoples and ancient civilisations which are outside Europe. To-day they are of the highest importance, and in a few generations can reduce Europe to helot status. We must take a global view of the fulfilment of these expectations, and such a view must suggest that the final Anti-Christ is a world-wide anti-God system. No local condition can satisfy the terms or predictions involved.

* * *

Many students of Holy Scripture refuse to treat Daniel as prophecy, and believe that the book is history in apocalyptic form and that therefore we must not turn to it for knowledge of the future. This is a matter for patient study and competent scholarship. The Revelation (or Apocalypse) has been a playground for all sorts of interpreters, and their interpretation have had little relationship to learning or judgment; but there is no ground in reason for assuming that Holy Scripture cannot throw light on the future, or that it was not intended to have predictive elements. We may reject every explanation fallible men have so far given us, and yet believe that there is in that book a vision of the future, and of the end, which worthily prepares us for the consummation of the ages.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE DOCTRINE OF INTENTION.

We have not written upon this subject for many years, but lately our attention was directed to it, and we examined a small book on the matter published over thirty years ago by Dr. R. L. Langford-James ("The Doctrine of Intention"). "Intention" appears to be a complicated thing. Like many other topics it seems simple enough until we begin to look into it. The general idea is that worshippers, or users of sacraments, should have some sort of guarantee that the ministers of the Church are serious honest and orthodox in their ministrations, and that as a consequence they are receiving the benefits of real sacraments and not being deceived. The theologians are not content to say that the worshipper or participant in a sacrament receives what he thinks he receives, for that point of view opens up possibilities which might lead to strange results; the intention of the minister is claimed to have some significant relationship to the rite he celebrates. It is scarcely too much to say that he is believed to have a creative relationship.

Plainly in this sphere of theological thought the value of a rite (sacramental or otherwise) depends on the mind of the minister. The problem then arises "how can anyone know if the minister's intention is right?" As people cannot know (and as the minister may be unaware of some circumstance which may adversely affect his actions such as a defect in the intention of the man who ordained him), the outcome must be a continual state of uncertainty.

The problem then is the thinking out what is the minimum requirement to constitute a valid intention.

We may see things in a very different light, but this is peculiarly Rome's problem, and we doubt if a satisfactory solution has been found.

* * *

The introduction to Dr. Langford-James's book has a quotation from Richard Hooker who was England's greatest Protestant divine and the Church of England's glory. "The known intent of the Church doth generally suffice, and, where the contrary is not manifest, we may presume that he which outwardly doth the work, hath inwardly the purpose of the Church of God." This is the language of sound sense, but it is not, we think, to be assumed that the virtue, not to say the validity of a rite is founded upon the intention of the minister or the implied intent of the ceremony. We must have room for the intention of the worthy receiver of the rite, i.e. the worshipper or participant. Hooker himself attached the greatest importance to the worthy reception of a sacrament. He could never ignore that vital element in all true worship.

* * *

Dr. Langford-James begins with a necessary discussion of the place of certitude in religion. He defines several sorts of certitude, metaphysical and physical, and then "moral certitude" which is connected with human actions; and often means "a high degree of probability." He considers also the various degrees of certitude—the more truth there is in a thing the higher the belief it secures. This is important in our faith for we cannot treat faith as if it were like arithmetic with facts such as "two and two make four", or like Euclid in which a proposition is stated and proved with finality. Faith, being truly faith, rests on evidence which is not measurable in the ordinary sense—"according to thy faith be it . . ." shows the subjective quality of faith in its working. There is of course another side of faith when we see that Holy Scripture is the Rule of Faith, and therefore is not a subjective standard. But this is a different matter from intention and the kind of certitude a religious faith requires.

If Intention is concerned with the value and purpose of things done, the doer is naturally important (though we have just supplemented the Hooker quotation with a reference to the very important intention of the worshippers). We note that Dr. Langford-James is a "sacramentalist" of the kind we do not sympathise with. He says "the chief means of salvation are of course the sacraments": we believe them to be precious means of grace and of the benefits of redemption, but we cannot accept our author's statement without qualification. The Church of England (and we believe other reformed Churches agree) says that sacraments are "certain sure witnesses and effectual signs of grace and God's good will towards us, by which He doth not only quicken but also strengthen and confirm our Faith in Him." This directs us to a wiser and truer view of salvation and the means thereto. If you put sacraments in this foremost place in the Christian revelation then there must be grave preoccupation with the conditions which ensure their genuineness. Dr. James sets down the usual conditions of a true sacrament—"proper matter" (i.e. in baptism, water), "proper form" (i.e. in baptism, "I baptise thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost"), and the "valid minister." This last can be the crucial question, for it has occupied extremists for centuries, and is an issue between Rome on the one hand and Protestantism on the other, and between some varieties of Anglican and certain of their fellow-Protestants. The odd circumstance is that Rome and the Church of England and many Protestant bodies agree that in the case of the sacrament of Holy Baptism a lay person, man or woman, may effectively administer. But Rome denies the power to administer the Lord's Supper correctly to any whose priesthood has not received her recognition. Why this distinction as to the minister of the two sacraments of the Gospel exists is a question we cannot consider now; but in any study of the problem of certainty in the sacraments the point must be examined. It may be asked, incidentally, if a person made a sacramental confession to a bogus priest and received absolution and experienced the same sense of relief and of spiritual cleansing and well-being as on former occasions where the priest was genuine, would that person whose sincerity and piety were real, still endure unknowingly the burden and guilt of the sins? We can answer concisely and definitely No, for we believe the simple truth God Himself has declared "If we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 John 1. 8) and to do so there and then. Whether the Roman Catholic can have the certitude the Protestant has is doubtful.

From what has been written already it will be plain that the problem of "the valid minister" must be central in the discussion of Intention. Yet we must recall three passages of Holy Scripture—two in the Epistle to the Hebrews—"This Man because He continueth ever hath an unchangeable priesthood, wherefore He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him" (VII 25), and "we have a great high priest that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession, for we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities" (IV. 14), and, to bring the present reality and continuous effect of this priesthood into every Christian need, condition, and experience, we emphasise the third passage "I am with you alway, even unto the end of the World" (Matt. XXVIII 20). There can be little mystery as to the truly valid priesthood among Christ's people who are themselves "a peculiar people, a royal priesthood" (1 Pet. II 9). The "stewards of the mysteries", the "ambassadors" of Christ should never assume that they are more than delegates and channels through whom the present unchanging Priest exercises His ministry. That word in Heb. VII 25 "unchangeable" is a significant one—it means something which cannot be passed on to somebody else. If properly attended to it would dissipate several mistaken theories.

Dr. James brings us a quotation from St. Ambrose of Milan ("de Sacramentis" 4. 4. 14) in which Ambrose says that the Bread (in the Holy Communion) is the Body of Christ by Consecration: he asks "by what words?"—those of the Lord Jesus—the priest does not use his own expressions but the expressions of Christ. "Therefore the Word of Christ effects the sacrament." We say then that if the Word of Christ is what makes the sacrament, then serious solemn believing prayer, with His Words, create something which it would be hard to condemn as illusory, even if the minister was deemed "irregular" and if the minister were "regular", but unworthy through faithlessness or some ignoble quality, the reality of the sacrament must be accepted.

Another topic raised by Dr. James is the effect of "form" or "matter". When the correct form of words is used in relation to the correct matter the valid sacrament exists. He properly repudiates the idea that there can be "magical" qualities in the "form". The belief that sacred words have force in themselves belongs to a world of thought outside the bounds of Christianity.

Here then is a point at which the intention of the minister becomes significant. To employ the words belonging to a sacrament (and no doubt it must be reasonably clear to all concerned what the purpose of the observance is) the minister must exercise his mind and give the words some degree of attention. He must mean something by them—

Intention has been variously treated:

1. Some think the minister need not have any intention. Dr. James refers here to theologians of the 12th century, and to the Reformers Luther, Calvin, Jewel.

2. Others think that the exterior acts of the minister are enough proof of his intention, among these are Catherinus and Hooker.

3. Others hold that the interior intention of the minister must be taken account of. Among these are Cardinal Bellarmine and many modern Roman Catholics.

We thought it very interesting indeed to find that Reformers and Mediaeval teachers shared the same views, and that the different opinions lie across the boundary between Romanism and Protestantism. We note Calvin and Luther sharing common views with the teachers of the older scholastic period, and Hooker the great Anglican with similar opinions to the Roman Catherinus (to whose theory Dr. James attaches great importance). It is easy to see that the problem of Intention is not simple. Intention itself may be deliberate at the moment it is called for, or it may be the usual attitude in familiar and repeated circumstances, or it may be what we assume would be a man's intention if he had thought about the matter at all, or it may be the effect of what he set out to do (i.e. a man may arrange to baptise a child at a certain hour, and proceed to do it with no subsequent thought about what he is doing). The last of these is styled by the theologians "virtual intention", and virtual intention is commonly thought to be enough for the sacraments. Nevertheless St. Thomas Aquinas is thought to teach that habitual intention is enough (i.e. what may be assumed the man would intend if he gave it any thought at all), but it may be that he does not distinguish "habitual" and "virtual."

Also, it is taken for granted that a man intends by his ecclesiastical acts to do what the Church does.

A valuable principle may be drawn from Bellarmine's interpretation which will seem strange to those who think that Roman Catholic theologians all agree, and all condemn as futile the religious rites of non-Roman Catholics. He held that "doing what the Church does" does not require that a man should intend to do what the Roman Church does, but only to do what that which, in his mind, is the true Church, does. We accept that a Presbyterian in administering the Lord's Supper intends to administer the sacrament Christ instituted and which His true Church has always observed—he is not setting out to administer a special Presbyterian rite. We admit we once heard of a Methodist who declared publicly that he administered bread and wine because it was a something required of him by the rules of the Methodist Conference. At the time he said this, or shortly after, he turned Roman Catholic. But before his thoughts turned towards Rome we are certain he believed he was administering Christ's Sacrament as Christ's Church had always done.

Generally it is agreed among Roman Catholic writers that only where there is "a contrary intention" is the rite invalidated. If a bishop at an ordination intended not to ordain any he laid his hands on the ceremony would be a nullity.

* * *

Much more should be said about the intention of the recipient. We have referred to it, and it is well-known as a central element in all sincere religion. St. Augustine is quoted in the Church of England Articles of Religion (Art 29) as declaring that though in the Lord's Supper "the wicked may visibly press with their teeth the sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ, but rather, to their own condemnation eat and drink the sign or sacrament of so great a thing." The adult Jew in mediaeval Spain who pretended to be a convert to the Church could not receive the grace of baptism though he received the sign.

* * *

The theologians who held that no intention on the minister's part was needed were opposed by Aquinas who said that as an animate instrument of a sacrament the minister must by his own will set himself to perform the acts, i.e. to do what Christ and His Church do. It does not seem to us that this mere setting of oneself in motion creates a condition in the mind and conscience of the minister which deserves to be called "an Intention." It seems not to be a real answer to Luther and Calvin, or to the 12th century theologians.

Dr. James provides a valuable quotation from Calvin (Antidote to the Council of Trent VII Canon 11)—"I defer so much to the sacrosanct institution of Christ that if some Epicurean deriding the whole proceeding were to give me the Supper in accordance with the form laid down by Him and using a legitimate rite, I should not doubt that the bread and cup proffered were real pledges of the Body and Blood of Christ." Bellarmine, it appears, called this a new heresy that no intention is needed if matter and form are present. But Calvin's view was not new or heretical. It was the older orthodoxy.

In this connection we may refer to a rubric in the Church of England service for the Communion of the Sick. If the sick man for valid reasons cannot receive the material elements, the clergyman "shall instruct him that if he do truly repent of his sins, and steadfastly believe that Jesus hath suffered death upon the cross for him, earnestly remembering the benefits he hath thereby, and giving Him hearty thanks therefor, he doth eat and drink the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ profitably to his soul's health, though he do not receive the sacrament with his mouth." This rubric is not a Protestant innovation, but an early principle well-known in the Middle Ages. It is to be noted that it makes the sick man a real communicant without the Consecration of the bread and wine: the recipient's intention is made plain, but there is no minister nor minister's intention contemplated. This then seems to us to be much the same as Calvin's view.

* * *

The Elizabethan Bishop of Salisbury, Dr. Jewel, as usual, hits the nail on the head by saying that it is hard to know what the Church intends—Rome wants to transubstantiate the bread and wine: the Greek Church does not. Rome intends to consecrate by Christ's words; the Greek Church by prayers: which are we to follow to secure the Church's intention?

Jewel was concerned with "interior intention", and this is another aspect, and a complicated one, of the problem.

If the interior intention of the minister is required in order to have a valid sacrament, then as Rome considers sacraments to be chief means of salvation, salvation depends on the will of man, and malice or carelessness may prevent salvation.

Bellarmino recognised the difficulty created by our inability to know an interior intention. He took an ingenious way around it. He said "A man ought not to demand infallible certitude as to his salvation or justification in this world." "We need not doubt the minister's intention unless he shows the contrary by an external sign."

It may be worth remarking, a propos of Bellarmine, that it may not matter very much in this world if occasionally Communion or Absolution is received from a priest who has a contrary intention, or none, because in a normal life there will be many occasions to receive both, and on some occasions the priest's intention will be satisfactory. But, by its very nature Baptism (in Rome's view the essential sacrament without which all the rest are vain) can be received only once. If the then intention is wrong or wanting, how can it ever be rectified? How can its long-range effects, should the invalidly baptised person become a priest and bishop, be estimated and undone? They cannot, at least on these assumptions.

The Reformers were well aware of these problems and the discussions relating to them. As far as we know they refrained from putting any theory of Intention into the reformed confessions, because they knew that Scripture, sense, and safety warrant the view that the faith and intention of the worthy participant are what finally matter.

THE HEBREW CHRISTIAN.

The Testimony of

The Rev. W. S. M. Simonson, LL.D.

Vicar of St. Luke's, Hampstead.

I cannot claim to be converted from Judaism to Christianity, because my parents were Christians. I was brought up in a Christian home, and in the Christian faith: and I attended the Lutheran Church in Germany. But I can claim to have Jewish grandparents. I must admit I was not at all pleased in 1933 when Hitler came to power, and at that time I did not realise what a great blessing it would be to me later on. In 1933 I was living in Germany, and I loved my work, and lived for it. I did not go very often to Church: at that time I had not much time for religion. And then when Hitler came to power I was dismissed at once from my office because of my Jewish origin. It was for me as though life itself had come to an end. One Sunday in April, 1933 I went to a Church in another place, because I had nothing else to do: and there I heard a sermon, and it seemed to me as if the preacher knew all about my problems. I do not remember the text of his sermon, but I remember he said that some had to stand at the edge of a precipice, where they can move neither forward nor backward. That men had to realise their need before they could come to our Lord Jesus Christ. When I left that service it seemed as if a new hope had dawned for me, and as if new life had come to me. I started again to pray. I started again to go to Church regularly, to read the Bible at home, and to take a small part in the work of the Confessional Church in Germany. When things were going from bad to worse for us so-called non-Aryans in Germany, I knew in 1938 that before very long I would be sent to a concentration Camp, unless in the meantime, I was able to leave Germany. Just at that time I got an invitation to come to this country, and I felt that God had opened the door for me. I cannot tell you here how I got out of Germany. But when I arrived in this country, I felt that God had called me for a special purpose, that He had called me to do some work for Him. What it was going to be I had not the faintest idea. I realised fully that at that time I had nothing apart from my faith to offer, being 49 years of age, with a very limited knowledge of English. I went from one Church to another. That was the first time that I came into contact with C.M.J. But everywhere it was the same: "You are too old: we cannot do anything for you." And then I wrote to the Bishop of Chichester, and after a few weeks I was given the privilege of meeting him. He talked with me for about half an hour, and at first he said what I had already heard so often. At the end of my interview, the Bishop said: "I cannot make any promise: but I will see what I can do for you." At first it seemed almost as if I had failed, and then another door had been opened for me. A few weeks later I was told that I could go to a Theological College for training before going into the ministry. This was much more than I had hoped for, than I had expected. But, at the same time, I asked myself, how can I speak? How can I preach in a foreign language? How will that be possible? And yet I knew that if this was God's call, He would give me the power that I needed, for I knew that I had no power of my own.

In 1940 all the Germans between the ages of sixteen and sixty were taken to the Isle of Man to be interned, and I was among them. At that time I learned another great lesson. I asked myself this question. In Germany you are a Jew, and you are turned out. The Jews tell me that I am a Christian, and, therefore, I do not belong to them. And here in England I am interned because I am a German. What is my nationality? I learned at that time that we, as Christians, have a much greater nationality, a nationality which is above all other nationalities: that we are citizens of the Kingdom of God: and that this is a nationality which no one can take away from us, a nationality which binds us all together all over the world. How often did I experience that as one met Christians: wherever they may come from, of whatever nation, one feels that we are all one.

After six months holiday on the Isle of Man I returned to Ridley Hall, Cambridge, and I spent two very blessed years of study there. My principal, the Rev. Paul Gibson, was very much concerned about my future. He wondered who would be likely to accept a German as a Curate in wartime. And, on the whole, he was right. I was however sure that God had called me, and that some door would open for me: and a door did open. When the time came, the then Vicar of Christ Church, Fulham, who is now Secretary of the Colonial and Continental Church Society asked me to come to him as his Curate, and I spent seven very happy years in his parish, until I went to St. Mark's Dalston, where I got to know quite a lot about the wonderful work which the Church Missions to Jews does in the East End of London. Since the beginning of this year I have been Vicar of St. Luke's Hampstead.

As I look back over these fourteen years that I have been in the ministry, I can never be thankful enough to God for the many blessings He has bestowed upon me, and for the many ways in which He has guided me. Also I cannot be thankful enough for my grandparents who were Jewish. I gladly accepted the invitation to address you to-night, not because I want to speak of myself, but rather to tell you something about God's help and guidance, and to testify to His goodness. I have nothing to glory in of myself. If I have anything to glory in, I can only say with St. Paul, "I glory in my infirmities," and I glory also in God who has guided me through all these years.

Western democracies may yet see eye to eye and co-exist in a peaceful world are nursing a fond delusion. Communism cannot adapt itself to the age-long ideals of democracy except in the way the teeth of the tiger are adapted to its prey. Communism must undergo a great change in its spirit and form before it can live peaceably with the rest of the world."

The Madrid Seminary—Objections to Re-opening.

According to the German Evangelical Press Service, the Spanish hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church has announced to the Government in Madrid that it is opposed to the re-opening, on the basis of an already drafted solution, of the Protestant Theological Seminary which was closed by the police on January 23rd.

The Romanist arguments against the legalisation of the Protestant Seminary in Madrid are based on Articles 26 and 27 of the Concordat concluded in 1953 between Spain and the Vatican. Article 26 stipulates that all schools of whatever nature, must teach "in accordance with the principles of the dogma and morality of the Roman Catholic Church."

Compulsory Instruction

In Article 27 the Spanish state guarantees that instruction in the Roman Catholic faith shall be given as a compulsory subject in all state and private schools. But the second paragraph permits the children of "non-Catholics" to absent themselves from this instruction if their parents so request. There is no positive clause in the legal code, however, making provision for a group of Protestant children, whose parents have obtained permission for them not to attend Roman Catholics religious instruction, to be given instruction in the Protestant faith.

"However, for reasons of justice, the state authorities were quite prepared to find a tolerable solution both with regard to the theological seminary and to the school for Protestant children in the same building," continues the Evangelical Press Service (Bethel-Bielefeld). "Now they have begun to waver, owing to the protest from Roman Catholic quarters. But the Protestants hope that the negotiations between the Apostolic Nuncio in Madrid and the Spanish Foreign Minister will lead to a favourable conclusion; for in view of the world situation, it is unlikely that the Vatican will adopt the attitude of the Spanish hierarchy towards the Protestants."

Tercentenary of Archbishop James Ussher.

Last week the University of Dublin marked the tercentenary of the death of James Ussher, Archbishop of Armagh, with four memorial lectures.

In the first of these, Professor Norman Sykes took as his subject "Ussher as a Churchman." It was, he said, upon the foundation of his patristic and biblical learning that the superstructure of Ussher's Churchmanship was built. But it had to be granted that the scholar in Ussher militated against the success of the ecclesiastical administrator.

In the second lecture, entitled "Ussher's life and times," Mr. Phillip Styles, of Birmingham, said that in the politics of the seventeenth century, Ussher represented the last of a tradition of Calvinist and High Church royalism which contributed powerfully to the cause of Charles the First and disappeared in the very different atmosphere of the Restoration.

Critical Insight.

Speaking of "Ussher as a patristic scholar and church historian" in the third lecture, Dr. J. E. L. Oulton said that Ussher was a man of critical insight, whose genius was able to penetrate beneath the surface of documents and make original contributions of the highest importance. Ussher, by a brilliant deduction from ancient documents, was able to give the original form of the Apostles' Creed as it was professed by the Church at Rome in the second century.

In the last of the memorial lectures, Mr. William O'Sullivan, Keeper of the Manuscripts in the library at Trinity College, Dublin, said that collecting as Ussher did within a century of the dissolution of the monasteries, he was in a strong position to acquire the large number of mediaeval manuscripts which formed the core of his collection.

The lecturer said that the most romantic aspect of Ussher's career as a collector was his search for Oriental manuscripts.

Spanish Bishop's Attack.

Bishop Vizcarra, ecclesiastical head of Catholic Action in Spain, has made an attack on the British and Foreign Bible Society. The society's stock of Bibles and other literature was seized at its Madrid premises on April 24.

So large a "propaganda arsenal," declares the Bishop "numbering over 36,000 volumes of Protestant Biblical propaganda," could hardly be destined to the tiny Spanish Protestant minority, usually estimated at about 20,000. It must, therefore, be for distribution among the Roman Catholics.

This constituted an offence against Article Six of the Constitution, which forbids "external manifestations of religions other than Catholicism." It was thus obvious that the Protestants in Spain, "being confident of the support of the United States and Britain, paid little attention to the laws."

£640 for a Pope's Letter—Massacre of Heretics

The ninth day of the sale of the remarkable collection of autograph letters and historical documents formed by the late Mr. André de Coppet of New York took place at Sotheby's yesterday. A letter from Pope Gregory XIII to King Charles IX of France proved the greatest attraction, being bought by a Miss Driscoll for £640. The subject of the letter is the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, which had taken place twelve days before, and on which Pope Gregory delivered the following opinion (translated from the Italian):

"We rejoice with you that with the aid of God you have relieved the world of those wretched heretics who for so many years have afflicted your Majesty and your whole kingdom, as a result of which you will have little difficulty in restoring your kingdom to the pristine candour and purity of the holy Catholic Faith, a work which I beg you to carry on with all diligence."

Equally interesting was an autograph manuscript written by one Joseph Craddock, about 1824, recording his reminiscences of Dr. Johnson. The fact that Boswell had already tilled this particular field to exhaustion probably accounts for Craddock's obscurity but his manuscript gives many first-hand reports of the doctor's conversation and records many meetings with him and his circle in a vivid and lively style. This lot was bought by Robinson for £240.—"Manchester Guardian," 29/5/'56.

Talks Between Churches—Dr. Fisher Optimistic.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, addressing the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, spoke of conversations going on between the Church of England, the Church of Scotland, the Episcopal Church in Scotland, and the Presbyterian Church in England. These conversations, he said, were viewed, as of course every new stage was, with alarm by some people in both churches. "I have never yet found anything that did not alarm somebody."

Caution was a perfectly right stage in the development of relations, but he was optimistic that something would happen. There was an increasing agreement among the churches about the boundaries of the Catholic Churches of Jesus Christ for practical purposes.

All those baptised in the name of the Holy Trinity were, for practical purposes, within the Catholic Church of Christ. "Twenty years ago I dare not have said that. Even seven years ago, I was heavily criticised for saying something like that. But now, among my own people, it is safe to say it."

Our Lord had given to his Church certain undoubted gifts—Scriptures, doctrines enshrined in the Creed, the dominical sacraments, and the ministry—and every Church he knew of was using these things every day and using them for one purpose only—that they might be means of grace by which the Holy Spirit might keep people faithful.

Differences in Use

"The fact that we all differ in the use we make of them need not deter us," Dr. Fisher added. "That is what is set before us—how far we can agree, and how far we need agree, in order to work together as one body in Christ." He rejoiced in the drawing together of the Churches of Christ.

A "Miracle" Church.

Of 580 architects from 36 countries who are competing in a design for the sanctuary at Syracuse, Sicily, that is to house the "Weeping Madonna" plaque, six live behind the Iron Curtain.

Three live in East Germany, two in Yugoslavia and one in Czechoslovakia.

Fifty-one architects from the United States are competing.

Designs already submitted are being examined by a committee over which Archbishop Baranzini of Syracuse presides.

The church will accommodate 20,000 people. In addition, there will be shelters for pilgrims and officers for administrative staff.

The image of Our Lady on a small wall plaque was hanging above the bed of an expectant mother in a working-class home in Syracuse three years ago when the tears were seen falling.

Tear continued

The flow continued for four days and were watched by crowds of Catholics and non-Catholics.

After an investigation, which included evidence that the tears had the composition of human tears, the Sicilian bishops formally pronounced the occurrence miraculous.—"The Universe" (R.C.), 29/3/'56.

PASSING EVENTS.

Chinese Church and the West—Bishop Tells of "Benefits" Achieved by Revolution.

"WE MUST BE OURSELVES"

Although Christians in China argue with Communists about the Party's lack of belief in God, they recognise the "very important good things" accomplished by the Revolution, and feel that "the Churches have been strengthened by their independence from Western ties."

This was stated by the Right Rev. K. H. Ting, Bishop of Chekiang, when he addressed the Central Committee of the World Council of Churches at its annual meeting at Galyatető, Hungary.

Bishop Ting's appearance marked the first time since 1948 that Christian bodies in China have been represented at a World Council meeting. He told the Central Committee that China has been going through a revolution that is "not any political or diplomatic accident," and that it marked a turning-point in history, long overdue. He said that it was something the Chinese people "don't want to see reversed."

"Act of God"

In his report on Church life in China, Bishop Ting said that, although Christians in the West might regard the new China as a judgment of God, Chinese Christians in the past six or seven years had come to see it as "an act of God" and a demonstration of his love for China.

"The Communists do not believe in God or Christ, and think that in one or two hundred years religion will wither away. In all these matters we do not agree, and have frequent arguments with them. But we do not think this should prevent us from recognizing the many good things they have done for China."

Bishop Ting thought that the Communists' open atheism was "some sort of guarantee" that their relationship with the Church was not one of utilizing it. The Constitution of Communist China guaranteed freedom of religion—which included freedom to worship, to evangelize and to publish books. "We do not feel that we are being persecuted."

"Colonialism"

The Bishop spoke of the importance of developing a relevant Chinese theology. This was not possible so long as the Churches were dominated by Western thought. "In the last century Christians in China were Christians in a colonial setting. Christians in such a country are likely to develop a cult of the West and contempt for their own people."

"We have learned much from the West, but at this stage we must be ourselves. For the present, we must not have our libraries flooded with Western books. The missionary movement has done a great deal for China, but it has been made use of by certain colonial forces, in spite of the good will of many missionaries."

"For all the good things we are grateful, and all the good things will remain. But to-day we are rather excited about building up our own Church. The prospect before us is the transition from a backward people towards Socialism. We must build a Church appropriate to the new life our people have entered into."

* * *

In answer to a question whether the Church in China had attained a sufficient degree of maturity not to be weakened if no more missionaries came from the West, Bishop Ting described the Church as "very weak indeed." After it had become firmly established, he said, perhaps it might be possible to give priority to learning from the West.

In answer to a further question, he explained that the Roman Catholic Church in China had repeatedly declared that it owed loyalty to the Pope, but wanted to be patriotic.

After hearing Bishop Ting, the Central Committee unanimously agreed to send a delegation to visit the Christian bodies in China.

The Committee also endorsed a proposal to hold preliminary talks, possibly in Paris at the end of January, with leaders of the Russian Orthodox Church, with a view to the Russian Church becoming a member of the Council.

The Committee called for an agreement for the "discontinuance or limitation and control" of nuclear weapon tests. It urged the Christian bodies to appreciate the urgency of the demand by many dependent peoples for self-government and independence, and to stand with them in orderly progress towards this goal.

The Committee heard a resolution calling for the immediate recognition of the right of the Protestant Theological Seminary in Madrid to function and fulfil its task to train ministers for the Evangelical churches in Spain. The Seminary was closed last January. Although the seals have now been removed from the doors, specific legal permission to operate the Seminary has not yet been granted by the Spanish Government.

The Committee reiterated its conviction that Spain, as a member of the United Nations, must accept moral responsibility for observance of the principles of religious liberty contained in the UN Charter and the Declaration of Human Rights.

(We can express no opinion on the views expressed by the Bishop. We hope that he is right.)

Right to Restrict Religious Minority Claimed by Spain.

Senor José M. de Areilza, Spanish Ambassador to the United States, at a communion breakfast in Washington, D.C., a few weeks ago said.

A "tremendous international conspiracy of silence and untruth" has afflicted Spain on all matters pertaining to religion, he charged. "Legal incidents" involving Protestant chapels are widely reported, he said, but examples of Spanish "tolerance" toward religious minorities are scarcely mentioned abroad.

Referring to the closing Evangelical Seminary, the ambassador stated: "There has been a great commotion and we have heard all sorts of comments regarding Spanish persecution of that centre," he said. "The truth of the matter is that the legal status of that centre was not well established and therefore the government deemed it convenient to close it until its legal situation had been clarified."

Opened Conditionally

Three weeks ago, after widespread commotion over its action, the Spanish government quickly "clarified" the school's status and it was permitted to re-open, on a provisional basis. Has anyone outside Spain, he caustically asked, read about its rectification.

"The Sentinel," Toronto commented thus—

It was only when it was clear that the act displeased the U.S. that the excuse of "clarifying its legal status" was thought of. Besides, the Seminary has been operating for years, and its legal status should or could have been decided long ago. And who can doubt that if the protests had not arisen and the U.S. had ignored the incident the Spanish government would have left the clarification of its status in a pigeon hole and the Seminary would have been closed for good?

The Crux of the Matter

But Ambassador Areilza went further and disclosed in a few words that Spain believes it

THE TWO VOICES—SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

The One Voice.

In 1916, Cardinal Gibbons, dean of American Roman Catholic bishops, said: "Separation of Church and State in this country seems to (Roman) Catholics the natural, the inevitable, the best conceivable plan, the one that would work best among us, both for the good of religion and of the State." Speaking for the Bishops in 1948, the late Archbishop McNichols said: "U.S. (Roman) Catholics would not seek union of Church and State even if they constituted a majority."

The Other Voice.

"Separation of Church and State" is described by Father John Courtenay Murray, the leading current writer on this theme in the American hierarchy, as "that negative, ill-defined, basically un-American formula, with all its overtones of religious prejudice." In making such a statement, Father Murray is simply echoing the official teachings of many popes. Pius IX, in Section 6 of his Syllabus of Errors, denounced as one of "the principal errors of our time" the statement: "The Church ought to be separated from the State and the State from the Church."

In the official standard work, "The State and the Church," the authors, Monsignor Ryan and Father Moorhouse Miller, assert: "If these (services) are carried on within the family (referring to Protestant services) . . . as to be an occasion of neither scandal nor of perversion to the faithful, they may be tolerated by the State . . . Quite distinct from the performance of false religious worship and preaching to the members of the erring sect is the propagation of the false doctrine among Catholics. This could become a source of injury, a positive menace, to the religious welfare of true believers . . . Against such an evil they have a right of protection by a Catholic State . . . If there is only one true religion, and if its possession is the most important good in life for States as well as individuals, then the public profession and promotion of this religion and the legal prohibition of all direct assaults upon it, becomes one of the most obvious and fundamental duties of the State."

During 1948, the Roman Catholic Hierarchy in the United States, in their yearly letter, published a long statement asserting that, "it was their intention to amend the U.S. Constitution by working peacefully, patiently and perseveringly for the revision of the interpretation by the Supreme Court of the First Amendment which prohibited Congress from making 'laws respecting an establishment of religion' intended to maintain a separation of Church and State." They claimed that the judges in their interpretation of what the framers of the Constitution intended wrote off as a "misleading metaphor" Jefferson's sentence regarding "the wall of separation between Church and State."

The latest utterance of Pope Pius XII on this subject published in the R.C. U.S. News Review, Sept. 1955: "The Catholic Church has a mortal duty to fight back when the laws of the State violate divine rights . . . These points were stressed by Pius XII . . . The Pontiff in solemn words warned: While (notice the expression 'while') the Church and the State are independent powers, they must not, because of this, ignore, or even less, fight against each other. It is far more in conformity with nature and the divine will that they collaborate in mutual understanding, because their activities apply to the same subject, namely the Catholic citizen. Certainly cases of conflict remain possible. When the State's laws ignore divine rights, the Church has a moral obligation to resist this."

Take your choice. We know which voice would prevail as soon as they got the power in the United States and here in Australia, or elsewhere.—"Vigilant," Melbourne. 14/5/56.

[The position here outlined can be studied in Marshall's "Roman Catholic Church in the Modern State." What is sought in U.S.A. and Australia and elsewhere may be found in embryo in Eire. Blanchard's "Irish and Catholic Power" contains much valuable information.]

SOME COMMENTS ON EVANGELICALISM.

Most of us know what we mean by evangelicalism, and we can distinguish churches which are evangelical from churches which are not. In the same way the evangelical book and the evangelical sermon are marked by certain qualities. When we say this we do not deny that there are people of very limited understanding who identify evangelicalism with a particular phraseology; and if that phraseology is not continually employed they conclude that what they hear, or what they read, is not evangelical. What such people need is, first, greater knowledge of the language of the New Testament in its rich variety; and secondly, an ability to think, as well as to listen.

What are the qualities which mark the evangelical outlook? First, an acknowledgment that there is a personal challenge in the Gospel which demands a personal conviction. It is not enough to profess the Gospel in general terms; and it is not enough to talk about Christian culture, or Christian civilisation, or "community," or a Christian standpoint. These highly important things require beforehand, if they are to be genuine, a personal realisation of need of Christ as Saviour. Deliverance from the power of sin through Our Lord Jesus Christ must be the incentive to things Christian, and must provide the concentration without which Christianity is only a hobby, and not a compulsion.

Secondly, an evangelical religion must be marked by the acknowledgment of Holy Scripture as the Rule of Faith, and guide of thought. The Bible for the evangelical is not a source-book of Jewish history and Christian origins, but the book of revelation of God's will and purpose, and the foundation and nourishment of the devotional life.

Thirdly, evangelical religion is Reformed Christianity. It is the religion of grace; of free sovereign grace. It must put God first, and recognise that "by grace we are saved through faith." Grace is not mediated through a limited number of channels, but is given according to God's mercy, and is as wide as His love. His people know that nothing is able to separate them from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus (Rom. 8).

Evangelicalism is what creates evangelical churches, and is their common basis. Hence Anglican, Lutheran, Presbyterian, etc. know what each other is talking about, and can share fully in each other's experience of faith, sing each other's hymns, read each other's books, understand each other's prayers and join in them.

These are great and glorious facts, yet in some circles Evangelicalism is hotly objected to, and they are circles in which it ought to be honoured. Lately a prominent English ecclesiastic and a prominent Church of England weekly paper had severe and ill-advised strictures to make on this subject. Instead of welcoming Evangelicalism as a powerful ally in the defence of Christianity against materialism, indifferentism, and communism they decried it. Instead of welcoming it as a potent aid in the defence of reformed churches against Rome, they treated it as if it were the only religious phenomenon they had to worry about. Instead of complaining that evangelicalism has a clearly defined sense of its task they should rejoice that there are young men of education and intellect who see clearly amid the moral and spiritual confusions of our day, and follow the very un-English line of "no compromise." Are Church of England evangelicals (to single out one group) doing more than being loyal to their baptismal promises—

"that I should renounce the devil and all his works, the pomps and vanity of this wicked world, and all the sinful lusts of the flesh,"
 "that I should believe all the Articles of the Christian faith,"

"that I should keep God's holy will and commandments and walk in the same all the days of my life"?

What can be better than to try to do this? If a bishop asks for a re-affirmation of these promises before he administers Confirmation to a young person, he should be most thankful when he finds these young people trying to "lead the rest of their life according to this beginning."

* * *

It may be true that some evangelicals are narrow, and some are a little censorious, and some hypercritical, but these are rather juvenile faults which more mature experience will remove or mollify. Our point is that they take the Gospel seriously—is that not an immense asset to any church in these islands to-day?

Evangelicalism is the original and genuine Christian tradition. It is no use pretending that every later development of Christian thought and habit is entitled to equal respect and influence among professing Christians. The faith the New Testament reveals, exemplifies, and inculcates is not a shapeless lump to be moulded by later hands into novel shapes, but the tradition of first-century Christianity. It has never been shown to be inadequate or defective as a way of life, or as a creed (or credal basis). We do not question the propriety of many adaptations of the faith of the New Testament, or of developments in ways of worship as long as they are subordinate to God's Word and consistent with it, and founded upon it. The authorised standards of worship of the Church of England and of the Church of Scotland satisfy this requirement. They are evangelical.

Some readers may remember an old work "Milner's Church History." The author traced through the centuries down to near the Reformation the evangelical witness, and portrayed men in each age whose teachings and writings seemed to him to conform to the New Testament standard. He did his work fairly well. Had he been writing a history of the Church as we understand historical research his work would be laughable, but his special purpose was religious, and its result is permanently valuable, for the principle is undoubtedly right. We cannot allow that "the Christian religion" was intended to evolve and develop as each age diluted or distorted it. In every age the Church ought to have been correcting its creed and procedure by the authentic written tradition, the New Testament.

You may call this a restricted and unimaginative concept of Christianity if you will; but it is the way it was intended to be—organic evolution is not the law of the Christian Creed.

* * *

A charge often brought against Evangelicalism is that it is Anti-intellectual. This means that evangelicals are thought to be an ignorant lot, blindly refusing to accept modern knowledge, "assured results", or anything enlightened. It is assumed that the reason is a stupid conservatism which springs from a want of ability. Now it is not stupidity to refuse to swallow the latest fancies or theories on any subject. It may be caution, and a sensible awareness that in the field of theology and Biblical Criticism fashions come and go. Also, it may be that evangelicals have been more concerned with getting on with the Christian task than with many very interesting but less urgent occupations. We are far from decrying Christian scholarship or the free range of thought, but we must not let ourselves be too much impressed by issues which are often evanescent.

But Evangelicalism is in fact a very intellectual and rational attitude, for it endeavours to reject what is superstitious, and quasi-magical in religion. It judges and rejects many theories in order that it may present Christianity as a plain reasonable open way of life to which every man can and ought to adapt himself. It does not perpetrate the folly of trying to adapt the religion to the man.

It is not anti-intellectual, for it accepts a radical and true diagnosis of the human condition. It recognises that the totality of man's nature is infected by sin, and that as a consequence none of man's faculties and powers can render him a service which is morally perfect: still less can they render God such service. For this condition it prescribes no quack nostrums or empirics. It has the true catholicism, the universal remedy "the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin" (1 John 1. 7.).

It is not anti-intellectual, for it puts first things first. We recall that distinguished Cambridge scholar the late Dr. F. R. Glover lecturing on the Christian faith, and warning us against those who had nothing to offer but "a belly-ful of side-issues." Glover's crude but effective phrase is memorable. Evangelicals do not waste time over side-issues. They are not constantly dodging round the point of the Gospel but centring upon it.

* * *

We may note how very respectable in enlightened circles is "Mysticism." In contrast many good people think that Evangelicalism is vulgar. Of course it has its vulgar exponents—what has not? It has always had its carpenters and fishermen and the like—Carey was a shoemaker, Bunyan a tinker, Whitefield a pot-boy etc. But Behmen the German mystic who had most influence in England (inspiring such Anglicans as William Law and John Wesley) was like Carey, a shoemaker, and many another mystic has worked with his hands (as Paul did at the tent-making), so we cannot regard mysticism as suitable only for superior people. What is Evangelicalism but "Christian Mysticism" of the best sort? It is the true Christian mysticism for it claims direct communion with the Tri-une God. It is Christian mysticism for it teaches communion through Christ "in the truth of our nature" as well as in His Sonship.

But only a cleansed heart and conscience can sustain true and full communion with God. Hence Evangelicalism lays emphasis on the Precious Blood, and on redeeming love.

* * *

Evangelicalism, as we have said, postulates Scripture as the Christian Rule of Faith. We need not go into the question of Inspiration though it has given rise to anti-intellectual charges against evangelicals from time to time. The present enthusiasm for "Biblical theology" certainly suggests a movement among scholars towards a positive and constructive attitude on the Bible. When the scholars reach that point they will of course find the Evangelicals there before them.

* * *

Evangelicals are supposed to be weak in their concept of the Church. Perhaps they are—but it may be better to be weak than to be wrong, and many wrong views of the Church exist today.

The Church of England in its Articles ventured only to define "the visible church": could it have done more? We think its reticence or reserve a sign of wisdom. If the Church is part of the Gospel (as it is), it cannot be denied that its true character and destiny are largely unknown, for what is visibly organised on earth "by schisms rent asunder" is something in which good and evil are mixed up "until the harvest."

In the Divine purpose its importance is secondary. But it is not to be ignored since it is the instrument (though not the End) of God's purposes. We agree that there is much here to be examined, especially the relationship of the Church to the Kingdom of God.

* * *

Finally we may use the brief New Testament phrase to sum up Evangelicalism's programme—"Repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ." The power to effect this is the power of the Holy Spirit, and Evangelicalism has always kept this to the forefront. Through the same Spirit victory over sin is real victory and can be lasting victory.

We have not exhausted our subject but put down some notes (originally addressed to university students) with the claim that the Evangelical faith is robust, true, reasonable Christianity.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

"Is it possible to be a Christian and not live the Christian life?"

"What is the Christian life?"

"Are there different sorts of Christian life?"

These questions belong together. They ought not to be separated. They go to the root of a vital matter: to the fundamental problem of the Christian faith, which is this—can we make our peace with God by an orthodox confession of faith; or must we, in addition to our faith, follow conscientiously the example of Christ and obey His teaching? Will our confession of a true faith absolve us from the necessity of Christian living?

Someone may hastily answer that "we are justified by faith, not by deeds." That is of course the plain truth, but after justification what follows? Surely the proof of faith is not the faith we confess, but the faith we live. The Apostle James in what may be the oldest writing in the New Testament tells us clearly that the transformed life and the transformed relationship to others go hand in hand. James indeed expounds the parable of the Good Samaritan and shows us that we cannot escape the implications of faith—we are to be "doers of the Word, not hearers only." It has always seemed to us a foolish and misconceived interpretation of this apostle which makes him an opponent, or at least a critic of St. Paul. We are sure that James and Paul wholeheartedly approved of each other's writings and recognised the plain guidance of God the Holy Spirit. When St. Paul expounds justification by Faith, which is in reality an axiomatic fact of our religion, he cannot possibly be contemplating a faith which is barren, or unrelated to conduct. The only point to insist on is the priority of faith, and the impossibility of our standard of conduct being so impeccable and consistent that it attains to perfection, so that it can stand on its own merits, not on the merits of Him who when we were yet sinners died for us.

* * *

We must insist on the good life, and in the works of love as being essential to the Christian; for good deeds are the fruits of the right faith. We are bound to say that it is not possible to be a Christian and not live the Christian life; we admit of course that our nature, infirm as it is, must occasion failures, but not so as to falsify our intentions or frustrate them utterly. A man cannot say he believes the Christian faith sincerely without awareness of the implications, and that such faith entails a standard of conduct which has little significance apart from the Christian faith. So the faith is never an abstraction. We believe God so we recognise the obligations of our belief. There are beliefs which have no necessary effect on conduct: such as the belief that Bacon wrote Shakespeare's plays, but, belief in God and in Our Lord Jesus Christ is not of that sort.

We are committed, then, to the Christian life as a necessary consequence of the Christian faith.

* * *

"What is the Christian life?" This is a great question, and no complete or exhaustive answer can be given, for the Christian life must be lived in accord with one's own personality. Of course we mean Christian personality, redeemed, restored, renewed by Grace. We may illustrate this roughly by the following recollection—some twenty or more years ago we attended a meeting in Dublin Mansion House. The occasion was a John Bunyan Commemoration, and the principal speaker was Dr. Hutton, then editor of the "British Weekly." Though by no means given to admiration of Dr. Hutton, we gratefully remember one thing he said. He spoke of Bunyan's lament over his sins, and how easy it was to ridicule his inclusion among his sins his addiction to bell-ringing. But, said Hutton, "we don't know what bell-ringing meant to Bunyan". That is the point where individual personality comes in—a trifle to one is a grievous moral burden to another. Only Bunyan could tell why bell-ringing was a sin for him. He said it was and we have no right to dismiss his confession as a ridiculous fantasy. He lived in accord with his own personality both as a sinner and later as a Christian. One man's temptations are not necessarily another's.

Equally, one man's gifts and talents are not necessarily another's, and the service of God is wide enough to provide scope for a rich diversity of human qualities. The main thing is the true consecration of all our abilities, with constant prayer that the Holy Spirit will teach us how to apply ourselves to the work of Our Master.

Though we cannot prescribe a universal pattern of the Christian life (apart from the sense in which Our Lord's earthly life is the pattern), we can recognise certain imperatives—Christlikeness must be sought, and the means of grace are the way to it. By prayer, by reading the Scriptures, by self-examination, and confession to God, by the right use of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, by the different steps of discipleship we live the Christian life, never forgetting that the key to the whole vocation of the Christian is love—"Thou shalt love the Lord Thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength, and thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." (Mark 12. 30).

St. Paul has set out the nature of the Christian life in a vivid compelling phrase—"till Christ be formed in you" (Gal. 4. 19). He expresses the fulness of the experience in the same epistle when he writes of himself "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me" (Gal. 2. 20). The incentive to the true life is this "I live by the faith of the Son of God who loved me, and gave himself for me".

* * *

"Are there different sorts of Christian life?" We put this question because it is fashionable in some circles to speak of "the higher Christian life." The intention in speaking thus is a good one; but the phrase is, we think, an unhappy one, for it tends to give the impression that there are superior sorts of Christians who live the higher life, and inferior sorts who get along with something less. Maybe the parable of the talents can teach us here—Our Lord told the story of the man who committed his goods to his servants when he was going to a distant place, and directed them to do business on his behalf till his return. One servant had five talents to negotiate with, and another had only two. Both did their best, and had satisfactory results, and to each was said the identical word of praise "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord." There is no contrast between a higher and a lower sort of life, represented by five and two talents, but a challenge that each man should live up to the full extent of his capacity; that each should "do with his might" whatsoever his hand found to do. (Eccl. 9. 10).

There can be only one sort of Christian life even though we see that there are diversities of gifts (1. Cor 12, 4). Each member of the body is given its function. One may have a seemingly more distinguished part to play than another, but the Apostle's reasoning in this twelfth chapter of First Corinthians should convince us that the claims and duties of the Christian life apply to all, and what is sought is not that there should be Christians on the ordinary level, and other Christians on a higher level, but all who profess the name of Christ should "depart from iniquity" (2 Tim. 2, 19).

We think that all professing Christians should seek the things which are above (Col. 3, 1), and so make plain that they are not 'nominal' Christians, (indeed, nominal Christians have no title to be called Christians or accepted as such).

* * *

The striving progressive Christian life is fully described in the New Testament. It involves the difference of 'the two paths'—"Broad is the way which leadeth to destruction," but "strait is the gate, and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life." First, we must recognise what Our Lord Jesus Christ has done on our behalf—that He died for us, and that representatively we are dead to sin through Him. We are to count ourselves no longer under sin's influence, or interested in its allurements. We are to be at all times conscious of 'the price of sin'; that it cost the life of the Prince of Glory. We are to be dead unto sin and alive unto God (Rom. 6, 11).

Secondly, we are to fix upon that phrase "alive unto God through Jesus Christ," and to turn it into reality. We have been quickened by Christ, raised from the death of sin by Him, and "our lives are hid with Christ in God" (Col. 3, 1-3). We are to walk, therefore, "in newness of life" (Rom. 6, 4), knowing in ourselves the power of His resurrection.

Thirdly, our repentance, conversion, regeneration are to be practical things—we have "put off" the old ways; sinful, shiftless, spiritless. We have "put on" the new way of life, and to safeguard it, have "put on the whole armour of God" (Eph. 6, 11).

How can there be in true Christianity any but the one way? For all of us there is but one commitment—some have gone further and more quickly upon the path than others, but all must follow it, and God who gave the gifts and talents (few or many), will give the grace to enable each of His children to attain the goal.

Final preservation is not in doubt.

INCREASED TENSION?

The National Association for Mental Health's two-day conference, which is being held behind drawn red-plush curtains in the baroque splendour of the Royal Hall Harrogate, got off to a sluggish start recently. Perhaps the central theme—mental health and personal responsibility—proved an unexpectedly hard nut to crack. Whatever the cause, few of the earlier speakers succeeded in reaching the kernel.

Opening the conference, the Minister of Education, Sir David Eccles, took an oblique route to the business in hand by discussing the rude health enjoyed by members of Parliament. As a group, they have more than their share of mental stress, frustration, and other emotional hazards. Yet they continue to be remarkably sane. The reason he suggested for the small amount of mental ill health to be found in the Commons was that the people sent there have faith in the service they are giving to the country.

Developing his theme, he wondered why stress and strain were so widespread nowadays and what accounted for the increase in tension. It could not be poverty, as we were all getting richer—or nearly all. It could not be social insecurity. It might be fear of atomic attack: but he did not think that the Communist campaign of conquest through panic had made any impression on the British people. He concluded that we were disabled because so many people had lost their faith in anything outside their own immediate interests.

Convictions

He ended by asking: "Do you agree that the personal responsibility of individuals standing up for the things they believe in counts for more than anything in the mental health and happiness of mankind—" The question was rhetorical, and neither Lord Feversham, who replied briefly, nor any subsequent speaker attempted a reply.

Sir Geoffrey Vickers confessed that he did not know what personal responsibility meant, and the more he thought of the subject the less he understood it. But then, he felt, neither did anyone else. He proved willing, though, to quote the common usages of the phrase. For a while he looked like expressing a firm opinion on the effect which the Welfare State has had on personal responsibility, but after presenting the pros and cons he took refuge in neutrality.

Personal responsibility, said Sir Geoffrey, was bad for mental health. It was enough to drive anyone crazy, and often did. The mental hospitals were full of people who had escaped from responsibility because they could not bear the burden of coping with it. Even the surgery, which relieved some mental disturbances, only made people less responsible.

The irresponsible, happy-go-lucky type remained offensively healthy in mind while the responsible man worried himself into peptic ulcers and an early grave. (The Minister's members of Parliament were evidently exceptional.)

The trouble, he felt, was that people who were responsible made their responsibility an excessive burden or carried more than they were fit for. "We still have much to learn from mental science," he said, "about how to limit our responsibilities and how to bear those which we have."

Frustrations

Dr. G. R. Hargreaves, Nuffield Professor of Psychiatry at the University of Leeds, exploded the popular fallacy that psychiatrists believe that children should never be frustrated or repressed. Frustration, he said, was the inevitable lot of the infant. If they were tolerable, frustrations were a stimulus to healthy development, but if intolerable, they could be dangerous and even crippling.

He also decried the belief of some psychiatrists that the whole matter of personality deficiencies is settled in infancy. Early parental relationships were undoubtedly of immense importance, but they were a prototype. Later came the schoolteacher. But another important type of relationship in childhood was that of the child with its equals. With the present small families and widely spaced births many children were being deprived of this relationship for the first five years of their life.

The nursery school could replace this deficiency. In fact it was probably the only way in which young children could be given the opportunity of the formative relationship with their contemporaries that would normally be the case in large families.

Disaster?

Dr. Mary Burbury, Lecturer in Child Psychiatry at the University of Leeds, felt that the closing of day nurseries could well be a disaster in some cases. One of the worst errors we had made and might be still making, she said, was thinking that the only use for the day nursery was for the child of the mother who worked.

For her part she would be inclined to refuse a child under five admission unless the mother could satisfy her that it was absolutely necessary to work. She would admit any child who was deprived of child companionship or whose living quarters were cramped and limited. In all-day nurseries and nursery schools she would insist on parents' groups.

Dr. W. D. Wall, of Unesco's department of education, also talked about personal responsibility and the child in its educational aspects.

Sir Charles Morris, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Leeds, was in the chair.

—"Manchester Guardian," 13/4/'56.

[This conflict of expert opinion as to the value of personal responsibility and faith ought to be solved by the renewed realisation that personal responsibility, not borne alone, but shared with God, is the key to usefulness, to understanding the divine purpose, and to mental health. Irresponsibility is a denial of the status God has given us.]

SPAIN IN 1956.

REPORT FROM THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE CORRESPONDENT.

Article Six of the Spanish Constitution guarantees that non-Catholics shall not be molested for their religious beliefs, or in the exercise of private worship.

In spite of this during the year 1955 there have been a number of violations of this guarantee, which, in any case, is the minimum of rights which can be granted to a religious minority by a régime which claims not to be oppressive, and has recently been admitted to the United Nations Organization, and presumably, has accepted the Declaration of Human Rights. The principle of toleration has been violated in the following ways.

The Right of Meeting.

If Article Six means anything, it should provide a firm basis for the private meetings of any groups of evangelicals, either in recognised chapels or in private houses. In fact there are still over thirty chapels arbitrarily closed, and many groups who have desired to meet (after giving due notice of their intentions) have been hindered, and several workers fined. Home Office Orders have practically annulled the sense of Article Six by making the right of meeting in any locality to depend on a personal decision by the Provincial Governor. Outstanding cases of interference are: Murcia (city), Medina del Campo (where molestation has been intense), Chiclana de Segura (Prov. of Jaen), where the Mayor has proceeded in the most arbitrary way, and the Second Baptist Church in Madrid. The last case is notable in that every effort has been made to clarify the situation in the capital of the country and under the eye of the Central Government with no result up to the date of this report. It must be added that in most cases believers continue to meet in one way or another, and generally with the knowledge of local authorities, but under the threat of police raids and fines, and forced to a clandestinity which is far removed from the desires of law-abiding Christians. Conditions vary considerably from one district to another, but Evangelicals ask for a clear legal definition of their limited rights, and the knowledge that these will be respected, regardless of the personal predilections of local authorities and clerical influences brought to bear upon them.

Evangelical Publications.

During 1955, Evangelicals in Spain have encountered the worst difficulties for years in regard to publications. All so-called "propaganda" has been officially condemned, even to the simplest Gospel tract, from the early days of the present régime. In regard to Evangelical magazines for circulation among the churches, while no legal provision was made for them, the authorities presented a "blind eye" and allowed denominational publications to circulate. During the summer, however, Evangelical magazines printed in Barcelona were denounced one after the other, and legal cases against printers are in progress. It is not clear yet what the responsibilities of the promoters of these publications will be. First the Baptist ECO DE LA VERDAD was stopped, then the CRISTIANO ESPANOL, of the Spanish Christian Mission, and finally, EL CAMINO which circulated among the "Brethren" assemblies. With the knowledge of local censorship editors are "trying out" publications of uncertain dates and format which will not be considered as "magazines," hoping to maintain contact with fellow-believers of the different groups in this way. There is no official protection, however, and here again, Evangelicals are forced to a semi-clandestinity whereas they need and request a legal provision for all publications necessary for the edification and means of worship of a "tolerated" minority. Even Bibles and Hymn Books have to be produced and circulated in these same conditions.

Evangelical Conscripts in Military Service.

As a general rule believing conscripts who begin their period of compulsory military service are not forced to attend R.C. services if they have been duly inscribed Evangelicals—they have often to work quite hard to get the inscription made—though many of them have to suffer vexatious treatment from fanatical or brutal officers, losing privileges which would normally be theirs. But a very real difficulty arises some six weeks after the annual intake of recruits when the "Jura de la Bandera" ("swearing in" of new recruits) is accompanied by the celebration of mass as an integral part of the ceremony. This means that the Evangelical soldiers need to be excused a military as well as a religious act, and the official attitude is that a soldier has to obey when he hears the cornet sound "Present arms" (kneeling), and it doesn't matter to him whether he has the Host before him or anything else. Of course, from the faithful believer's point of view the Host is the Host, and to kneel before it is idolatry, whether the mass is incorporated in a military ceremony or not.

What is the severest sentence for very many years for refusing to kneel in these circumstances has been pronounced on two believers serving in the marines in El Ferrol, N.W. Spain. The regional court martial (29th October 1954) sentenced them to two years' imprisonment, but an influential minority vote recommended a two months' sentence, which would really have meant acquittal while saving military "honour." The case was carried to the Supreme Military Court in Madrid, and by the sentence of 18th May 1955 the two years' sentence was unanimously confirmed. This is the most serious aspect of the case, as the tribunal is the highest military judicial authority.

A petition for reprieve has been presented. Prayer is asked that this may lead to the release of these two splendid young men, whose conduct has been irreproachable on the testimony of their own military chiefs. Another similar case is "sub judice" in Valencia.

Strangely enough, at this very time, there are indications that the Army itself is taking measures to prevent a repetition of these incidents which must be vexatious to right thinking officers as well as a most severe trial to faithful Evangelicals. These measures have been normal in Catalonia for some years, since a brother was tried by Court Martial for refusing to kneel to the Host in Figueras three years ago. He had spent three months in the lock-up on being arrested, but the sentence was mild, and so arranged that he should have no more time to serve. It is possible that the suffering of our two brethren in El Ferrol may also be a means of relief for the many who will be called up in the future. The arrangements would consist in an alternative ceremony of "swearing-in" for non-Catholic recruits.

The Marriage Question.

The question is by no means solved, as some Evangelicals at home seem to think. There have been two satisfactory sentences by Madrid tribunals in cases appealed on, and a few ecclesiastical authorities have passed on "mixed" cases (where one party is baptised and the other not) to the civil authorities for marriage. Local judges in Spain have a considerable degree of autonomy, and many who are fanatically opposed to Evangelicals refuse to perform the civil ceremony in the case of "baptised" persons. There are two cases on appeal in Madrid at the moment. The results of these will be important, as the more favourable resolutions we get, the greater the possibility of our being able successfully to influence local judges.

A general appeal by the Evangelical community to the Chief of State on all these matters is being presented in these days, while special ones have been, or are being presented to the appropriate ministers. Evangelicals in Spain ask for the moral and spiritual backing of their fellow-Christians in democratic lands in regard to these new approaches to the Government.

REVIEWS.

"THE GLORY TO BE."

The Protestant Truth Society has published as a new booklet Mr. J. A. Kensit's recent paper before the Prophecy Investigation Society on the two last chapters of Revelation describing the glories of the Eternal state.

"PROTESTANT MARTYRS UNDER MARY TUDOR."

The Protestant Truth Society has done good service during recent months in the endeavour to keep alive the memory of the heroes of the faith who died under the cruel persecution of Mary Tudor.

Following upon the luminous gatherings throughout the country, the Society has now issued a striking brochure of 120 pages, reproducing pictures of the Reformers and of their Memorials.

Many will treasure this new publication as bringing within a short compass the lessons from the lives of those who endured the flames in the great cause of truth 400 years ago.

BIBLES.

On a page devoted to books it might be well to say a little about the Book of Books, and how it is being dealt with in Spain to-day. A month or two ago the Spanish authorities seized the whole stock of Bibles of the British and Foreign Bible Society at Madrid. This has been defended by a Roman Catholic bishop, on the ground that the Bibles are really a "propaganda arsenal," and a very large one at that, for they number more than 36,000, while Protestants are usually estimated at about 20,000. It is likely enough that the usual estimate is wrong, for the book "Mission Fields To-day," reviewed on this page, gives the number as 30,000. But that is beside the point. The point to note is this fear of the Bible, and the way in which it is dealt with. Tyndale's Testaments were bought up and burned by the bishop of London, but the money was used for issuing another edition. The Spanish authorities are not going to make the same mistake, for they neither propose to tell what they are doing with the Bibles, nor do they propose to pay for them.

Questions were asked in the House of Lords about the matter, and the Embassy in Madrid has requested the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs to investigate the matter with a view to the restoration of the seized property. These Bibles were in no way propaganda, except in the sense that all Bibles are propaganda. They contained nothing but the plain text of the Bible in Spanish.

"The Baptist World" shows that people in Spain are being imprisoned for reading the Bible. Here is a note about it—"In another Spanish city, a prison guard who carried gifts of food sent by the women's society of each of two Churches to a Baptist woman jailed for reading the Bible to five others in her home ("an authorised meeting" according to the authorities), wants to attend an evangelical church. The prisoner, mother of four, has just been released after thirty days of complete isolation."

"The Tablet" of 12th May also deals with the matter of the Bibles. It lays the blame completely on the shoulders of Spanish officialdom, and says that they can be very ham-handed. Well, all officials can be ham-handed, but there is more than ham-handedness in this; as can be seen by the bishop's defence of the action, and his attack upon Protestants generally. "The Tablet" declares itself "left wondering what possible advantage some official saw in seizing stocks of Bibles from the British and Foreign Bible Society without any intelligent explanation." If this was the only instance of this kind of thing, then we might wonder, too, but it happens too often for us to be convinced that only officials are involved and that it happens inadvertently. There is a Church which claims the Bible as its own, and yet, not once but many times, resorts to this sort of thing. But the plain fact of the matter is that there is that in the Bible, and especially in the New Testament, which flatly and forthrightly condemns much that the Roman Church stands for to-day. The writer admits the disabilities imposed on Spanish Protestants in Spain and "in one or two places in Latin America," but says that these are imposed, not by the Church, but by the State. This is interesting, but it is comment enough to say that it is a case of "The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau." The Church of Rome could stop this kind of thing the day after to-morrow, if it wanted to.

—"The Bulwark," Edinburgh, July, 1956.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 98

has the right to restrict the rights of Protestants to the point of persecution. His following statement should be carefully studied and remembered:

"The desire of Spain not to become a Protestant mission camp is quite natural . . . If the (Roman) Catholic Church believes it professes the true religion why should it be subjected to adverse propaganda to rob it of its faith?"

Here we have the attitude that no Protestant Church has the right to operate in Spain. If a Christian Church is to be true to Christ, the founder of the faith, it must not only worship, but strive to tell others of the "Good News." But this is the argument used by the government authorities in every Roman Catholic dominated country for the extirpation of Protestantism within its borders. And it becomes the spur of religious persecution when the Roman Church gains the majority of the citizens of any state. It is the pretext given for the terrorism and murder against Protestants in Colombia and for the restrictions imposed in Italy.

R.C. Paper's Protest

As a matter of fact, the ambassador's plain avowal of the right of persecution of religious minorities alarmed some quarters of the Roman Church in the United States. An editorial in an angry tone in "The Indiana Catholic and Record," the newspaper of the R.C. archdiocese of Indianapolis, declared:

"We (American) Roman Catholics are making reasonably successful efforts to live . . . in harmony with Protestant neighbours. We can hardly appreciate the zeal of our Spanish co-religionists when by some unexplained high handedness towards their tiny Protestant minority they cause our neighbours to harbour dark suspicions of our true feelings towards them."

This is a rebuke that may or may not have any effect upon the opinions of the Spanish ambassador or his overlords. The anger in the repudiation is not so much at the flagrant violation of the basic human right of freedom of worship in Spain which the Seminary closing exemplified, but rather at the embarrassment the incident and the ambassador's mention and embellishment of it caused the Indiana Roman Catholics in their contacts with Protestants. If the paper had defended the principle involved it would have been more hopeful, but as it is its protest can only be regarded as resulting from temporary discomfort as the Protestant people are reminded by the Spanish U.S. envoy of what the Roman Church's attitude invariably is when it wields the upper hand in any country.

Latin American Bishops Explain Objection to Protestantism.

Writing about the conference of the Latin American Roman Catholic episcopate held during the international eucharistic congress in Rio de Janeiro, last summer, Dr. Boer, a highly cultured priest, says that the bishops faced the fact that the number of Protestant missionaries in Latin America increased from 2,414 in 1938, to 5,688 in 1952—an increase due, in his opinion, to the transfer of many men and women from the Orient. He says this "doubling" of missionaries has brought a "doubling" of converts, to a total of 3,215,669 in 1952. Fr. Boer reports on the reply formulated by the bishops to the appeal the conference received from the Evangelical Confederation of Brazil asking that something be done to stop the persecution of Protestants in Brazil. That reply has never been published. However, Fr. Boer describes it as a "document full of Christian charity and apostolical responsibility" and says it grants the "rights" of people born Protestant but deplores proselytising among those who belong de jure to the Roman Catholic Church. Rome, he declares, cannot but be concerned over the success of the Protestant schools, since the 70 or 80 per cent. of children enrolled in them who are Roman Catholics either "abandon the religion of their fathers" or become indifferent in matters of faith. In another article Boer states that, "only 15 to 30 per cent. of Latin American Catholics, including children, practise the laws and precepts of the Church."—Quoted in "The Vigilant," Melbourne, 14/5/'56.

Protestants in Spain.

In reply to a question by Viscount Alexander of Hillsborough in the House of Lords recently, the Marquess of Reading, the Foreign Minister, stated that there had been no favourable development regarding the seizure of the stock of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Madrid. He added that the Spanish authorities might consider that the Society's work in Spain had been on a scale suggestive of proselytism, which was held to be contrary to Spanish law. By "proselytism" in this case, we may point out, is meant, presumably, the selling of Bible Society Scriptures to anyone who is reckoned to be an adherent of the Roman Catholic Church. Viscount Alexander promptly pointed out that the Spanish authorities' suggestion about proselytising was in contradiction to all that Spain took responsibility for when she signed the Declaration of Human Rights, Article 18 of which is quite specific on the question of religious freedom. Meanwhile, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Vizcarra, ecclesiastical counsellor of Catholic Action in Spain, has described the literature of the Bible Society as an "enormous arsenal of Protestant propaganda." He has also vigorously protested against the recent consecration of Bishop Molina as Bishop of the Spanish Episcopal Reformed Church. In 1941 Dr. Molina was sentenced by a secret tribunal to twelve years' imprisonment, ostensibly on the ground that he had once been a Freemason, although there can be no doubt that the real cause of his offending was that he was a Protestant pastor. After three years, he was released and returned to his church in Seville. His church was raided by Romish partisans who burnt Bibles and New Testaments in front of the Communion Table. It is all too evident that Franco's Government is not prepared to honour its signature to the Declaration of Human Rights.

Valued at £3

All were charged with assaulting Miller and Bond and with causing malicious damage to books, magazines, papers and other articles valued at £3, the property of Miller.

Superintendent Thomas Lavin, Killaloe, prosecuted, and Mr. J. M. Houlihan, solicitor, appeared for the accused. Later Mr. G. Goldberg, solicitor, appeared for Miller.

Stephen Miller said that he was a minister of religion and a member of Jehovah's Witnesses. On Sunday, May 13th, with Mr. Bond, he had been going from house to house in the Clonlara area for two or three hours using the Bible and preaching to the people.

They were well received; quite a number of people listened to them, and no objections were raised. They were on their way home on his motor-cycle, with Bond on the pillion, when a car which was in front of them suddenly stopped close to a parked car to form a road block, so as to leave no passage for traffic.

Sensed Trouble

A number of men were standing on the roadway and, sensing trouble, he drove over the grass margin to get past them. One of the men, whom he now identified as Mr. Meskell, tried to hinder their passage by grabbing hold of Mr. Bond by the arm and trying to pull him off the motor-cycle, but they got away.

They drove ahead and eventually arrived at the Angler's Rest. He tried to get to a telephone, but this shop had none and, consequently, they had to wait until the crowd came upon them.

After a few minutes, the crowd approached, led by their priest, and the priest said: "Are you the men going around distributing and selling heretic books and articles?"

He (Miller) then had his bag and brief case taken from him. He protested to the priest and said he wanted to get the guards, but he was told that no guards were needed to deal with him.

Struck on Chin

One of the men caught his flask and asked the priest whether he would break it, but the priest said not to. Another man jumped forward and struck him on the chin and he was pushed around by a number of the men. He was warned to leave the place and never to return.

Cross-examined by Mr. Houlihan, Mr. Miller said he had been "ordained a minister by God, Who had communicated with him through the Spirit." This had been confirmed by a certificate issued by the governing body of Jehovah's Witnesses.

PASSING EVENTS.

Priest and Parishioners Charged with Assaulting Two Jehovah's Witnesses.

The District Court in Limerick was crowded for the hearing of a case in which a priest and ten laymen were charged with assault and malicious damage arising from an incident at Clonlara, Co. Clare, last May, when books and pamphlets were seized from two Jehovah's Witnesses and burned in public. The Most Rev. Dr. Rodgers, R.C. Bishop of Killaloe, was among those in Court.

All the charges were brought at the suit of the Attorney-General.

The charges of assault were found proved and dismissed under the Probation of Offenders Act. The other charges were dismissed.

The members of Jehovah's Witnesses concerned, Stephen G. Miller, who described himself as a minister of religion, of 7 Abbey Avenue, Corbally, Limerick, and Henry Bond, of Castle Park, Limerick, were bound to the peace in their own sureties of £100 each and independent sureties of £100.

At the afternoon session of the Court, recognisances were fixed by District Justice Gordon Hurley in the event of an appeal.

Questioned about a book published by the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society on behalf of Jehovah's Witnesses, and entitled "Let God Be True," Miller said he agreed with the statement in the book that the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity was of pagan origin and that Satan was the author of it.

Asked if he knew that the Constitution of this country, under which the Courts whose protection he sought were established, began "In the Name of the Most Holy Trinity, from Whom is all Authority," he replied that he did.

Devil's Authority

Mr. Houlihan—According to you the laws of the land and the Constitution of this country are under the authority and authorship of Satan, the Devil himself.

Miller—It is not surprising when you see the conduct of its ministers of religion.

Mr. Houlihan asked questions about Pastor Russell, who, he said was the founder of Jehovah's Witnesses and about "scandalous cartoons" derogatory of Almighty God, the Blessed Virgin, the Christian Church, the Pope and organised religion. Miller said he thought the cartoons were commendable "because their purpose was to open the people's eyes to the truth."

Questioned about proceedings brought against Pastor Russell by his wife for infidelity, Miller said he did not see what this had to do with the events at Clonlara.

Home Paid For

In further replies he said he was aged 36 and his home and food were provided and paid for by the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, who also gave him money for blades and other necessities. He said he knew that the British House of Lords had refused to recognise members of Jehovah's Witnesses as ministers of religion or exempt them from military service.

Henry Bond said that he accompanied Miller to Clonlara, and witnessed the attack on him. He had called to a number of houses in the area, and when people would not buy books, or had not the money to do so, he gave them away free.

At the Angler's Rest he saw Father Ryan lead a crowd of men, and these men took the bags from Mr. Miller and himself and burned them. He thought that the men took exception to a remark of Mr. Miller's, which was, "Look here, chappie" (meaning the priest). He and his friend were pushed about, and their brief cases taken and books burned.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Dr. Todd and Anti-Christ.

Dear Sir,

Regarding Dr. Todd and Anti-Christ, his treatise had no such effect and his influence is greatly exaggerated by the French Romanist dictionary which you quote. One of Todd's chief objects in all that he wrote was seemingly to merit the approval of Archbishop Whately and Whately's friends in England and Ireland. He certainly did not use his scholarship to defend the Evangelical or Reformed faith. Whately, who had a large measure of the leaven of Laud, had declared that "he would make Calvinism as dead as the dodo in the Church of Ireland." As you know, amongst the points in Ussher's Irish Articles against which, the Laud party excepted, were (vide Collier) . . . "an article was framed to justify the morality of the Sunday Sabbath and requiring the spending of it wholly in religious exercises . . . the pope is made anti-christ, pursuant to the doctrine of the Calvinistic synod at Gappe, in Dauphing . . ." These two points were hated particularly by the Laud party, as they are by the Anglo-Catholics of to-day. Whately was upset to find that these doctrines of the old Irish articles, not found in the Nine and Thirty Articles (although they are, at least implicit in the Homilies) were widely taught and believed in the Church of Ireland, hence his outbursts.

Dr. Wm. Urwick published his "Triple Crown" in Dublin in 1851, maintaining that the succession of Popes is Anti-Christ, the Man of Sin and Son of Perdition. The same position has been maintained by many 19th century divines who have held the Orthodox belief and defended it since Dr. Todd wrote the work you mention. Admittedly, it is not held so widely to-day, but this is scarcely due to Todd, who had comparatively little influence and is almost forgotten.

It has been largely replaced by two schools of thought, viz:—

(a) Amongst Evangelicals, the "Futurist view, which you seem to favour. This was originated in the 16th century by a Spanish Jesuit named Ribera and adopted by the Laud party in the Church of England. Its prevalence in Evangelical circles is largely due to J. N. Darby, who was originally a High Churchman, and the Plymouthites who came after him. However they bitterly disagree about details, they all look for a "future" anti-Christ. It found its way into Non-conformist circles via the Rev. M. Baxter and into the Evangelical party of the Church of England via Bullinger and Griffith Thomas. Incidentally, Newman advocated it in Tract 83. Also Edward Irving.

(b) Amongst Modernists, the "Praeterist" view prevails. This was also invented by a Spanish Jesuit—Alcasar—in the 17th century. This has been taken up with enthusiasm by the Germans Eichorn, Kuenen, Delitzsch, etc., men like Driver, Swete, Sir Wm. Ramsay, etc. have followed them.

The World Council of Churches holds that the Church of Rome is a Christian Church and part of the universal Church, and it regrets that Rome doesn't join it. Rome will join it, if and when it gives recognition to the Pope's alleged headship.

However, the Homilies of the Church of England describe the Church of Rome as "anti-Christian" and lacking the marks of a true Church," which it lists, using the same phraseology as the Confessio Scotica, or Scots Confession, of 1559, except for the word "church" instead of "kirk." The teaching of the Homilies is endorsed in one of the "Nine and Thirty Articles." The Pope is obviously the anti-Christ in the preface to the Authorised Version of the Bible, as you are aware.

Regarding the Methodists, John Wesley maintained that the Pope was anti-Christ and this position was maintained emphatically by the best of the Methodists, down to the late Dr. Dinsdale Young. To-day they are mostly Modernists and therefore Praeterists.

In the case of Presbyterians, para. VI. chap. XXV of the "Confession of Faith" states "There is no head of the Church, but the Lord Jesus Christ, nor can the Pope of Rome in any sense be head thereof; but is that anti-Christ, that man of sin and son of perdition, that exalteth himself in the Church against Christ and all that is called God." In some American Presbyterian Churches, (including the Orthodox Presbyterian Church!) the words: "but is that anti-Christ . . ." etc. have been omitted.

In the "Directory for Public Worship," the fall of Anti-Christ is one of the numerous matters which the minister is directed to pray for. I remember reading the diary of a "United Irishman," in which he said that he was brought up as an Orthodox Presbyterian but afterwards attached himself to a minister of the "Presbytery of Antrim." One of his chief objections to the orthodox ministers was that they prayed for the downfall of Anti-Christ!

I remember, in between the two World Wars, someone complained to a Highland Presbytery—I think it was F. P., but it may have been Free Church—about a certain "final year" Divinity student who had acted as supply to a certain congregation. The complaint was that he had "omitted to pray for the King and for the overthrow of Anti-Christ (two omissions that will rouse the ire of the average orthodox Highland congregation). His excuse was that he "forgot, owing to preoccupation of his mind," and the Presbytery admonished him and enjoined on him the importance of remembering such matters in future, quite properly.

—P.B.

ARE THERE SACRIFICING PRIESTS IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH?

(A broadcast in "The Case for Protestantism" Series by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond)

Father Johnston takes up the challenge of Canon Maynard on the subject of the intention of the Church of England Ordinal. He is not troubled with any sentiment of false tolerance and it is refreshing to find a man who states the facts candidly without heat and without evasion. I believe he has made good his point that it was the deliberate intention of the English Ordinal to destroy alike the idea of the Mass as it was then used in the Church of Rome and with it to destroy the idea of a continuance of an order of sacrificing priests. It would not be fair to deny that in this matter he marshals convincing evidence against Canon Maynard. I agree with him that "The Reformers expressly repudiated the idea of a true sacrificing priesthood and that they changed their ordinal to ensure the exclusion of such a priesthood." This is a point evidently on which there can be no compromise.

Father Johnston tells us "The Catholic Church . . . has followed . . . the practice ever since of re-ordaining absolutely, and not merely conditionally, any Anglican convert clergymen who wish to become priests." There is at least no ambiguity here. Father Johnston says I am not a sacrificing priest and so say I. The difference is that I dare to add Father Johnston is not a sacrificing priest either. His claim has as little foundation in Scripture as the claim of any Anglo-Catholic. There are no sacrificing priests in the Christian Church. The Reformers were right in removing from the Ordinal all suggestions that the ministers as such were sacrificers. I agree with Father Johnston that "The Reformers retained the titles, bishops, priests and deacons, but they made quite clear that they did not attach the traditional meaning to them." I understand of course by the word traditional the meaning that had been imposed since the twelfth century. The Reformers restored the scriptural and primitive tradition. This is the clear point at issue. How does Father Johnston meet it? First he denies that the words "Receive ye the Holy Ghost" spoken by Our Lord on the night of His Resurrection made the Apostles priests. According to Father Johnston these words conferred the power to forgive sins on those who were already priests. I must not be taken as accepting the view that these words conferred power on the Apostles and on the Apostles only. We can agree on the fact that neither in Father Johnston's opinion nor in mine have we here the conveyance of the power of sacrifice. Where have we it then? Father Johnston tells us. The Apostles were ordained priests at the Last Supper. According to Father Johnston, it was then they were given "the primary and essential powers of priesthood, namely to offer sacrifice." Of course, if that is established, the case is finished. But Father Johnston like the Council of Trent is content with bare assertion. Indeed he does not go as far as the Council of Trent. The Council declares: "If any one saith, that by these words 'Do this for the commemoration of Me,' Christ did not institute the Apostles, priests, or did not ordain that they, and other priests should offer His own body and blood; let him be anathema" (Ses. XXII, Can. II). It is to be assumed that Father Johnston follows the Council of Trent. But there is no evidence that "Do this" means either "Sacrifice this" or "make a sacrifice." The word "do" occurs 550 times in the New Testament. The English version employs 30 different words to translate it. Yet it is never once translated "offer." Nor is it so translated in the Roman Catholic Vulgate.

There is an interesting point here in the fact that St. Matthew represents our Lord as saying, "I will do the passover with my disciples," where our version reads, "I will keep the Passover." St. Luke and St. Mark in the parallel passage read, "I may eat the Passover." This then was our Lord's command "Do this" means "Eat this bread and drink this wine for a remembrance of me." One argument might meet this interpretation and explode it and only one. If it could be shown that every expositor from the Apostles' time until today consistently interpreted the words "offer sacrifice" then that interpretation would have to remain. But there is no hint of this in the New Testament. St. Paul says, "As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup ye do show the Lord's death till He come." He does not say "the priest sacrifices the Lord." And he is giving an explanation of the Lord's words. Yet again when he is giving instructions for the appointment of Church officers, presbyters, and deacons, he is silent on the question of sacrifice. He does not quote these crucial words as the authority for appointing presbyters. If he believed that our Lord then made priests by the use of these words, his silence is reprehensible. Paul withholds what the Council of Trent reveals. That is an absurd position.

Nor is the situation different when we pass into the early Christian writings outside the New Testament. Justin Martyr, speaking on the text in Isaiah, "bread shall be given him," says, "allusion is made to the bread which our Christ gave us to do in remembrance of his being made flesh on behalf of those who believe in Him, for whom also He suffered. In the context Justin says, "Prayers and giving of thanks are the only perfect and well-pleasing sacrifices to God... for such alone Christians have undertaken to do."

Cyprian expounds the words as teaching us that "as often as we eat this bread and drink this cup we do shew the Lord's death till He come." Eusebius says Our Lord "directed us to offer continually a memorial to God instead of a sacrifice." Chrysostom writes: "We do not make a different, as the high priest did, but always the same sacrifice; or rather, we do a remembrance of that Sacrifice." Many more examples could be given. Neither Scripture nor early tradition supports the argument of the Council of Trent. The argument is so flimsy that it looks like an afterthought. The idea of Sacrifice came first, the justification from Scripture came after and it is too weak to stand upon its feet.

But perhaps Father Johnston has something more to say? Well! He quotes a text of Scripture, "Every High Priest taken from among men is appointed as a representative of men in things that refer to God, that he may offer gifts and sacrifices for sin." But Father Johnston does not tell us that there are only two kinds of priests taken from among men mentioned in the context. The priests after the order of Aaron and our Lord Jesus Christ made an High Priest after the order of Melchisedec. We search in vain for any references to successors to our Lord Jesus Christ in His priestly office. We find instead the explicit statement that Our Lord because He continueth ever hath an unchangeable priesthood. In fact the contrast is emphasised between Melchisedec and the others and the contrast is found in the fact that Melchisedec is made like unto the Son of God and abideth a priest continually. When Father Johnston says, "The Reformers, however, did not believe in any true sacrifice to be offered by priests of the New Law," he forgets a very important New Testament doctrine.

The New Testament teaches that all true believers are united to Christ and made kings and priests unto God. But the sacrifices they offer are not sacrifices for sin but sacrifices of consecration of themselves and prayer and praise. This is not a function of the ministry as distinct from ordinary believers. It is the happy privilege of all who know the Lord. And to show that this is not a mere assertion like the bold claims made by the Council of Trent in relation to the narrative of the Lord's Supper the following facts are tabled for consideration. It is a fact of which St. Jerome was deeply conscious that the word priest in the New Testament is applied to the heathen priests of Jupiter, to the Jewish priests, to our Lord Jesus Christ our Great High Priest and to all believers, men and women alike. I am bold to challenge contradiction on that point. As the last usage is the only one likely to be seriously questioned, here are two passages that support it. The song of the redeemed out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation is "And hast made us unto our God, kings and priests and we shall reign on the earth." The second passage is found in the Epistle to the Hebrews where believers are exhorted "to offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to His Name." Is it not strange that if Our Lord instituted a special order of the sacrificing priests while we have these general statements as to priests and sacrifices the whole New Testament is silent regarding this special order?

The second important consideration is that we are told distinctly that the old Jewish priesthood was done away. We are told that all the old sacrifices have been fulfilled in Our Lord Jesus Christ.

The special parallel between our Lord's Offering and the Day of Atonement is treated at length. Not once in all the long succession of arguments is there a hint that the new priesthood is continued in a ministerial order. On the contrary we are told over and over again that our Lord is still our Great High Priest, but even in His case His great sacrifice lies in the past and needeth not to be repeated. He offered one sacrifice for sins for ever. Here surely is the place to connect the sacrifice of our Lord with the institution of an order of priests to continue His sacrifice if such an institution had His divine sanction. There is a very significant silence—the silence proves that the idea of sacrifice in the sense presented by Father Johnston is unknown to the writer and contradicts the very essence of his argument.

Then we have to point out that the duties of the ministry are set out in several passages and in none of them is the obligation to offer the Body and Blood of Christ even mentioned. St. Paul exhorts the elders of Ephesus to feed the Church of God. He is entirely silent on the matter of offering sacrifice for the Church of God and yet the Roman Ordinal says, "It is the duty of the priest to offer." The Ordinal places in the forefront what Paul does not even mention, much less elaborate. There are a number of functions mentioned in the Epistle to the Corinthians including "helps and governments." There is the same complete silence as to sacrifice. If it were the outstanding office of the Christian minister to offer sacrifice, it is impossible to believe that this feature could fail to find recognition.

Nor can we forget the fact that the form of ordination which now prevails in the Roman Catholic Church cannot be traced in any liturgy earlier than the twelfth century. This is admitted by eminent Roman Catholic liturgical scholars. Indeed Pope Leo XIII in his Bull "Apostolicæ Curæ" acknowledges that the earlier ordination forms are less explicit than the modern Roman rite. He argues, I think, convincingly, against those in the Anglo-Catholic camp who contend that the sacrificial meaning can be read into the older forms, that the removal of an expression is of more significance than the mere absence of it. He holds that the Church made explicit the priestly idea and the Reformers removed all phrases that expressed it clearly. I am, of course, using the word priest as equivalent to sacrificer. That argument must stand.

But there is an argument that has escaped the Pope's attention. According to the Council of Trent Our Lord made His Apostles priests by commanding "Do this in remembrance of me." Now if that tradition remained in the Christian Church we would expect to find these words or some reference to them embodied in the ordination forms. As a matter of fact when that idea took hold of leaders in the Christian Church the handing of a paten and chalice at ordination was included in the Ordinal and was regarded by Eugenius IV as the essence of the Sacrament. There is no such reference in the earlier ordinals. Neither the custom nor any close historic association with the actual incidents of the Lord's Supper find a place in the more ancient forms of commission that have come down to us. Even the words "Whosoever sins ye remit they are remitted unto them" are a late insertion. So that the absence of any such link is as powerful an argument against Pope Leo XIII as the removal of the later forms is against those who cling to the idea of a sacrificing priesthood.

Wherever we look, we look in vain for a justification of the notion that mortal men can offer Christ our Lord in sacrifice.

HOLY ORDERS.

Elsewhere in this issue we have a valuable paper on the nature of the Christian Ministry by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond: here we wish to make some observations on the same subject.

First of all, we set aside the general question of the Ministry though we shall be among the first to declare our conviction that there is a necessary ministry within the Church of Christ. We do not agree at all with those professing Christians who cast aside all separate ministry and then replace it by a self-constituted one which frequently degenerates into a clique. The concept of "a shattered church" of which only "dissecta membra" remain is a denial of Providence and of Scriptural order and precedent.

Secondly, we set aside the controversies among Reformed Churches as to what may or may not constitute a genuine official ministry. There is no need here to debate the issue of Episcopacy or Presbytery. We do not for ourselves reject the statement of the Preface to the Church of England Ordinal that "it is evident unto all men diligently reading the Holy Scripture and ancient Authors, that from the Apostles' time there have been these Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church; Bishops, Priests, and Deacons." But we remark upon this, that the ground of the claim is history, not Revelation; that the word "Order" is often misunderstood; and that it is well to bear in mind the statement of St. Paul (1 Tim. 3, 13) about the "good degree" or standing of a deacon. The "degree" and the "order" are probably equivalent terms, and "order" does not imply strictly exclusive categories. "Orders" are "within" the Church to which they belong, and exist on behalf of the Church, and are exercised representatively in the name of the Church. They do not have external authority independently of the Church. It is not necessary to assume that the same qualitative difference exists between a bishop and a priest as between a priest and a deacon. It is well-known that St. Jerome held that the bishop and the presbyter (or priest in the right sense) are not sharply distinguished. While his epistles (circa the end of 4th century and beginning of 5th) recognise the threefold ministry as the rule in the Church of his day, they show that Jerome realised clearly the original identity of the two higher orders. For instance in Letter 59 "Let the bishops and presbyters take for their examples the Apostles . . . and as they hold the rank which these once held, let them try to show the same excellence." We read also in Letter 69 "With the ancients these names (bishop and presbyter) were synonymous, one having reference to the office, and the other to the age of the minister." In Letter 146 he accounts for the distinction between the two "when subsequently one presbyter was chosen to preside over the rest, this was done to remedy schism, and to prevent each individual from rending the Church by drawing it to himself." Bishop Lightfoot in his commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians (p. 230) says that Jerome and Augustine agree in this and bear witness to "a substantial identity of order . . . This view in the Western Church carried the sanction of the highest ecclesiastical authorities." The special authority assigned to the bishop was the power of Ordination.

We are aware that other views of this matter exist and have been forcibly argued. Not every student of the Fathers agrees with Bishop Lightfoot or is content to accept Jerome's statements. But it is enough here to say, as we have done, that one should not assume that a very great gulf exists between bishop and presbyter. The right to ordain in and for the Church, administrative authority, and general oversight are the practical tasks of the episcopate and have always been. Further, we need to read the Preface to the English Ordinal with its contemporary situation in mind. For many many centuries there had been not only bishops, priests, and deacons, but sub-deacons, readers, acolytes, exorcists and janitors: all clergymen; all in Holy Orders; and all legally entitled to the advantages of clerical status. The Preface to the English Ordinal quietly but effectively put an end to them all by ignoring them completely. It could not be demonstrated from Holy Scripture and ancient Authors that these other Orders had been in the Church from the Apostles' time: it could be demonstrated from Holy Scripture that the names and offices of bishops, presbyters (elders), and deacons had been in use from the start.

This tacit abandonment of "Minor Orders" was anti-Roman. Rome had said that the three "Major Orders" were "sub-deacon," "deacon," and "priest." There was of course no Scriptural evidence of "sub-deacon." It was an obvious step to rectify the mistaken theory of sub-deacon as a major order by distinguishing the presbyter and bishop from each other, thus restoring the historic three.

We do not argue this as the main point. What is supremely important as Archdeacon Hammond shows, is the significance to be attached to the order of presbyter or priest. Compared with the true meaning of the Church's ministry the controversy over the identity or separateness of bishop and presbyter is a trifle. This is the matter which has been too often lost sight of.

* * *

Is the Christian Ministry a sacrificing priesthood? If it is, we are gravely in error: if it is, the Churches of England, Scotland and Ireland are on the wrong lines, and so are the Lutheran and Presbyterian Churches: if it is, the Reformers were purposely deserting the truth: if it is, what we have regarded as centuries of deepening misconceptions were centuries of light: if it is, the Fathers failed to realise it: if it is, the New Testament writers are wrong, and if they were wrong then the Holy Spirit cannot have inspired them.

Now all this is put in extreme form and may seem exaggerated and perverse. But we can, we think, justify the last of our statements, and if we can, then the rest will fall into line.

* * *

"If the Christian ministry is a sacrificing priesthood then the New Testament is wrong"—that is what we must show. Let us put it simply thus—that the New Testament is our documentary evidence for the Christian faith and practice of the first century of the Christian era. The faith and practice of the first century is what the Apostles of Our Lord did and taught. Their words and the words of their disciples must be faithful presentations of what they handed on as the Gospel. They knew what priests of the sacrificing kind were, for they were Jews or intimates of Jews (cf. St. Luke). They moved also in the Gentile or heathen world and saw the priesthood of the heathen; their altars and their sacrifices. They knew the word for a Jewish or Gentile priest (cf. Acts 14, 13), and they most carefully abstained from using the word associated with the ministry of sacrifice when they referred to the Christian Ministry—"Hiereus" may be used of the Levitical priesthood, but it is never used of the Christian. The Christian Ministry may be called variously as stewards, ambassadors, apostles, elders, bishops, deacons, angels, prophets, pastors, etc., but never "Hiereus." Our Lord Jesus Christ is "our Great High Priest" ("archiereus"), so designated in the Epistle to the Hebrews, because He offered the supreme and perfect sacrifice complete and never to be repeated: perfect, and so incapable of being re-enacted.

A glance at a concordance to the Greek Text of the New Testament will verify this. Only in the Epistle to the Hebrews can we find the word priest in the sense which relates to sacrifice, and there it refers to the exclusive priesthood of Our Lord. Apart from that the priestly status of the whole Christian body is emphasised (cf. Rev. 1. 6). Its function is to offer "spiritual sacrifices," that is, the service of ourselves, to God.

The Christian Ministry is not a sacrificing priesthood—there was never any reason why it should be, and conclusive reasons why it should not be—the study of the New Testament will show that. As for the Apostles being "priests of the New Law" by Christ's appointment, let it be noted that this is not a Scriptural phrase, and that the Gospel is not "a New Law."

* * *

But what is "a sacrificing priesthood"? The Council of Trent declared that Our Lord left to His spouse the Church "a visible sacrifice, such as the nature of man requires whereby that bloody sacrifice once to be accomplished on the Cross might be represented, and the memory thereof remain unto the end of the world." If "represented" and "remembered" were kept to, we might be content. But the Council went on to claim that Our Lord instituted "the New Passover (to wit) Himself to be immolated, under visible signs, by the Church through (the Ministry of) priests." Further, "in this divine sacrifice which is celebrated in the Mass that same Christ is contained and immolated in an unbloody manner, who once offered Himself in a bloody manner in the altar of the Cross. This sacrifice [i.e. the Mass] is truly propitiatory. The victim is one and the same, the same now offering by the ministry of priests, who then offered Himself on the Cross."

All this is closely associated with the ceremonies of ordination to the Roman Catholic priesthood—for in that Service the Bishop gives to each candidate for the priesthood a paten, and a chalice, saying to each "Receive thou power to offer sacrifice to God and to celebrate Masses both for the living and for the dead."

* * *

There we have the idea of a sacrificing priesthood. We cannot harmonise it with the teaching and observances we read of in the New Testament or in the age of Fathers. No Church which reformed itself in the sixteenth century reproduced or continued Rome's form and matter of the ordination of priests. Neither the Church of England nor any other Church had the intention of perpetuating the erroneous idea of priesthood which had grown up in the Middle Ages, especially in connection with the doctrines of transubstantiation and sacrifice. They perpetuated the proper, not the mistaken, theory of ministry. The continuity of the ministry which the English Ordinal speaks of, and proposed to secure is not a continuity of Mediaeval misconceptions but a continuity of New Testament ministry as exemplified in the ancient authors.

We set this out because recently two books by Roman Catholic divines have been published which treat of the Orders of the Church of England—"Anglican Orders and Defect of Intention" by F. Clark, S.J., and "Anglican Orders" by A. A. Stephenson, S.J. These books continue the old controversy which was marked, towards the end of the nineteenth century, by a Papal condemnation of Church of England Orders (Leo XIII) "Apostolicae Curae." The Pope, after investigations, declared that Anglican Orders were invalid. We believe we have shown above that, on Rome's teaching about the priesthood and Sacrifice of the Mass, and by Rome's definition of priesthood, Leo XIII was correct. Anglican Orders are undoubtedly invalid in the Roman context.

The Anglican presbyter is not empowered to offer sacrifice to God in the Mass, and by means of it. Why not? Because such power does not exist anywhere; neither does the right to give it exist. The true doctrine of the Christian Ministry and priesthood (or presbyterhood) is expressed in the Anglican Ordinal. The true presbyter is ordained as "the Minister of the Word and Sacraments," not as the one who is to offer Christ repeatedly albeit in an unbloody manner.

The authors referred to lean heavily on the "intention" of those who administer orders and consecration of bishops from the time of Archbishop Parker of Canterbury. Fr. Clark says the form of ordaining was by a changed ritual "whose significance was to exclude the notion of conferring the (R) Catholic sacrificial priesthood." Fr. Stephenson holds that Anglican bishops ordain by using an Ordinal which does not convey sufficiently the meaning of what is given in the bestowal of Roman Catholic Orders. It excludes from its significance what is essential to the priesthood [of Rome], and therefore to the supreme priesthood of a bishop, its sacrificial nature. This we gather from a long and thorough review in "The Tablet" the London Roman Catholic weekly of 25th August. We agree with this criticism of the Anglican Ordinal, while maintaining that it, not the Pontifical of Rome, signifies the true character of the Christian Ministry and conveys it to the persons ordained. The Rev. K. N. Ross has an excellent reply in "The Church Times" of 31st August. He says "members of the Church of England should cease trying to convince Roman Catholics of the validity of their Orders."

Lately we wrote on "Intention." A reference to that article will show how difficult it is to reach any conclusion as to Intention. We noted then that "interior intention" might alter an entire situation; and that intention to do what the Church does can only be assumed, not proved. "Intention" may be the subject of all sorts of conjectures, but it can take no cognisance of the Holy Spirit though the call and sealing of the Holy Spirit must be the true conveyance of the grace of the ministry. Only the subsequent ministry can demonstrate the reality, and it is in that spirit and with that intention that the Church of England and other reformed churches confer Ordination.

To be "a faithful Dispenser of the Word of God and of His holy Sacraments" (Anglican Ordinal) is surely the highest service we can aspire to. It is no whit less important, by any objective standard, to give the ordinand the Bible than to give him a paten and chalice. But from the Roman Catholic theological standpoint the vital thing is "the sacrifice." Protestants do not reject "the sacrifice" but proclaim that it was offered fully, perfectly, sufficiently, uniquely, finally, on Calvary.

The reformed doctrine of the ministry (presbyterhood, priesthood) is sufficient for every purpose and accomplishment God had in view for it. It is ancient, Catholic and Scriptural—what more can be required?

PROTESTANTS IN SPAIN

A THICKET OF RESTRICTIONS

Sunny Spain, the land of cheap holidays and hospitable people, is less kind to some of its inhabitants than it is to visitors. An account of its Protestant communities may therefore be of value. Last December the little magazine "Diez Minutos" estimated the number of Protestants as 20,000, but the "Evangelical Christians," as many of them prefer to be called, believe the total to be greater; I have a list of some 270 groups scattered over the whole peninsula and islands. Most of them have a chapel—it may be a converted upper room in a private house, a specially constructed building in the Nonconformist tradition, or a large room in a modern block of flats. In a city chapel which I visited the average congregation varies from 150 to 300 on Sundays, and there are many week-night activities. In another place I attended a service in an upper room; the congregation of about 40 warmly appreciated the efforts of the keen young pastor, and the communion service which followed was most impressive. Many of the worshippers had come to the Protestants through dissatisfaction with the Roman Church.

The Spanish Constitution allows for complete liberty of worship but not of propaganda, and Article 6 of "El Fuero de los Españoles" (Rights and Privileges of the Spaniards) says: "Nobody shall be molested on account of his religious beliefs or in the private exercise of his worship." Official practice suggests that the most important word there is "private," for no notice is allowed outside the chapel and no Sunday school is permitted; one prosperous congregation announces a "Children's Service" instead. The prohibition of propaganda cuts right across the house-to-house methods of Jehovah's Witnesses, but the courageous members of the four groups known to me continue. In a recent radio programme, "Answers to Correspondents," a priest advised one inquirer: "The next time someone calls to speak to you about the Bible, invite him in, give him a cup of coffee, and call the police!"

Civil Weddings

The disadvantages imposed on non-Roman Catholics are great. For instance, a civil wedding is permitted only for those who can prove they are not Roman Catholics, and this is far from easy in a country where babies are baptised almost automatically by the priest. A Protestant couple went to the local justice to arrange for their civil wedding, only to be told that as they had been baptised into the Church they remained its members always! With a worthy determination they proceeded by visits, letters, petitions, to try to prove officially what had been de facto all their lives. Their persistence was rewarded after much lost time, by a letter from the Minister of the Interior to the justice saying in effect, "These people are not Roman Catholics so you must marry them." But when some months later another couple from the same church asked for a civil wedding the same justice refused, as his father confessor had forbidden him to do it again! Some couples have been obliged to abandon their wedding because they could not go through the Roman Catholic ceremony with a clear conscience. It is easy to see that this leads to much hypocrisy, for those who are not firmly based in their convictions are tempted to accept an outward form which means nothing to them.

For baptism or christening, parents of a baby born at home can make their own plans; but the conditions are very different in a maternity hospital. All the officials are necessarily Roman Catholic and they include a priest whose duty it is to baptise all babies as soon as possible after birth. One mother of whom I heard went through great anguish to prevent her baby from being baptised by the priest. The medical superintendent in that case, although himself a Roman Catholic, was an understanding man, and in view of a promise sent by the pastor did stop the priest from acting.

All schools must display a crucifix, a picture or image of the Virgin of the Immaculate Conception, and a picture of Franco. But Protestant schools and chapels are liable to be closed without warning. During my stay in Spain several were in fact so closed, the official explanation being in most cases that religious propaganda was being carried on. A training college for pastors, which had been working for years in Madrid, was closed summarily, though a similar one in Barcelona was allowed to continue its work.

University teaching labours under the oppressive burden of the Index Expurgatorius, students being thereby barred from reading many works really essential for their studies, such as non-Roman Catholic philosophers, works on evolution, and many purely literary works. This was one of the causes of the recent "riots" among students; it was a cause also of the resignation of the Rector of Madrid University, who, although himself Roman Catholic, asserted that university teaching could not be carried on under such conditions. His resignation was refused in February, but in March he was replaced by a reliable Phalangist.

Church Publications

No church magazine is permitted, although one group did publish its own for a considerable time before it was finally and officially forbidden. Most churches have an adequate supply of bibles and hymn-books, but renewal is extremely difficult; experience has shown that large consignments of religious books are unlikely to reach the addressee, and on April 24 Reuter reported from Madrid that the Spanish Government had confiscated 35,149 bibles and other Protestant publications from the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Then there is military service. The young man called up at the age of 18 has to fill in a form on which is printed "Religión, Católica Apostólica Romana." It takes real courage to cross this out and write "Protestante." A conscript who was subjected to severe pressure to make him accept the form without alteration remained firm in his refusal. When in the Army he was ordered to parade for mass he again protested but was compelled to fall in; during the service he could not conscientiously do all the others did and was subsequently court-martialled for a military offence. There is no provision in the Spanish law for exemption on conscientious grounds from compulsory military service, but one man who refused to carry out the obligation received a surprisingly light sentence of imprisonment. Another conscientious objector was sent to a mental hospital for "observation" and after thirteen months was discharged with "paranoia" entered on his identity card; this has not prevented him from obtaining work, but it does exempt him from military obligations. A reliable informant told me that the position may well change within the next few years since numbers of young men now approaching military age are determined to refuse on conscientious grounds to do military service.

This is not the place to comment on political aspects of life in Spain, nor on the other reasons for the student "riots," nor on the recent strikes; but my personal contact with Roman Catholics and Protestants, manual workers and professional workers, revealed dissatisfaction with the present regime varying from uneasiness to direct opposition. Before it is too late, and before Spanish membership of the North Atlantic Treaty is considered, can anything be done to ease the burdens laid on so many earnest souls in Spain?

COMMENT I.

"The community were entertaining the late Fr. Vassall-Phillips, C.S.S.R. In the course of conversation he said 'I do wish these Anglicans would stop calling us Roman Catholics.'

"Then Fr. Vincent pointed his finger at the Redemptorist, 'My dear Father,' he said 'the official title for the one holy church of Christ is Sancta, Catholica, Apostolica, Romana Ecclesia.'

"'But,' said Fr. Vassall-Phillips, 'when Protestants call us Roman Catholics they mean to insinuate that we are only the Roman branch of the Catholic Church.'

"'But by now Fr. Vincent was in full cry, whilst the rest of us supported Fr. Vassall-Phillips. The hound was being hunted by the foxes. We attacked Fr. Vincent from every quarter. Learned fathers quoted, those less learned applauded. Fr. Vassall-Phillips who had inadvertently started the whole business sat bewildered. Then finally Fr. Vincent cornered but still fighting, jumped up from his chair, 'you are all wrong,' he said 'I refuse to argue any further.'"

(From "Father Vincent McNabb, O.P." by Ferdinand Valentine, O.P.)

We transcribe this from the recent book which describes the work of a Dominican who evidently made a great impression on his co-religionists. Vincent McNabb was an Ulster Roman Catholic, so it is interesting to note his insistence on his Church's correct title being "Roman Catholic." Fr. McNabb was a Portaferry man, and evidently had no patience with those who protested against their Church being called Roman. We feel sure he would have made short work of Hilaire Belloc who used to say that "Roman Catholic" was a phrase "invented by Elizabethan Lawyers."

COMMENT II.

Elsewhere we have an account of court proceedings in Eire to which two of the so-called

"Jehovah's Witnesses" were parties. We have no sympathy with the "Witnesses" as such. We believe them to be inveterate traducers of the Evangelical Christian Churches as well as opponents of the Roman Catholic Church. We have read many of their books, and know that they distort the Scriptures and propose for our acceptance doctrines which pervert the truth of the Gospel. They are not alone in this.

We want to express our strong disapproval of the annoyance they received at Clonlara. We disapprove of that as much as we disapprove of them. If they broke the law the Civic Guards are always available and proper enquiries could be made and proceedings taken. But there is no evidence that they broke the law. They peddled their books and message like other rural salesmen. If people don't want their wares they are quite able to say so. If they don't wish to listen they can tell them to go. There is no occasion for gathering a crowd of men under clerical guidance to interfere with them. The constitutional right to freedom of thought and free expression of opinion must be safeguarded.

We express our warm appreciation of the attitude of the Dublin Evening Mail which has for the past month published letters on this matter. The correspondence shows marked diversity from the most reasonable criticism to the most ludicrous irrelevancy, and from the sober defence of intellectual freedom to the wildest bigotry.

A Presbyterian minister in Dublin wrote to ask if it was wrong for the "Witnesses" to go to Roman Catholic houses, was it not wrong also for the members of "the Legion of Mary" to visit Protestant homes. We ourselves have been told by members of the Legion that they are to visit everybody in the district assigned to them. This enquiry produced a letter or two criticising the minister, and one of them claimed to be written by a former Presbyterian who was now a Roman Catholic. It appears that those letters were investigated and shown to be dubious indeed: names and addresses could not be verified. Such are the tactics of controversialists.

It is well to ventilate the whole matter in the press, for if mob action is ignored or concealed its victims may not always be "Jehovah's Witnesses." Bona fide Bible Colporteurs and Orthodox Evangelists may be attacked.

It will be noted that the anti-Trinitarian errors of the "Witnesses" were brought before the court. Of course the doctrines of these men ought not to be cited as justifying illegalities. There is no statute law against Unitarian opinion: only the force of Truth can fitly be applied to correct error. So we say that the proper course to take with the Witnesses is to decline to listen to them if you cannot enlighten them as to the pathetic and foolish theories they have been persuaded to accept from American propagandists.

"Jehovah's Witnesses" (alias Russellism, Millennial Dawnism, Watchtower Society etc.), "Seventh Day Adventism," "Christian Science," "Four Square Gospelism," "Theosophy," "Christadelphianism," "Mormonism," and many other religious vagaries and errors have had their origin or inspiration in America. There has not been much stability of religious thought in the foaming, fermenting spiritual adolescence of U.S.A.

PASSING EVENTS—cont'd. from p. 110

Was Catholic

He said that he was a Catholic once, and he was now three years a Jehovah's Witness.

Mr. Houlihan—I cannot but feel sorry for you, and I will not cross-examine you.

Bond—I feel honoured, sir, and I feel grieved that we were ever attacked by these people—an attack that was unwarranted.

Elizabeth O'Donoghue said that she lived at the Angler's Rest, and on that evening she heard shouting outside, and saw men approaching and later take books and a bag from Mr. Miller and his friend. The crowd were shouting.

Margaret O'Donoghue, sister of Elizabeth O'Donoghue, said that she was in the premises the evening the two men called, and Mr. Miller asked whether there was a telephone in there. She replied that there was none.

While the men were in the shop she saw a crowd approach and later they circled round both men. One man in the crowd said: "Do not say 'my dear fellow' to the priest; address him in the proper manner."

Priest's Admissions

Sergeant P. Lewis said that, accompanied by Superintendent Lavin, he went to the house of Father Ryan that evening and asked him about the incident. He admitted being present with his parishioners at the Angler's Rest and warning the two men to go from the parish.

He told them that they could not continue to sell this literature of theirs and that they could not be allowed to distribute it. The previous year, he said, Jehovah's Witnesses were told to leave the parish and he told his parishioners from the church altar that whenever they came around again to let him know.

On this occasion, when he got the message that members of this society were in the parish, he collected a group of men, and went after them. They caught up with them at the Angler's Rest, and warned them to leave. He took some of their books and bags, and kept them. Some of the men burned the literature.

Sergeant Lewis said: "The parish priest told me that he asked the men involved not to deny the charges when questioned by the guards."

That completed the case for the prosecution.

Blasphemy

Mr. Houlihan said that, so far as his clients were concerned, they submitted their rights to the Court.

"It is the law of this land that blasphemy is a crime punishable by statute. It is the law of the land that it is punishable under common law by indictment. It was made so constitutionally in this country, freely and by the will of the people under the patronage, acknowledgment and authority of and specially designated under Almighty God and the Blessed Trinity," he said.

"We had an unusual and an unholy and an unprecedented witness in the witness-box, who sees nothing wrong and does not feel in error in telling your worship that Satan himself discovered the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity, and therefore commits blasphemy against God and His Blessed Mother.

Article 44

"From further specific questions it must follow, therefore, that the Constitution of this country has been enacted under the authority of Satan."

Mr. Houlihan quoted Article 44, section 1, sub-section 1 of the Constitution, which he said, stated that public homage was due to Almighty God and that His Name should be revered and respected.

"If the State is obliged to live up to that consideration, it follows that the citizen must do it.

"Likewise this witness is prepared to dishonour the Christian religion, making no distinction between Catholics and non-Catholics."

He said that he had been instructed by Dr. Rodgers, Bishop of Killaloe, his curate and his parishioners, to tell the judge that any penalty he might impose would be gladly undertaken by the defendants.

As he could not maintain public blasphemy, the Attorney-General had not proved his case.

Liberty Relative

District Justice Hurley said that the case should be approached on the broadest basis.

It was the duty of the courts to maintain law impartially and the courts had to be non-sectarian.

It was the courts' duty to maintain the right of the individual and personal liberty. Liberty was a much-abused word. Liberty was relative and no man had absolute liberty. He must consider the rights of others.

"We have," he said, "a fairly average reputation for religious tolerance in this country but is religious tolerance to be extended to accept the gospel which Mr. Miller and his companions were disseminating— It has to be tried on its own particular merits.

"The Irish faith is something that has been tempered by the fires of history. It is a tradition, a legend, a way of life. It has its roots in lovely villages and mountains, in prison cells and on the scaffold, and in sorrowful mothers' hearts.

Charge Proved

Mr. Miller and his companions sought to destroy and challenge that religion. They were guilty of blasphemy in the Catholic understanding of the word.

He would find the charge of assault proved and dismiss it under the Probation of Offenders Act. He would also dismiss the remaining charges.

After further consideration he had come to the conclusion that, in order to ensure against a further repetition of the case, he would bind both Mr. Miller and Mr. Bond to the peace in their own sureties of £100 each and two independent sureties of £100 each, or in default three months' imprisonment.

Mr. G. Goldberg, solicitor, said that he had been asked by Mr. Miller to fix recognisances in the event of an appeal.

"No Standing"

District Justice—Sit down, you have no standing in this court.

Mr. Goldberg—As a solicitor, I respectfully submit that your worship's decision is unprecedented and contrary to the law of this country. I say that without fear of contradiction.

During the afternoon session of the Court, Mr. Goldberg apologised for a remark he had made earlier to the effect that the District Justice was biased. The District Justice then fixed recognisances in the event of an appeal.

Note: A district justice has power under the Commission of the Peace, to bind over any person connected with a case whom he fears might cause a breach of the peace.—"Irish Times," 28/7/56.

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

The Scourge of Communism.

So far back as the year 1896, in Normandy, a French subject who had seen the Franco-Prussian war and the subsequent horrors of the Commune, uttered the following warning to some English visitors:

"There is in preparation a world-conspiracy in which the orgies of 1790 to 1793 will be renewed on a much larger scale, unless mankind awakens in time and resists the evil in its early stages.

"You will hear of assassinations, ascribed to independent fanatics. They will be organized from a common centre. The wars of the future will not be like the battle of Lepanto decided between sunrise and sunset. And, whereas the mediaeval wars did not aim at obliterating the adversary but at making him change his point of view, the wars of the future will leave victor and vanquished alike exhausted and a prey to disruption.

"The wars of religion will not be of creed against creed and church against church, each side crediting the enemy with souls to be saved. The attack ahead will ultimately be upon all supernatural religion. Every attempt will be made to misrepresent the past, and to persuade the masses in every country that kings and priests have been their age-long enemies.

"Then, after they are deprived of their natural leaders and protectors, they will be at the mercy of a ruthless minority whose intention is to enslave the human race and destroy all freedom except the freedom to defy God and degrade man.

"If the sovereigns and rulers of Europe and the East open their eyes to the dangers, they will yet be able to counteract the evils. But if with blind and easy optimism they flatter riding for such a fall as will surpass themselves and each other upon living in an age of superlative progress and unassailable security, they will be all bygone tragedies."

This prophet then described in detail the methods of permeation and plausibility intended. The good were to be caught through their virtues, the vile through their vices, the weak through their cowardice. There was to be no plain contest between warriors such as the wars of France and Marlborough, or sixteenth century England and Spain. It was to be a universally organised conspiracy for the overthrow of Christian civilization, and all other civilization which admitted a divine spark in mortal life.

The scheme was to enthrone a world-republic on the ruins of civilization; and, by abolishing marriage and denying the rights of heredity, the vast masses of mankind were to be the slaves of a ruthless few. Science would be turned to the most destructive uses, and in the name of fraternity such hatreds be awakened as would astonish the remnant of sane mortals.

Let us tabulate the contrast:

Christianity proclaims:

God our Father in Heaven.

Heaven our home.

Life eternal. All true love inextinguishable.

Things seen temporal, things unseen eternal.

Man possessed of a divine spark.

Marriage sacred; the home individual.

Man entitled to chose his work and possess (and hand on) the fruits of his labour.

"Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's."

Communism proclaims:

No God.

No heaven.

No future life.

No such thing as love, only lust.

Everything is illusory that cannot be grasped.

Man a glorified ape.

No marriage. (To abolish marriage was a leading clause in the 1848 Communist manifesto.) Children the property of the State.

No property: not even his house or the clothes on his back. No freedom of choice how to spend his life.

Be entirely enslaved, having nothing to render, and being alleged to possess no soul.

Put thus, would any man or woman outside a lunatic asylum call Communism a "religion" or "ideology"; instead of the most cruel sophistry and scourge ever devised for mankind?—"The Sentinel."

Bishop Vizcarra Again.

Bishop Vizcarra, the head of Catholic Action in Spain continues his agitation against the small Protestant minority in Spain. In fact the spirit of the notorious Inquisition lives on in him, and it is fairly evident that if he could have his complete way there would not be a Protestant left in the whole Peninsula. His latest outburst, in his journal "Ecclesia," is a typical example of how Roman ecclesiastics can play on the ignorance of the Spanish people. The Catholic Church, he says, knows many things not in the New Testament which it learnt orally from the Apostles, including St. James, who, he claims, founded the Church in Spain before a single line of the New Testament was written, while Protestants content themselves with a part of the Bible interpreted in their own way. They reject an important part of the doctrine of Jesus Christ and belittle the truths delivered by Him to the Roman Catholic Church. That, no doubt, fairly accurately represents the beliefs of the Roman Church, but any Roman Catholic leader who stated those opinions as baldly in Britain as Bishop Vizcarra does in Spain, would know that his claims would be instantly challenged. Rome to-day is not anxious for public debate on her claims. In Spain, Colombia, and several other countries, she is in a position to suppress discussion by means of the civil arm. In the free nations she avoids the challenge as far as possible—"The Christian," 27/7/56.

Ex-principal of Baptist College.

Pastor James Willoughby, Mount Merriion Ave., Belfast, whose death took place at his residence recently, was a former principal of the Irish Baptist College, Dublin. He was 87.

A native of Shillelagh, County Wicklow, he was a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, and the Irish Baptist College, and held pastorates in Lower Gardner Street Church, Dublin, from 1900 to 1903, and in Kingstown from 1912 until 1916.

He was a tutor in the Irish Baptist College from 1900 until 1912, and principal from 1912 to 1916.

After a period as pastor at Beccles, England, he was appointed to the Strict Baptist Bible Institute in England in 1923, where he remained until his retirement in 1938.

Pastor Willoughby, who was unmarried, was a brother of the late Pastor C. Willoughby, formerly of Mountpottinger Baptist Church, Belfast.

Dances are causing Discord in Homes—Roman Catholic Protest.

It was not pleasant to come to court as an obstacle to fun, but as parish priest he had his duty to perform, said the Venerable Archdeacon K. O'Kane, P.P. Granard, Co. Longford, at the local court, when he opposed an application by the Granada Ballroom for an extension to their dance licence.

Having heard the evidence, District Justice Keane granted a licence for the same number of dances as permitted last year.

The application was made by Thomas Quinn, a director of the ballroom, who said that last year he was allowed 25 short dances and five until two a.m. This number was insufficient, as he was unable to accommodate a number of sports clubs and other organisations looking for bookings. He was applying for 50 dances this year.

In reply to Mr. A. MacDonald, solicitor, for Archdeacon O'Kane, witness said that he did not think one dance a month sufficient.

Mr. MacDonald—I suggest that the hours from 7 o'clock until 10 are quite enough for any dance?—Mr. Quinn—I never heard of such a thing. I think I should be entitled to the same facilities as dance-hall owners in other parts of the county.

In reply to District Justice Keane, Mr. Quinn said he had not received any complaints about noise. The building was about half-a-mile from town and the nearest house was 150 yards away. It cost a lot of money to build the hall and he was trying to make it pay.

Archdeacon O'Kane, after making the statement quoted at the outset, said that, if dances had to be run, he did not think that they should be run to the spiritual and temporal disadvantage of the people of the area, "or for that matter people recruited from other areas. This hall is in Granard and whenever there is a dance it is blaring out its advertisement to the young people of the town."

"No Ill-Will"

Archdeacon O'Kane continued: "I have no ill-will against anybody, but I consider it my duty to try and prevent abuses. I am not against reasonable amusement for our people, but that amusement must be in moderation. Every day, the Government is appealing, through its Ministers, for more industry, but how can there be more industry in this area if the young people are exhorted and induced to attend dances into the early hours of the morning?"

"I saw a dance advertised for this hall costing seven shillings and that is only part of the expenditure. Take a case where we have

REVIEWS.

"JOHN CALVIN."

By Basil Hall, London, George Philip and Son, 30-32 Fleet Street. Price 1/6.

This publication (39 pages) is issued on behalf of "The Historical Association." Its author is Professor of Ecclesiastical History at the Theological College at Aberystwyth. We consider it a good thing that the Historical Association has published a study of Calvin, as interest in him has usually been confined to religious circles, and text-book accounts of the man have seldom been sympathetic.

Professor Hall (in the preface) tells us that his purpose in writing was to describe Calvin's early humanist training, his theological thought, and his struggles at Geneva to fulfil the ideals he had learned through that training and belief. He does not discuss the political and economic practices supposed to derive from Calvin's teaching, but very literally "makes short work" of Weber's view that Calvin founded modern Capitalism by saying that if this opinion "seeks support from the idea that Calvin regarded the prosperity of believers as proof of their election, then it is ill-founded." He justifies this by quotations from Calvin's Commentaries on Hosea IX. 1. and Zechariah XIII. 9.

We have always regarded it as unhistorical and partisan to assign the chief responsibility for the growth of capitalistic practice to Calvin, as it is well-known that this economic system had developed long before the Reformation. In South Germany and in Italy banking (i.e. money-lending, etc.) was well established. The fruits of sobriety, honesty, and industry which Calvinism rightly fostered increased the wealth of persons and communities. Would such citizens have been better Christians if they were idle, unreliable, and dissipated? The abuses of the capitalistic system, the exploitations of the industrial revolution, and the irresponsibilities of "laissez faire" may be properly condemned, but Calvin had nothing to do with them.

However, Professor Hall is occupied with Calvin's early training and with the effect of his theology; and we can say, with some knowledge of these matters, that within tiny compass he has given us excellent accounts of both. The effect of humanistic and legal studies on the formation of Calvin's thought is clearly shown.

Anyone who is attracted by the teaching of Calvin and convinced of the Scripture character of the reformed theology, will welcome this essay, and will value the candour of its treatment of a great theme. The author has done us the best of all services, for he has given us much to think about. Here is a quotation "Calvin has stated the metaphysical fact of divine causality at the heart of the universe, and then, when pressed to show where lies the origin of evil, he slips over into a psychological explanation: evil is willed by man, for it is his bias, and God is not concerned save to use this evil disposition either to dominate it for His glory or as a means of punishment. Here we have to remember that Calvin began from personal experience." So did St. Paul, so did St. Augustine; so must all serious Christian thought. The problems are not solved, but we know they will be.

Calvin's doctrines of Election, Scripture, and the Church are competently set out and discussed. Behind the theology lay the practical problems of a reformer of (be it remembered) church and state. The city of Geneva was the experimental ground and later the working model. The section which deals with the city under Calvin is as good as anything we have read elsewhere.

We not only commend the author and his essay, but thank him for a really worthwhile publication.

CREMATION.

A timely booklet by James Griffin, a minister of wide experience, who faces a question on which there are widely differing opinions. This booklet surveys the matter both historically and theologically, and presents the case against the practice with balanced reason. "FREEDOM'S FACE—THE VATICAN."

By Adrian Pigott

The author is a retired Naval Officer, and in his wide travels has collected an immense mass of evidence of the interference of Romanism in the political and social life.

The book is a marvel of cheapness, and is published by The Wickliffe Press, at 184 Fleet Street, London, E.C.4. A single copy may be had for 1s. 10d. post free.

METHODIST SACRAMENTAL FELLOWSHIP.

From the start of this movement, the Protestant Truth Society has raised a note of warning and has just published an explanatory brochure claiming that it is neither Protestant nor Evangelical, and a very doubtful Methodist movement. The facts which are stated in a calm and straightforward manner should at any rate be known. A list of the ministers who are members of the Fellowship is printed.

COUNCILS OF THE CHURCH.

Members of the Reformed Churches hold that Holy Scripture is the "Rule of Faith." Its supremacy is affirmed in the usual confessions of faith, and we are conscious of its over-ruling authority. We take pride in the place we assign to the Word of God (if we may thus express it), and enjoy the confidence of having a trustworthy guide.

It is true, unfortunately, that many suppose that the agitation over Biblical criticism in the last hundred years has put an end to the Bible's authority. Yet a better understanding of the history, background, literary development and languages of the Bible (which we have undoubtedly gained) cannot of necessity affect the Bible's authority. There has always been some understanding of these things, no matter what view of authority was held; and revised or better informed opinion should not be thought to weaken the Church's sense of the supreme and decisive worth of what men were purposely inspired by the Holy Spirit to write.

We have always thought it a mistake to try to substitute the Church for the Bible as the decisive authority. Too often men have fallen back on the Church as the seat of religious authority when they felt that the Bible's old position had to be abandoned in the light of modern knowledge (this has been a failing in some Anglican circles). But to do this with any hope of success we need first to define "the Church," and secondly to show that what we have defined as "the Church" does in fact possess the power. The argument of Rome that whatever the Church says or does officially is right cannot be adopted by any reformed church to-day, and, historically, as far as we are aware, no reformed church ever made such a claim. On the contrary, all of them said that the Bible was the seat of authority.

* * *

We are aware that some religious leaders (e.g. George Fox, James Martineau) sought, and claimed to find, the seat of authority within heart and conscience: the doctrine of "the Inner Light" has a fascination for certain souls who are of a refined spiritual quality—but their religious faith and Christian profession could not survive if it were not that they are enabled to bask in the Inner Light just because the Christian faith of their surroundings, outside their own circle, is maintained by the objective authority of God's Word, and the Churches which hold to it.

We, by our dependence on the authority of the Word, enable them to enjoy safely their rarefied and individualistic creed. Without us and our convictions their faith would be evanescent.

* * *

We have said that no reformed church can fall back on the Church historically considered as the source of religious authority. We say this while well aware that the Church was founded before any part of the New Testament was written. We know that probably three centuries passed, during which the Church grew greatly, before it was finally known what was the extent and limit of Christian Holy Scripture. But that was God's way. We cannot say that "the Church wrote the New Testament" for the sacred writers were of course under the direct inspiration of God the Holy Ghost: of them as of Old Testament writers it is true to say "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Peter 1. 21). Inspiration was personal to selected individuals who were undoubted members of the Church.

As to the limits to the sacred writings: it is well-known that there were many very early Christian writings which were held in great honour, and were in certain places thought to be inspired. How did the present selection of early Christian literature come to be settled as the God-inspired New Testament? The Church never in any official sense arbitrated upon the question. The notion that Pope Damasus in the fourth century, assisted by the Biblical scholar and translator, St. Jerome, had to do with deciding the canon of the New Testament is a mistaken one. What happened was that the present New Testament writings and other Christian compositions circulated for generations and the Holy Spirit by a gradual winnowing and eliminating process distinguished the writings He inspired from the others. The writings God wanted us to have established themselves in the Church, and the others gradually sank into comparative oblivion. But at no time did they really influence the Church's doctrines, or even claim for themselves any unique value. What was written by an apostle of the Lord was not likely to be overshadowed by Clement or Hermas.

A glance over the table of contents of M. R. James's "The Apocryphal New Testament" will show how many spurious and pseudo-apostolic writings there were, in addition to the reputable non-canonical writings. They all faded out, and are mere literary curiosities.

* * *

We may be satisfied that the Bible is God's gift to His Church, and the more the Church is guided by Holy Scripture the more clearly it will demonstrate that it is in fact His Church.

But also, it is more than His gift. It is His provision of a treasure-house of Truth; an inexhaustible fountain of the water of Life; a veritable House of Bread for all who need and ask. It is the Court of Appeal as well as the handbook of God's Law.

People may talk about the difficulty of systematising doctrine from the Bible, and may claim that we need an inerrant Church to assist us. We need the Church of God, its communion and testimony. But, as the Church of England and the Church of Ireland Articles say "the Church is a witness and keeper of holy Writ"—it is a guardian which is subordinate to the Word it keeps. Its infallibility is not ensured, and indeed with Holy Scripture as the record of the truths of salvation, and as the genuine Christian "tradition" once for all delivered to the saints (S. Jude), infallibility is not necessary to the Church.

Indeed, it is that part of the Church which is most in error which claims to be infallible. How do we know it is in error? By comparing its teaching with the teaching of the Bible. We have recently had to re-issue the little publication "Look"! It has repeatedly been reprinted, and it sets out what Scripture teaches, and what the Roman Catholic Church now teaches on the major topics of the Christian faith. The comparison justifies our claim that the church which declares its infallibility is the Church which errs.

As to systematising doctrine—we accept the old Catholic creeds: Apostles' and Nicene. Are we to go further and say that we believe old general Councils (which debated dogmas) are always correct? The Creed of Pope Pius IV (Art XI) requires the confession of faith—"I receive and profess all things delivered, defined, and declared by the Sacred Canons and General Councils, and particularly by the Holy Council of Trent; and I condemn, reject and anathematise all things contrary thereto, and all heresies which the Church has condemned, rejected and anathematised."

But it still is a little uncertain how many true "general" councils there have been. Cardinal Bellarmine, we have read, was doubtful about the Council of Pisa which, he said, "seems to be a general council, neither approved nor disapproved." We should say of this Article of the Creed of Pope Pius IV that it is "void for uncertainty" as the lawyers put it. Anyway we agree with the protest of the Church of England against assuming the truth inerrancy and binding power of general Councils—when general Councils are gathered "forasmuch as they be an assembly of men whereof all be not governed with the spirit and word of God, they may err, and some times have erred, even in things pertaining to God" (Art. XXI).

The article concludes "Things ordained by them as necessary to salvation have neither strength nor authority unless it may be declared that they be taken out of holy Scripture." This puts General Councils in their proper place as subject to error and answerable in all their claims to the Bible's control.

* * *

Further, a general consent to the declarations of Councils is meaningless if the person does not know what they said. He might find, if he studied their history and understood what they taught, that he could not concur. Here again acquiescence and unawareness have to take the place of knowledge. On the other hand, a man can study the Bible all his life. He may misconceive some unimportant particulars, but he will not fail to realise the necessity of saving faith, and that saving faith is faith in a Saviour not faith in a system.

Councils of the Church have great theological and historical importance, but they have no qualities and have been given no rights to make them superior as agents of truth to the Word of God.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.

Those churches which follow what is called "The Christian Year" in their observances, i.e., the commemoration annually of the leading events of the foundation of the Christian faith, will soon begin what is known as "the season of Advent". If they make good and proper use of it they will turn their thoughts not only to the first coming of our Lord Jesus Christ as long foretold by the prophets, but also to the second coming as foretold by our Lord Himself and by his Apostles. Of course there is no need to confine the great issues of our faith to prescribed occasions: all the year round we should be thanking God for our salvation by Christ: every day we should be thinking of the Precious Blood, and not only on Good Friday. Every Lord's Day reminds us of His glorious Resurrection: every prayer to Him implies His ascension. When we express our faith in the Holy Spirit we are not restricted to a yearly recollection of the Day of Pentecost: we should constantly be reminding ourselves that:—

"Every virtue we possess,

"And every victory won,

"And every thought of holiness

"Are His alone."

The mystery of the Holy Blessed and Glorious

Trinity is not to be recalled once a year only, but every prayer, all praise, and each thought of God should be of the Tri-une Jehovah.

Yet there is, we believe, real advantage in an orderly remembrance of great spiritual achievements and their significance. This is especially true of "the Coming of Christ," for the faith we have in His first Advent is imperfect if we do not look beyond it to the second Advent. It is imperfect if we do not see that it implies His Return. We do not think a Christian reasonably well acquainted with the New Testament can doubt the truth of this. Our Lord did not start something which is to go on indefinitely and endlessly: His parables alone are enough to convince us that He purposes to come again. His emphasis on readiness, on watching and praying, on keeping steadily to one's duties, shows this sufficiently. His Church has never lost sight of this entirely though individuals may have done so. The Creeds of the Christian Church have always affirmed the orthodox evangelical faith that "He shall come again."

How should we think about Our Lord's Second Advent? Before we answer the question we may satisfy ourselves that "second advent" is a proper phrase to use by noting its scripture precedent in Hebrews 9. 28—"He shall appear the second time without sin unto salvation." We may also add that the English Book of Common Prayer, in the Collect for the Third Sunday in Advent prays that "when He shall come again" we may be found acceptable."

The Second Advent as promised was not fulfilled by the coming of "the other Comforter" i.e., the Holy Spirit Who is the Spirit of Christ, and it was not fulfilled by the words of promise, the last uttered on earth by Our Lord, "Lo, I am with you always" (Matt. 28. 20). Our Lord promised (John 14. 3) "I will come." The Angels promised (Acts 1. 10) "this same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." Knowing well that the abiding Comforter is the Spirit of Christ, and that Christ promised to be with us always, St. Paul (1 Thess. 4. 16) declares that "the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven." If Jesus has already come in some way so as to fulfil His own promises, it is odd that St. John wrote (Rev. 1. 7) "Behold He cometh"; and in Rev. 22. 7, wrote again the message he was given—"I come quickly"; and in Rev. 22. 20, voiced his prayer—"Come, Lord Jesus." The faith of the apostles always was to look for the coming of the Lord, and to be sure that His Coming was to be a decisive, or rather to be the decisive, event in human history.

What we have referred to shows us that His Coming will be personal.

* * *

We know that Our Lord's parables indicate possibilities associated with His Coming. He may delay it: 'He may come unexpectedly: He may come in the second or third Watch: He may come "as a thief in the night."' This last seems to mean "while men sleep," that is, some will have disregarded His warnings to watch and to be ready. We do not find enough to justify us in assuming that Our Lord has already, or will, come secretly. Such assumptions are not in accord with the general teaching of Holy Scripture; and men's assumptions ought not to be pressed upon us as if they were the plain teaching of God's Word.

The Coming of the Lord is future, and it is to be "in like manner" as He went (Acts 1. 10). It will be "in the air" (1 Thess. 4. 17). This means that the Coming will be "through the air." However we may interpret St. Paul here, it is plain that his intention is to declare that there will be a descent upon the earth. This is in harmony with Christ's Own reference "upon the clouds" (Matt. 24. 30), and with the testimony of John "Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him" (Rev. 1: 7).

Also, while we do not speculate as to place or whereabouts of His presence, we are aware that many believe that Acts 1. 12, "Then returned they from the Mount called Olivet" (i.e., after the Ascension) is to be associated with the old Testament prediction of Zechariah (14, 1-4) "on that day (i.e., "the day of the Lord") His feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives."*

However we may differ as to Heaven being "a place," or "spatial," or above us, or "above the bright blue sky," we cannot dismiss the testimony of Scripture as to "an appearing," or "a coming," with its inevitable questions 'whence?' and 'whither?', we may fail to understand aright, and we may expound the passages in too materialistic a manner, but we need to realise that some 'explanations' are 'explaining away' the whole thing. We have, of course, no warrant for that.

* * *

Further the Appearing will impress the three divisions of rational beings differently. The Appearing to the Church will not be the same as the Appearing to the Jew, and neither will be the same as the Appearing to the world.

To the Church—He will appear "without sin unto salvation" because the Church looks for Him (Heb. 9. 28). "When He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is" (1 John 3. 2), because He shall change the body of our humiliation, that it may be fashioned like unto His "glorious body" (1 Thess. 3. 21).

To the Jew—He will appear as a sign of mourning, yet upon them will be "poured out the spirit of grace and supplication, and they shall look upon Me Whom they pierced" (Zechariah 12. 10). See also Rev. 1, 7.

To the World—The Appearing is assured "every eye shall see Him"; and with this result—"all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him" (Rev. 1. 7).

* * *

The Appearing will be unexpected by outsiders and by careless professing Christians, for His coming will be denied cf. 2 Peter, 3, 4. "Where is the promise of His Coming?" The whole subject will be an occasion for derision.

It may happen when many are satisfied and content in a worldly sense—see Matt. 24, 48-51. The parable of the foolish virgins (Matt. 25. 1-13) also indicates another section of people—the improvident (in spiritual things) and the unready. It will be so as to take many unawares (Luke 21. 34). See also Luke 17, 24.

* * *

We are used to the phrase "glorious Appearing," Our Lord Himself said "The Son of Man shall come in the glory of His Father." St. Paul saw also that He would appear in His own glory—for he tells us that Christ will destroy the wicked one "with the brightness of His Coming." (2 Thess. 2. 8).

* * *

The purpose, or better, the immediate occasion of His Coming is Judgment. The Creeds of the Church have rightly emphasised this as the purpose of that Coming as it concerns us first. Judgment is repeatedly declared to be the work our returning Lord will undertake.

There will be judgment against the professing Church—signified by the servants of the Lord who were assertive, aggressive, self-indulgent, and lording it over God's heritage—can we see here in Matthew 24, 48-51, a condemnation of all totalitarian claims of the professing Church, and its abuse of its stewardship? We think so. We think also that the professing Church, the Church of faith perhaps, but no worthwhile works, is condemned in Rev. 3. 14, as the Church of Laodicea. Judgment falls on a faith lightly held, only half-believed, not expected to be taken seriously. If ecclesiastical tyranny, and usurpation of Christ's rights will be judged at His Coming, so undoubtedly will the compromising worldly church which labours over trivialities and side-issues to the neglect of the weightier matters.

There will be judgment of the nations; for God, thank God, is not as obsessed with ecclesiastical arrangements as we are, and can see the people of His creative Work as gathered into nations as well as into churches. The nations have their duties, privileges and responsibilities, and must answer for them. They must answer for the buried talents as well as for the talents put to use. So they are to be judged—"The kings of the earth, and the great men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman and every freeman hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains . . . for the great day of His wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" Rev. 6. 15. (See also Rev. 19. 15).

In Matt. 25. 31, we read Our Lord's pronouncement of judgment on unrepentant nations—"Before Him shall be gathered all nations: and He shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats."

There will be judgment against all the ungodly—"The Lord cometh to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed." Jude 15.

The Advent of Christ has peculiar significance for His elect. In that glorious event they have more than a spectator's interest: they are, in a real sense, part of the cause of the glorious Appearing. Let us not forget the promise of Our Lord to His own "I will come again and receive you unto Myself" John 14. 3. This promise is assumed in St. Paul's familiar words in I Thessalonians, 4—"The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven . . . and the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them . . . to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

St Paul also writes of "the Coming of Our Lord Jesus Christ with all His Saints" (1 Thess. 3. 13), and St. Jude proclaims (as we have noted) "the Lord cometh with ten thousands of His saints" (v. 14).

* * *

It has been noted that our Lord is coming to judgment, and therefore He is coming as Judge. But that is not the entire significance of His return—He is coming also as King. This is adequately established on the basis of 1 Corinthians ch. 15, especially the declaration of verse 24 "Then cometh the end when He (i.e., Our Lord) shall have divided up the Kingdom to God: when He shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet."

But the Coming of Christ as King rests on many other parts of Scripture. It is a plain fact of history that in His earthly life, that is, in His first Advent, He exercised no kingly authority so whatever in Holy Scripture refers to His office as King subsequent to His Ascension must find complete fulfilment in the future, not in the present. Isaiah prophetically declares "Behold, a King shall reign in righteousness," and Jeremiah tells us "The days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth." God's Angel vouched for this promise by his Words to Mary at the Annunciation "Thou shalt bring forth a Son and shalt call His name Jesus. He shall be great and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto Him the Throne of His Father David."

His rule will be over Israel, and over the nations—"He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever," "the Lord shall be King over all the earth: in that day there shall be one Lord, and His name one," Zechariah 14. 9. The whole earth will be subject to Him, for St. John in his vision saw Him, "the Faithful and True," "the Word of God," go out to smite the nations and rule them with a rod of iron, and His name is "King of Kings and Lord of Lords" (Rev. 19. 16.).

* * *

What is to be achieved by this Second Advent? We do not attempt to arrange the events following on Our Lord's Return (or immediately preceding it) into the correct sequence as there is room for more than one view of their order, but we must note that in His Second Advent Our Lord will do what His people (1) have failed to do, and (2), what His people are unable to do.

1. The present world-wide ministry of the Gospel will not convert the world, and it is not the Divine plan that it should win universal success. It is a witness or testimony to mankind—"ye shall be my witnesses unto the uttermost part of the earth" is Christ's command to His Church here and now. The ministry to the heathen is to gather out of them a people for God, (Acts 15. 14). At the end, great numbers will still be in ignorance of, or in rebellion against, God, see Rev. 6. 15-17

* * *

2. This signifies that God is gathering out His Church. He is assembling His people in the midst of a world which will become more evil. Some people talk about "Christian optimism," but it may be truer to speak of "Christian pessimism," for Holy Scripture does not promise that things are bound to grow better:—

"The world is very evil;
"The times are waxing late;
"Be sober and keep vigil,
"The Judge is at the gate."

So Bernard of Cluny thought back in the Middle Ages, and his outlook, however alien to popular thought, is not alien to the Scriptures. It will be the same in the day when the Son of Man will be revealed as it was in the days of Noah and Lot:—carelessness, self-indulgence unawareness, false security, and then flood, fire, and brimstone, or their equivalents—Luke 17, 26. Perilous times are coming, or have begun. What St. Paul foretold of human conditions in the last days seems to be realised:—Read II Timothy 3, 1-6, and even if you say 'People have always been like that,' still you must agree that in the past people were less ready to take pride in their badness, and less disposed to think their evil ways actually commendable.

Read II Timothy 4, 3, and see that a characteristic to be expected has demonstrated itself in our time. St. Paul there speaks of religious thought, and of the impatience with sound doctrine. Are not the false sects of our day, Jehovah's Witnesses, Spiritists, Christian Science, Mormons, Christadelphians, etc., symptomatic of the apostacy referred to? They are not alone, and of course there are older false teachings, reprehensible like them, but our age has produced a remarkable number. Apostacy has many manifestations, some of them venerable enough, but all of them adding to the evidence that our failure to preserve the truth of the Word, and our inability to convince all, must indicate the approaching end of the age.

Evil can only be subdued by Christ's personal coming, and after it his kingdom will be established, and it will inaugurate the millennium.

* * *

Christ's reign will be a time of universal blessedness, a time of union with Him and with one another, and a time of triumph for His Church and for redeemed Israel. Universal peace and justice will be experienced, and the glories of the Messianic reign will be untarnishable.

* * *

We have set out above a selection of Scripture teachings on the Second Advent. Much might be added: perhaps much more ought to be added; but the pattern is plain, and we should all be alerted to the facts, so that the Day may not take us unawares. And also, that we may have faith, patience, serenity, expectancy; and confidence that the seemingly distracted, disordered, and blind occurrences of our day are scattered portions of the plan of the ages now approaching fruition:—

"Then glory yet unheard of
 "Shall shed abroad its ray,
 "Resolving all enigmas,
 "An endless Sabbath-day."

COMMENT I.

National School Teachers

Elsewhere we reprint the protest of the Irish National Teachers' Organisation against what seemed to them a slightly unfair estimate of their function in the national life.

We have no special knowledge of the issue. It seems to us that on the one hand, a man or woman who joins a religious order is not thereby disqualified from the ordinary vocation of teaching: and that, on the other hand, the lay teacher is a far more important factor in the life of the nation. The lay teacher is often married and a parent, and therefore shares the life of the vast majority of citizens in a way no member of an order can do. As a teacher of the young, the layman or woman is not cut off from the hopes and fears, the humble ambitions and responsibilities, the sorrows and joys of domestic life and little homes as the member of a religious community is.

In certain instances the school taught by members of an order may be a little more advanced, for the order may have more teachers available, and hence smaller classes, and may afford opportunity for more specialisation than the lay-school. But the immense contribution to national life made by lay teachers of all denominations ought to be fully recognised.

Lately a big boys' school in the West was transferred to a religious order. We know nothing of local circumstances, but a transfer of a big school means the permanent loss to the lay teachers of a promotion to greater responsibility and influence. That seems to us a discouragement to the lay teacher.

No doubt it would be impossible in practice to apportion the schools under Roman Catholic management in Ireland between lay and clerical or regular teachers. As long as the "managerial" system continues the control of such matters rests with the local clergy or bishop. The managerial system is basic to the present organisation of primary education in this part of the country. It means that the school is usually parochial, and kept up by the parish under the management of the Roman Catholic parish priest, or Protestant clergyman (for the system is strictly denominational in Eire though in Northern Ireland a different system obtains for the majority of non-Roman Catholic schools). The manager appoints the teachers: has an employment agreement with them, and in theory can terminate such agreements. The State pays the teachers' salaries on the manager's requisition, and makes a trifling grant towards heating and cleaning.

Regular outcry against dilapidated buildings, insufficient warmth and cleaning and want of toilet facilities is addressed to the educational authorities (i.e., the State). From this we gather that the responsibility of managers and parishes is rarely understood by the public, and that little is said to enlighten the public through the press.

We are so accustomed to relying on government grants for everything that the spirit of self-help is nearly dead among us. Of course there are new school-buildings all over the country, and the cost of erection is partly met by generous grants of public money and loans. But it should be emphasised more than it is that the local school is primarily a local responsibility, for it is not a State school. The State school system (called in Ireland 'the Model Schools'), excellent though it was, met with clerical disapproval (Protestant as well as R.C.) and existed only in some of the larger towns. It scarcely exists to-day.

Another feature of the Roman Catholic educational system is the inclination in favour of clerical education i.e., education by teaching orders. One cannot say that there is a wish to oust lay-teaching. It would be very unfair to give that impression, but as the teaching orders exist for the purpose of teaching, and that is their vocation, and they have in many cases a long tradition of successful instruction, it is easy to see that in Roman Catholic circles there is much to foster their labours. Nevertheless, we believe the earnest lay-man or woman has a vocation to teach as real and worthwhile as any member of an order, and has as good right to opportunity to exercise it, and to advance according to merit to the highest positions.

Secondary education concerns a steadily growing number of people to-day. More than ever, parents want further education for their families. Roman Catholic secondary education is almost exclusively in the hands of religious orders. The lay secondary teacher has no headmastership or headmistress-ship to look forward to. He or she must always be content to hold a subordinate place (the exceptions are so very few as to be negligible). Roman Catholics may say that it is no harm to have to be content with subordinate tasks—maybe they are right; and we have no reason to suppose that the lay teacher in a secondary school does not enjoy satisfactory conditions, but, again from our point of view, it is strange to withhold from the layman the normal reward of efficiency in his profession.

* * *

The Roman Catholic lay teacher at present has the field of vocational and technical education to himself. In the vocational school or the technical school the layman and woman may hold chief office, for these systems are not under clerical management. So also in the Universities. Of the eight Colleges of University status, six have lay heads (Maynooth naturally has a clerical President, and Galway's president happens to be a priest). It is unlikely that the College of Surgeons would have a president in clerical orders, so the field is open to lay talent in seven out of the eight.

Thinking over these matters we recall the fact that anti-clericalism in France made the State schools of all grades lay institutions; and exclusively lay education in turn encouraged anti-clericalism, socialism, and free-thought. This movement in France was contemporaneous with the rise and progress of secondary or intermediate education in Ireland, and with the growth of Roman Catholic secondary schools for boys and girls. We do not wonder then at the course which secondary education followed here. Clerical or regular teachers received almost a monopoly of the higher education of their co-religionists. Their teaching and examination results have kept a steady high level, but the greater objective has been attained. The Irish laity have been submissive, receptive, and unenquiring in the main. One gets along best by conforming, and doing what everybody else does. To digress or to deviate is to risk the label 'communist', and that label in Ireland to-day spells 'ruin.'

I.N.T.O. CRITICISES R.C. BISHOP'S COMMENT.

Case for Lay Teachers.

The Irish National Teachers' Organisation has criticised the Bishop of Ossory, the Most Rev. Dr. Collier, for statements made by him when he opened a new school in Kilkenny on September 25th. In a statement made yesterday, the Central Executive Committee of the I.N.T.O. says: "When the Central Executive Committee of the Irish National Teachers' Organisation realised that no solution was to be found in this country to the problem created by the transference of Ballina boys' school to the control of the Marist Order, the committee decided to refer the matter to the Holy See. The members of the committee, in coming to this decision, were inspired by two motives. They wished, in the first instance, to dispel any doubts as to the loyalty of the Catholic members of their organisation to the Holy See, or their unqualified acceptance of the position of the Church in the field of education. In addition, they desired to prevent any scandal which might arise from a public controversy on the issues involved. Since the decision to appeal to Rome was come to, no spokesman of the I.N.T.O. has made any public reference to the Ballina dispute."

The statement continues: "It is unfortunate that their reticence was not copied by His Lordship the Bishop of Ossory, when at the recent opening of the new national school attached to the Presentation Convent, Kilkenny, he took occasion to make comparisons between the record of the lay and religious teachers in the service of Catholic education in Ireland. His Lordship was quoted widely, both over the radio and the public press, as saying that our teaching Sisters and Brothers were in the field of education half a century before the National Board of Education was thought of; half a century before there was any organised teaching association. "They were inclined perhaps a bit to secularism and materialism," he is reported further as having said, "and perhaps religious bodies were not getting their just and proper share in the work being done so well in this Catholic country."

Implications Alleged

"The implications in these statements are that the schools under the control of the religious teaching orders are not now, and were not in the past, part of the public school system of this country, that they are not national schools, that they receive less financial assistance from the taxation of the citizens than do the schools under lay teachers which are owned by the Catholic diocesan trustees. The facts are, of course, that from the inception of the national system of education in 1831, all primary schools owned by religious orders of women and those owned by religious orders of men, with one exception, have been part and parcel of the national education system. Since 1926, all primary schools under the religious teaching orders have been national schools. The State, from the taxation of the citizens, gives the same grants for the erection and maintenance of the school buildings owned by the religious teaching orders as it does for the schools staffed by lay teachers which are under the control of the bishops and the parochial clergy. The full cost of the remuneration of the teaching staffs, both lay and religious, in all primary schools is borne by the State, and the same rates of remuneration apply equally. The State contributes to the cost of the training of religious teachers as it does to the cost of the lay teachers. But the religious enjoy many privileges in the matter of admission to training, of the professional qualifications required, of the system of supervision, and in the avenues of promotion which are denied to lay teachers. More than 70% of the principalships of the larger schools, and, therefore the more highly remunerated principalships, are enjoyed by religious. How then can His Lordship, the Bishop of Ossory contend that "the religious bodies were not getting their just and proper share"?"

Ballina Post?

"The problem which the Ballina appointment has pin-pointed is not a problem of the national schools versus the convent and monastery schools, as his Lordship seems to suggest, because the convent and monastery schools are also national schools, as has been pointed out. The problem is the recognition of the right, to quote the present Holy Father, of the lay teacher 'to his place in the sun,' and the record of the lay teacher in Catholic education is just as long and as honourable as that of any religious teaching order.

"In the golden days of Irish Culture, lay schools occupied an honourable place in the education system. When religion was outlawed during the penal days, it was lay teachers who kept the knowledge of religion alive. To quote one of the many inquiries made into the state of education by the governmental authorities:—'And it was no extraordinary thing to see a large number of children collected together in what they are pleased to call a school, and not a book used, nor any taught to read. The children were employed in committing to memory portions of the summary of the Christian Doctrine and the Catechism as they were given out by the priest and master, that they might be early versed in all the peculiarities of the Romish faith and worship.'

"Just as to-day the small country schools, staffed by lay teachers, are the most fruitful nurseries of vocations to the religious life, so these illegal lay schools of the penal days served as juniorates for the Irish Catholic seminaries on the Continent. To quote Arthur Young, 'Schools are also common for men. I have seen a dozen great fellows at school, and was told they were educating with the intention of being priests.'

"There were then no religious teaching orders and it was the lay teachers who, to quote His Lordship, 'took up the burdens and the heat of the day.' According to returns prepared by the Catholic clergy, there were in 1824, 403,774 pupils attending 11,823 schools under lay teachers. In 1825, there were 30 convent schools attended by 6,310 pupils. The religious teaching orders of men had 11 schools with about 3,500 pupils. When in 1831, partly as a result of a petition addressed by the Catholic Hierarchy to the British Government, the national system of education came into being, these schools, both lay and religious, came under its aegis."

Improved Conditions

"The Irish National Teachers' Organisation may be only 88 years in existence, but no class of teacher has benefited so much from its activities as have the members of the religious teaching orders, as an examination over the years of the rates of remuneration payable to their schools will show. During the past 50 years, mainly as a result of the agitation carried on by the Organisation; the rates of remuneration and conditions of service of the teaching profession have been very materially increased and improved. During that period, although the child population has fallen by over 12%, the number of schools under the control of the religious teaching orders has increased by 50%. Here one is again tempted to ask who bore the burden and the heat of the day."

Pope's Advice

"Addressing the Italian Teachers' Association in November, 1945, the present Holy Father advised its members to demand their place in the sun and the means to obtain it, and to act unitedly through their association. The Irish National Teachers' Organisation, in following that advice, is not inspired by secularism and materialism. It believes that the long and honourable record of the Irish lay teachers in the field of Catholic education justifies it to quote His Holiness further in defending, upholding and insisting on the rights of its members as Catholic masters, and it is satisfied that if, at any future date, the circumstances of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were repeated it would be the lay teachers who would again man the rearguard of the Catholic army."

three or four young people in a family and they all want seven shillings—or even more—to attend these dances. It is no wonder that nowadays, more than ever before, we have dissension and discord within the family. It is beginning to become a terrible financial burden on families. What has come over our young people at all? There is no ambition, no desire to get on. As far as I can see, dances and jazz bands are the only industries that are prospering out of all this. Why is the Government so alarming in its warning that we are heading straight for a financial crisis?

New Aristocracy

"The whole business is causing a lot of trouble in the homes. At the same time, the dance orchestras are becoming the new aristocracy. They are treated like princes and they are advertised as wonderful. After attending a dance our young people cannot get up the next morning; you will find them in their beds at 11 and 12 o'clock in the day. This is a great social problem; families are being torn apart because of it. Our young people are losing all sense of responsibility—they are becoming teddy boys and teddy girls and rock'n' roll fans. That is what is happening elsewhere in this country. We do not want it to happen here.

"When the people leave dance halls they have no respect for the sick and infirm of the town. Our young people are going stark, raving mad—and it is all because of the dance halls. I don't think that the people of this town should be asked to submit to the carry on of hooligans from God knows where, and that is a feature of each dance. On the night of June 10th the band, their crooners and their sentimental slush were poured out over all the town. It was an utter disgrace and I hope we will be protected from that kind of thing in the future.

"It would not be so bad if we had Irish bands playing Irish music. Surely, we owe something to our national heritage which is being undermined at the present time."

One Dance a Month

Further, Archdeacon O'Kane said that one dance a month was sufficient for local needs. More dances than that was "preposterous." He hoped, and he begged in the interests of the community, that a stop would be put to the number of dances in the hall. The hours of dancing should be restricted between the hours of seven o'clock and ten. He added: "Homes are not homes nowadays—they are just places in which the young people sleep. There was a time when children loved their parents, but not any more, and the dance halls are the cause of it. If I had the last word in the matter I would allow one dance a month, tax free. The second dance I would tax heavily and if they wanted to hold any more that month I would tax them out of existence."

No Complaints

Sergeant B. O'Callaghan, Granard, said that he was responsible for the supervision of the Granada Ballroom. At the dances there the standard of public order left nothing to be desired. He could not remember any occasion when there was any trouble in the dance hall or in the vicinity. He had not received any complaints as regards misconduct in the hall.

Granting the same number of dances as last year, the District Justice said: "Because what Archdeacon O'Kane said might not prove to be popular is no reason why it should be discounted. It requires a great deal of moral courage to say something which is not popular."

At the same court, there was no objection to an application for a renewal of a dance licence for a Muintir na Tire hall at Aughnagarron, about a mile from Granard.

The District Justice granted the application.

The Mass and The Reformation	81

TO OUR READERS.

The Committee again asks for the continued support of all readers. Much can be done by readers to extend the circulation and usefulness of this paper. Financial support is again appealed for, so that opportunities of spreading the knowledge of God's Word in Ireland may not be lost. A great spirit of enquiry exists, and the Committee asks to be enabled to meet it.

Contributions will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, The Connellan Mission, 5a Townsend Street, Dublin, C.5.

PASSING EVENTS.

Fethard-on-Sea.

Fethard-on-Sea is a small village in Co. Wexford, the South Eastern corner of Ireland. The following cuttings from Irish daily papers give some inkling of what is going on there to-day.

Village Boycott Follows Disappearance of Wife.

(From Our Correspondent)

Special prayers for "social and industrial peace" were said in all three churches of the Fethard-on-Sea (Co. Wexford) Church of Ireland Union by Rev. A. C. P. Fisher, rector.

A boycott of Protestant shops and farmers in Fethard-on-Sea which began on May 13 still continues. The local Protestant school which had a Catholic teacher has been closed as a result of the boycott.

The trouble arose over the disappearance of the wife and two children of Mr. Sean Michael Cloney (30), a Catholic, from their home at Dungulph Castle, Saltmills, two miles from Fethard-on-Sea.

Mrs. Sheila Cloney, a Protestant, with her children, Eileen Mary (6) and Mary Frances (3), left home on April 27 last.

The cause of the boycott is the belief that Mrs. Cloney received financial and physical aid from local members of the Church of Ireland to go to Belfast. Local Protestants deny these allegations.

School Locked

The Protestant school, which has 11 pupils, was still locked up to-day. The Catholic school teacher, Miss Anna Walsh, Ramsgrange, did not turn up for duty since May 15.

Two shops in Fethard are owned by Protestants.

Miss Mary Stafford, another Catholic, gave up her work as sexton of the local Protestant church which caters for about 45 members of the Church of Ireland.

Mr. Cloney is an extensive farmer. His wife is daughter of Mr. Thomas Kelly, a widely-known Wexford cattle dealer. The couple were married in the Catholic Church at Hammer-smith, London, on November 26, 1949. The children were baptised in a Catholic church in Co. Wexford.

On May 3, in Belfast High Court, Mr. Justice Sheil granted an application for an order of habeas corpus directed to Mrs. Cloney ordering the children to be brought into Court. It was stated that Mrs. Cloney's legal advisers had not seen her since May 1.

Mrs. Cloney's husband, Sean Cloney, said in an affidavit: "Prior to our marriage we discussed the question of the upbringing and religion of any children of the marriage, and we agreed that any children should be baptised and brought up as Catholics.

"At various times recently my wife had objected to the two children being brought up as Catholics. The eldest, Eileen Mary, should have started school on April 29. We had discussed this matter fully in the past month, but my wife had opposed the child being educated at a Catholic school."

The affidavit stated that on April 27 Mr. Cloney's wife left home with the children while he was out. Later he was informed by the Gardai that she was seen driving his car towards Wexford. The car was found abandoned in a Wexford street.

On April 30, a Belfast barrister arrived by car on his farm and informed him that he had seen and spoken to his wife, who was with the two children in Belfast. The barrister informed Mr. Cloney that he had come on Mrs. Cloney's behalf and with her consent to put what he described as her terms of settlement with him.

Rejected Terms

The affidavit continued: "The terms were (1) That I should sell my property in Co. Wexford; (2) That I should go to Canada or Australia with my wife and children; (3) That I would agree to the children being brought up in the Protestant faith; (4) That I would myself consider changing my own religion.

"He (the barrister) further informed me that my wife would not meet me anywhere unless I agreed to the terms of settlement beforehand, and that the matter was urgent, as she was getting ready to go to a destination which would be unknown to me and which would not be disclosed to me. I did not agree to the terms and he left the farm."

Family Appeals to Wexford Woman.

"Irish Independent" Reporter

Appeals to thirty-years-old Mrs. Sheila Cloney, whose whereabouts are unknown, to return home with her two children, Eileen and Mary, aged six and three, were made by her father and husband, when I interviewed them in Fethard-on-Sea, Co. Wexford, where the boycott by Catholics of two Protestant shops, which started after Mrs. Cloney had vanished with her children on April 27 last, is nearing the end of the third week without any sign of settlement.

The boycott began on Monday, May 13, when local Catholics announced their intention of staying away from these shops.

Allegations Denied

An allegation that Mrs. Cloney left with the connivance of local Protestants was strongly denied by the latter.

The local Protestant school, which has eleven pupils on the roll, remains closed. Its Catholic teacher, Miss Anna Walsh (22), of Arthurs-town, gave up her job because of the boycott.

The sexton of St. Mogue's Protestant Church, Miss Mary Stafford (63), also a Catholic, gave up her post, which she had held for seven years.

Mrs. Sheila Cloney, a Protestant, married Mr. Sean Cloney (30), a Catholic, in London, in 1949. She had been living with her husband, Mr. S. Cloney, in Dungulph Castle, Saltmills, two miles outside Fethard village, up to April 27, when she and her two children disappeared. Some days later Mr. Cloney was granted a writ of habeas corpus in the High Court for the production of the two children, who were said to be held by the mother, whose whereabouts were unknown.

In Dungulph Castle, which was built in 1330, burned by soldiery in 1798, and restored by his father, Michael, in 1917, Mr. Cloney, who farms 116 acres, said that, officially, he had no knowledge of his wife's whereabouts, but that he would like to appeal to her to return home with the children.

At various times recently, he said, she had objected to the two children being brought up as Catholics. She had threatened to go away to "think things over."

"I told her father this some eight days before she left, and I believe I was the first to make him and her family aware of her intentions. I understand, and believe, that her father and family did their best to stop her from leaving," he said.

Mr. Cloney said he did not believe the Protestant traders had connived in any way in his wife's disappearance.

Wexford Boycott to go on until Children are Back.

The boycott of Protestant shops, farmers, and the Protestant school in Fethard-on-Sea, Co. Wexford, which is now in its 18th day "will continue unabated" until the two Cloney children are returned to their father.

This was stated in the town yesterday by a spokesman of the Catholic community.

Little business was transacted yesterday in the Protestant shops in Fethard and the Church of Ireland school, which has eleven pupils on the roll, was again locked.

Teacher sought

Meanwhile, the Church of Ireland Training College, Kildare St., Dublin, has advertised for a national school teacher for the town of Fethard-on-Sea.

The Catholic teacher in the school has not turned up for duty since May 15. Allegations that the teacher, Miss Anna Walsh, of Arthurs-town, has been intimidated by Catholics have been strongly denied.

The boycott arose out of the departure to Belfast of Mrs. Sheila Cloney, of Dungulph Castle, Saltmills, on April 27, taking with her, her two children, Eileen (6), and Mary (3) Mrs. Cloney is a Protestant and Mr. Sean Cloney, her husband, a Catholic.

It is alleged locally that Mrs. Cloney received financial aid when she left home, from some members of the Church of Ireland. This is denied by local Protestants.

Innocent People are being Victimised— Rector's Statement on Boycott.

Representations may be made to the Taoiseach and the Papal Nuncio with a view to having the three weeks' old boycott of Protestant shops, farmers and the Protestant school in Fethard-on-Sea, Co. Wexford, ended, Rev. A. C. P. Fisher, Rector of the Fethard Union of the Church of Ireland, told me last night.

The boycott was started in a protest against the disappearance, on April 27, of Mrs. Sheila Cloney (30), a Protestant, and her two children, Eileen (6), and Mary (3), from their 600-year-old mansion, Dungulph Castle, two miles from Fethard.

The missing woman's husband, Sean Michael Cloney (30), a Catholic, said yesterday that he had no information of the whereabouts of his wife and children, but believes they are being held either in Belfast or England.

The dispute arose when his wife, he said, objected to him sending Eileen to a Catholic school.

Barrister's call

Three days after her disappearance, a barrister from Belfast, he said, called to him in Fethard-on-Sea, saying he had seen his wife and the children in Belfast, and that she asked him on her behalf, to offer terms of settlement.

The terms offered, he said, were that he should sell his farm and emigrate to Canada or Australia, that the children should be brought up Protestants, and that he himself would consider changing his own religion.

Mr. Cloney refused the terms and on May 3, in Belfast High Court, he was granted a writ of habeas corpus directing his wife to produce the children in court. It was stated in court on May 7 that the writ could not be served on Mrs. Cloney. Her legal adviser said in an affidavit that he had not seen her since May 1.

Mr. Cloney's application is down for mention in the Belfast High Court, probably this week-end.

'Victimised'

Catholics in Fethard-on-Sea began the boycott in the belief that local Protestants financially assisted Mrs. Cloney to go away. Protestants emphatically deny this allegation.

Last night Rev. Mr. Fisher, who was instituted Rector of the Fethard Union on May 9—four days before the boycott started—said; "The Church of Ireland people, innocent citizens of the Republic, are being victimised.

"It is my belief that the boycott, or as some people are now calling it, parish co-operation against the Protestants with a view to the immediate return of the children, was not a spontaneous act on the part of the people themselves.

"I am truly amazed and aggrieved to witness that innocent Irish citizens have become victims of this boycott.

"Mrs. Cloney left her husband with her two children. It was a domestic affair, I do not know why she left and I'm sorry to see a home broken up.

"I appeal for freedom and justice as guaranteed every citizen of our Republic.

'Lost 12 pupils'

"As parish priest for the Church of Ireland's community and rector of Fethard Union, I protest most strongly at the injustice of this boycott and I demand the immediate end of this victimisation of innocent people," said Rev. Mr. Fisher.

"I would like to call upon his Lordship; the Catholic Bishop of Ferns, to use his influence to stop this boycott at once.

"I ask one other thing, and that is simply this, that with regard to Mrs. Cloney and the children, let the law take its course. Let us all pray that unity will be restored once more in the Fethard area."

Rev. Mr. Fisher disclosed that Miss Lucy Knipe, of Fethard-on-Sea, a member of the Church of Ireland and a music teacher, had lost her 12 pupils who used to go to her two or three times a week for music lessons until the start of the boycott.

'Hands tied'

Asked if Protestants in Fethard-on-Sea could organise and appeal for the return of the children to Mr. Cloney, Rev. Mr. Fisher said that his hands were tied "with five parishes."

He could not organise anything apart from parochial affairs. He thought that it was a matter for "the authorities and the courts to get these people back."

[The people victimised in Fethard are not the Protestants, but the decent Roman Catholic men and women who are persuaded that it is right to boycott their handful of neighbours.]

Resounding No to Query on Religious Persecution.

Belfast, Tuesday — Presbyterians live in "friendly enough relationships" with their Catholic countrymen in the Twenty-Six Counties, states the annual report of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which is meeting in Belfast this week.

The report goes on: "to the question 'have any of your members suffered persecution in any way on account of their religious beliefs and practices,' the answer is a resounding 'no' in the big majority of congregations.

"But there are reports of sporadic incidents of social and religious intolerance. There are 'minor irritations' and 'pressure' exerted on the Protestant partner of a mixed marriage.

On the whole, however, Presbyterian people live in friendly enough relationships with their Catholic fellow-countrymen and were at one in condemning the 'senseless activities' of recent months.

Dealing with emigration, the report states that there are very few congregations from which members have not gone to the British Commonwealth. From the Twenty-Six Counties many have gone to England, while within the country, movement has been towards the industrial centres.

Economic reasons

The report adds: that many more would go to the Six Cos. if it were not for the difficulty in getting residence permits.

Most reports gave the impression that those moving were doing so for economic reasons. "In no case is there a religious reason suggested for the exodus though there is 'a sense of not being wanted' in the hearts of some moving out of the Twenty Six Cos."—I.N.A.

The Tolerance of Irish Nationalism.

Ireland had much to contribute to the world because of its completely tolerant sense of nationalism, said Mr. Vincent O'Donovan, barrister-at-law, when he addressed a meeting of the Catholic Association for International Relations in Dublin yesterday.

Our nationalism, he said, was deep enough and our democracy sound enough to ensure for every individual fair and generous treatment. Minorities were welcomed, on the test of merit and fair play, to the highest positions in the State. What more striking proof was needed that all citizens were cherished equally, and of the security that awaited all in a united Ireland, he asked.

Mr. O'Donovan said that Ireland should join the Free Trade Area. The Government should establish an economic commission to examine the possibility of a Customs union between Northern Ireland and the Republic and Great Britain. It could take the form of an all-Ireland convention, on a non-party basis.

—"Irish Times," 31/5/'57.

[Lest this should seem to be in contrast with what goes on in Fethard-on-Sea, it may be well to say that the above no doubt refers to the policy and attitude of the State, against which no suggestion of partiality can be made.]

THE VIRGIN MARY.

"Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: Blessed art thou among women."—Luke 1: 28.

Have Protestant Christians given Mary, the mother of our Lord, the place in their thought and their heart to which she is so eminently entitled? Beyond question the Protestant attitude has been influenced by a strong reaction against the errors manifest in the Roman Catholic veneration of the Virgin Mother. The Scriptures give no assent to the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, which claims that Mary was born sinless; nor to that of the Assumption, which affirms that she did not die but was taken up into heaven, and there exalted above all created intelligences, whether human or angelic. Neither does the Word of God lend any support to the belief of Mary's intercession with her Glorified Son on behalf of sinners. In Protestant conviction the penitent sinner needs no mediator between himself and his Saviour.

I

Nevertheless, the mother of our Lord remains a most gracious and instructive figure. Why was Mary chosen of God from among all the maidens of Israel? Why to her the high and unique honour of such motherhood? "Hail," said the angel Gabriel, "thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: Blessed art thou among women." We cannot suppose that she would have been endowed with such signal favour were she not peculiarly qualified to be the mother of the world's Saviour. In her the "gracious dignity of motherhood" was to be exemplified—its privileges and its responsibilities, its exquisite joys, yea, and its most poignant sorrows; and we must assume that she was spiritually qualified for her onerous destiny.

Mary suffered in a superlative degree the trials that befall mothers. From the moment of the Annunciation the sword pierced her soul; for that original trial was so entirely singular, being such as could be experienced by no other mother of men. She was meekly submissive when Gabriel told her his tidings, that she, while yet a virgin, was destined to give birth to the Son of the Highest. "Behold," said she, "the handmaiden of the Lord. Be it unto me according to thy word." Even so, for so pure and high-souled a maiden such calm submission to the divine will involved acute suffering. Until God enlightened him in a dream, Mary had to face a delicate and embarrassing situation with Joseph. Besides, she accepted the risk of her virtue being compromised in the eyes of ignorant scandal-mongers. Truly sacrificial and nobly selfless was Mary's submission to the will of God.

II

We are indeed amazed at the sheer moral courage manifested by Mary in both the assuming and the discharging of the responsibilities of a motherhood so unique. Readers will have noted those intimate touches in the Nativity records which reveal Mary to have been so motherly a mother, and withal so burdened with a sense of her solemn obligations. She heard the adoring shepherds tell their marvellous news of the angel's tidings of the birth of a Saviour, Christ the Lord, and of the Gloria in Excelsis sung by the heavenly choir, and, as a fond and proud mother, "kept all those sayings and pondered them in her heart." She saw the aged Simeon enfolding her child in his arms, the while he declared Him to be a Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of God's people Israel, and "marvelled at the things which were spoken concerning Him."

Surely she treasured it all not only with a mother's joy, but also with a mother's concern for her part in the sacred mystery. Though she knew the secret of His birth, she was not as yet aware of the secret of our Lord's Person as being God Incarnate in her Son. Nevertheless, she had learned sufficient to impress her with the sacred nature of her duties as the mother of the world's Saviour, and most worthily did she fulfil her part.

III

A veil is drawn over the childhood and youth of our Lord; but during those silent years, in that lowly home at Nazareth, she who was so signally blessed among women, brought up the Son of the Highest in the nurture and admonition of His Heavenly Father. Thus in her womanly faith and courage Mary stands as a model for all mothers, whose children also are a trust from God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Doubtless there was much in Mary's maternal experience which is common to the lot of all mothers. It does appear that in her clinging affection she found it hard to be reconciled to the parting when at length Jesus left home to fulfil His mission. "Lady," said He to her at the Cana wedding, "what have I to do with thee?" Though, as we believe, He spoke with a tender light in His eyes, and a smile playing upon His lips, yet it remains that He was gently intimating to Mary that He had now His own work to do, His own life to live. Every mother who has had to deny her own heart in surrendering grown sons to an independent life has sisterly affinities with Mary, and shares with her the pang of such renunciation, as the following lines reveal:—

Child, child, child!

What have they done with thee?

Where is the little child

Who laughed upon my knee?

My son is straight and strong,

Ready of life and limb;

'Twas the dream of my whole life long

To bear a son like him.

He has griefs I cannot guess,

He has joys I cannot know;

I love him none the less;

With a man it should be so,

But where, where, where

Is the child so dear to me,

With the silken-golden hair,

Who sobbed upon my knee?

IV

With increasing clearness the mother of our Lord came to realize the measure of the sacrifice her own loving heart must make. Once, in her deep concern, when Christ's enemies charged Him with being in league with Satan, she sought to interfere in His mission, and to persuade Him to return to the shelter of the old home. Alas for Mary! For the time she was out of accord with her Son. She did not understand that it was to Jerusalem and Calvary His face was set, and not to the security of Nazareth. One is restrained by a feeling of reticence as one thinks of her standing there at length beneath His Cross. Instead of dwelling upon her motherly grief and anguish, let us reflect rather upon the joy that electrified her heart when on the third day she learned of His glorious triumph as the Prince of Life.

Her last appearance in the sacred story is in that Upper Room on the Day of Pentecost. Her sorrows are now at an end. An ineffable joy fills her soul; for her Son, who is likewise her Lord and Saviour, sheds abroad His redeeming Spirit of Love, as the hope of all mankind. Now once again can Mary chant the glad strains of the Magnificat:—

My soul doth magnify the Lord,

And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour.

For He hath looked upon the low estate of His handmaiden:

For behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed.

The Intention of the Church

Some time ago we published a long article on Intention. We examined several theories, and showed the inherent weakness of the usual claim that the validity of certain rites etc. depends upon the intention of the person who officiates at the rite. Since that article appeared we have noticed some fresh discussions of the subject. Some of them concern the Roman Catholic attitude to the Holy Orders of the Church of England. It is said that there is "a defective intention" implicit in the English Ordinal. It is true that the Ordinal implies a rejection of Roman Catholic theories of the powers of the priesthood, but that does not mean a rejection of a true conception of Christian priesthood. We have discussed this point fairly recently, and it is a very important point as some people are misled by certain Anglican apologists, such as Dom Gregory Dix, into thinking that the Church of England holds the same views as the Roman Catholic Church in regard to the ministry. This is a delusion. We hope soon to return to this aspect of the question and to examine Dix's interpretation of the Ordinal.

* * *

It is not to be thought that the theory of Intention is settled, and that a precise definition is available and authoritative. It is one of the theological problems which Rome allows to be debated; and advocates of "internal intention" are to be found arguing with advocates of "external intention." An "internal intention" seems to mean that a man intends to effect a certain purpose (the purpose of the Church) not simply by outward acts, but inwardly. An "external intention" suggests that the rite is validly effected by the performance of the rite in the fashion prescribed by authority (no doubt always assuming that the officiant has no deliberate contrary intention).

* * *

From the Evangelical standpoint, the question of intention must always be this—If you lay down conditions regarding the intention of the minister what guarantee or assurance have you of the validity of any rite or sacrament? It is said that Pope Innocent III demanded of certain converts that they should profess that the Eucharist required for its validity "a faithful intention" on the part of the minister. If he was right no assurance is possible for no one can ever be certain of that "faithful intention." Of course it may be assumed that it exists—but it cannot be assumed, still less, proved, that it exists in every instance. If there is failure in one instance—e.g. in a bishop's intention in conferring Holy Orders, or in a priest's intention in baptising, the failure will invalidate an ever widening series of acts till the end of time, for obviously nothing can rectify the original want of a faithful intention.

Where it is believed that the saying of a Mass and the offering of the Sacrifice of the Altar can procure benefits though there are no communicants, it is plain that much needs to be said about the necessary sort of intention in the mind and acts of the priest. But where it is not believed that there is a sacrifice in addition to Holy Communion; and is held that the Sacrament requires the participation of communicants; it is plain that the intention of the communicants must have important bearing upon the whole matter. The evangelical Christian is entitled (in virtue of the priesthood of all believers) to hold that his intention will give validity to any sacrament in which he shares. The intention of the faithful must carry weight, and the whole discussion must rest on a wider foundation than the intention of the minister alone.

Historically it is recognised that in the Middle Ages there were several opinions about intention. It was held by some that the minister expressed his intention in the use of the accepted form of service. Others said that the minister must not only use the form but intend to do what the Church does. Others said the minister must intend by the rite to produce the correct sacramental effect. Some said that no intention was called for on the part of the minister; and that it was sufficient if he followed the practice of the Church.

One might be tempted to dismiss all this, but Protestants who criticise the Roman Catholic Church's doctrine of intention often neglect to think out their own doctrine—What are we to say about our intention?

* * *

When we meet to observe the Lord's Supper the intention is made plain by the association of several factors, for instance:—1. The provision on the Holy Table of Bread and Wine in customary vessels. 2. The presence of a minister who has come to officiate at that particular service. 3. The presence of Christians who have come to partake in the service and Sacrament. 4. The words used in the Service, and in particular, the repetition of the words Our Lord Himself used at the Last Supper in the Upper Room. 5. The breaking of the Bread and the signifying of the Wine. 6. The distribution of the Bread and Wine to the Communicants. 7. The setting of the whole in prayer and worship.

It seems to the Evangelical Christian that there would need to be a failure of more than the minister's intention to render such an observance nugatory and void.

The point is that the complicated theological arguments as to intention in relation to the validity of a Sacrament need only arise if all significant intention is concentrated in the priest, and if what he intends is all that matters.

* * *

When Martin Luther came to the forefront of the Reformation movement in the sixteenth century he enunciated the half-forgotten truth of Justification by Faith. It has become fashionable in some non-Roman Catholic circles to denounce or deride this doctrine. Those who wish to remove as many as possible of the differences between ourselves and Rome will reject it, for when Rome says it doesn't believe such a thing they dutifully say "we don't either." Yet the simple solid fact is there, as Luther, like St. Paul and the Fathers knew, that there can be no alternative to being justified by faith. We need not argue about the correct shade of meaning of the word "justified," for the crucial word is "by faith." So Luther perpetrated no crime when he wrote in his translation of the New Testament "by faith alone." All things in our religion ultimately rest on faith; whether it be historic facts of the past, or the experience of the present.

When Augustine wrote of the Lord's Supper (we are depending on our memory here) "Believe, and thou hast eaten," he was at one with Luther who said "all which we believe we shall receive."

We actually do receive regardless of what the minister does or does not do. Of course Augustine would have put it differently, but the plain fact is there—"believe."

Similarly, in the English Prayer Book, in the Service for "the Communion of the Sick" the sick man is to be instructed that if he cannot receive the actual elements of the Lord's Supper he may still by faithful contemplation of Our Lord's acts receive the Sacrament. This was not a Reformation novelty, but a principle well-known in the Middle Ages. Here again we have the pre-eminence of faith as the factor which counts.

* * *

"Justification by Faith," as we have often said, is not to be apologised for. It is inescapable. It is New Testament teaching; and it has full support in the Ancient Church. Some people have questioned this because the actual phrase is not common, but the truth is there, as Bishop Kaye of Lincoln, a great patristic scholar, long ago pointed out.

Justification by Faith has, then, an important bearing on the doctrine of intention. It neither evacuates sacraments of their meaning and worth, nor leaves men free to think or do as they please. It must be kept in its New Testament setting, and constantly related to its context. We find our intention in wishing to know and to do what the Scriptures tell us. Our intention is to conform to them, not to conform to self-will or to mere subjectivity.

* * *

The Council of Trent's decisions were largely the Roman Catholic answer to the teachings of Luther. The divines assembled at Trent in 1547 condemned any who said that the minister of a Sacrament need not intend to do what the Church does. It is well-known that the Council did not intend to settle differences among its own theologians but to reject the Lutheran view that the faith of the recipient of the Sacrament is enough. But it is clear that it was assumed that the minister's intention was the decisive intention. The intention of the Communicant (and indeed his faith) could be defeated by the defect in the intention of the minister. This tended to increase dependence in the minister, and to subordinate all spiritual issues to his will.

Though "Intention" is largely discussed, and many theologians have speculated widely about it, it may seem generally agreed in Roman Catholic circles that the intention to do what the Church does is normally inferred from the decent performance of the rite concerned. Pope Leo XIII in his condemnation of Anglican Orders said that his Church would only judge of intention as far as it was externally manifested—"a Sacrament is truly a Sacrament even if it is conferred through the ministry of a heretic or unbaptised person, provided the Catholic rite is used. But if, on the contrary, the rite is changed . . ." In these words the use of the "Catholic" rite allows an orthodox intention to be presumed. The change of the rite suggests that an orthodox intention may not be presumed. In the English Ordinal the departure from the pre-Reformation form must, as Leo XIII held, have some significance. The return on the part of the English Reformers to a more ancient form of Ordination rite expressed the intention to abandon certain erroneous mediaeval theories of priesthood, but did not express any purpose of abandoning the ancient ministries of the Church. As Leo could not regard the mediaeval theories as erroneous he was bound to defend them and to reject all departure from them.

It is laid down pretty generally, if not universally, in regard to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, that "a positive will to exclude sacrifice would make the Sacrament invalid from lack of intention" (Rev. B. Leeming, S.J., in Irish Theological Quarterly, No. 4, 1956). If we ask "sacrifice of what?" it must be "the unbloody sacrifice" i.e. the flesh and blood of Christ Himself, as Rome teaches. It could scarcely be thought to be the sacrifice or self-dedication of the worshipper, or the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving.

It seems to us that when the ceremony, baptism, for example, follows a normal or at least a recognised mode, everything is expressive of serious and responsible purpose, and we can assume that the object of the rite, which is divine grace for the recipient, is fulfilled. We can never reduce our evangelical sacramental faith to mere wishfulness; but neither can we reduce it to exclusive dependence upon an individual. If we want to do with reverent faith what Christ directs, He will not fail us. What more do we need?

COMMENT.

"Protestantism has dealt many cruel blows to Christian faith and feeling, among them being the denial of Purgatory and of all that it implies . . . In defining the doctrine of Purgatory against the Protestant heresy the Church declared that we can help the Holy Souls by our prayers, and chiefly by the acceptable Sacrifice at the Altar."

We quote these words from a cutting we took some years ago from "Assisi," the Irish Franciscan Monthly. Are they true? Has Protestantism; orthodox evangelical Protestantism (the only genuine Protestantism); "dealt many cruel blows to Christian faith and feeling"? We do not believe that it has. Further, we believe we can see in this accusation a slightly Franciscan quality. It is in the word "feeling." Here we have the sentimental appeal. St. Francis was a man of sentiment and emotion, and his disciples may be expected to share their founder's attitude. We do not criticise this, nor belittle sentiment or emotion rightly employed. What we do maintain is the need to control feeling in religion by reason and truth. If a feeling is based on religious error, then it is not a cruel blow to correct it, but a beneficial thing. Truth benefits our feelings as well as our minds, and if we had not the standard of truth God has given us as a correction of our tendency to error, we might find ourselves believing the most irrational and unfounded things. Feelings should be guided and regulated by the Divine revelation. We should not say that because we find an emotional release in a particular sentiment that the sentiment is thereby justified. The desire to do something for the dead is an emotion; and it is often prompted by regret, or by remorse for what we did when the dead were still living. Our failures cannot be compensated for when the opportunity to rectify them has gone. That may seem a harsh view to take, but it is the true view. No amount of sentiment will enable us to do kindness to those we neglected, once they are dead.

Well then, if we cannot make up to the dead for our sins against them, can we go further and say that on a different plane we can assist them to full salvation? If we loved and cherished them here may we not still love and cherish them and try to secure their happiness? We answer that death is a very decisive separation from the affairs and associations of this earth. The dead are removed to a new sphere of existence, and in that new sphere they are out of our hands—"The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God"—so says "The Wisdom of Solomon" (3, 1.), and its author learnt that from Canonical Scripture, e.g. "The spirit shall return unto God Who gave it" (Ecclesiastes 12, 7.). We cannot assume that any of our prayers or pieties can have effect in regard to them. This life, and this life only is the probationary period. Here we have the testing time, and the opportunities of conversion, faith and love. To obey God here and now is the important thing.

But also we must protest against the modern tendency among certain types of non-Roman Catholics to belittle a death-bed repentance. These people think that man must atone in some measure for his sins: that his sufferings or probation after death must be necessary to fit him for "the Beatific Vision." We say that such notions cannot be reconciled with the evangelical and Scriptural belief in the sufficiency of the Saviour's sufferings and death to cancel sin and guilt. Let us have real wholehearted faith in God, faith that He means what He says when He speaks through His Word of "blotting out sin"—faith in Christ of Whom it is said "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin" (1. John 1, 7.).

Is it really wrong to say that a last hour repentance will put a man on the same level as another with a life-time of Christian faith and service? Some people think it is, but we remind them of the parable of the labourers—"I will give unto this last even as unto thee" (Matt. 20, 14.). The whole parable seems designed to answer this problem.

Apart from all this, the theory of Purgatory is totally unsupported, still less, authorised by Holy Scripture. That is the decisive fact, and it has been long since found impossible to defend it on any grounds, unless to say that it is "a necessary inference" (which it is not), or that it is "a tradition of the Church." The fact is that through the centuries men have been intensely curious about the dead, and have built up theories about them which have crystallised into doctrines. But that has not made the theories true ones.

We do not deny that there is progress after death—purer hearts, clearer vision, deeper joys. But we do deny that to uphold the teaching of Holy Scripture is a cruel blow to anyone's faith.

THE MASS AND THE REFORMATION.

(A broadcast in "The Case for Protestantism" Series by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond)

Father Johnston has a serious objection to Canon Maynard. He cites that Canon as saying that "the Church of England did not reject the Mass, but only some unnamed abuses connected with it." He then attempts to show that there is no foundation for the Canon's statement that "The mediaeval conception of the Eucharistic Sacrifice . . . had become paganised and manifestly corrupt." Now I wish to make it clear at the outset that my position in this matter is not the position of Canon Maynard. I accept without reserve his opinion that "If the Reformers had been striking at abuses they would have been all the more careful to put forward the true doctrine in clear and unmistakable terms." I would go further and say they did put forward the true doctrine in clear and unmistakable terms. Here is a statement that they put into the mouths of every preacher in the Church of England. "Now it followeth to have with this knowledge a sure and constant faith, not only that the death of Christ is available for the redemption of all the world, for the remission of sins, and reconciliation with God the Father; but also that he hath made upon his Cross a full and sufficient sacrifice for thee; a perfect cleansing of thy sins; so that thou acknowledgest no other Saviour, Redeemer, Mediator, Advocate, Intercessor, but Christ only; and that thou mayest say with the Apostle, that he loved thee, and gave himself for thee. For this is to stick fast to Christ's promise made in his institution, to make Christ thine own, and to applicate his merits unto thyself. Herein thou needest no other man's help; no other sacrifice or oblation; no sacrificing priest; no mass; no means established by man's invention." ("Concerning the Sacrament," Homilies, p. 448.)

In an earlier part of the same homily we read: "We must then take heed lest of the memory, it be made a sacrifice, lest of a communion, it be made a private eating; lest, of two parts we have but one; lest, applying it for the dead, we lose the fruit that be alive" (p. 445). These are plain words. When we bear in mind that the Homily from which I have quoted cannot have been written before 1561 and was certainly published in 1563 and that the Council of Trent issued its decrees upon The Mass in 1562 we are here in possession of the closest contemporaneous evidence as to the two views which were in existence concerning the Mass. It would be the height of folly to address people in such language at such time unless it were the intention of the speakers to wean their hearers from a well-known opinion. To tell people who had attended Roman Catholic services for years "Thou needest no other sacrifice or oblation, no sacrificing priest, no mass" would be wholly improper unless it was the purpose of the speaker to indicate that their old accustomed services were wrong in principle as well as in the manner of their performance. I acknowledge that here Father Johnston teaches what is the real purpose of the Church of England. Hooker, the great divine of the later sixteenth century, emphasises this when he says, "Tell us not . . . that if ye may have a mass by permission, we shall have a communion with good leave and liking" . . . Solomon took it (as well he might) for an evident proof, that she did not bear a motherly affection to her child, which yielded to have it cut in divers parts. He cannot love the Lord Jesus with his heart which lendeth one ear to His Apostles and another to false Apostles; which can brook to see a mingle-mangle of religion and superstition, ministers and massing-priests light and darkness, truth and error, traditions and scriptures" (Sermon on Jude, Keble Edit., Vol. III, p. 666). The Reformers intended to abolish the Mass as received in the Church of Rome and did so.

But we need to be careful here. The word "Mass," like a great many other words, signified different things at different times. It is the developed mediaeval doctrine of the Mass to which attention was directed, not to the mere name. Everybody in the sixteenth century had some idea as to what was then meant by the Mass and it was these current ideas that were under review. We can see from the language employed the things that were rejected. We are enjoined not to turn a memory into a sacrifice. The Lord's Supper, according to St. Paul, is a proclaiming of the Lord's Death. It is not a re-enactment of it. The word which St. Paul uses here in I Corinthians, we are told by Moulton and Milligan in their Dictionary, had the official sense of "to proclaim with authority." Indeed it is used eighteen times in the New Testament. Although it is variously translated, the word, "Announce" would meet every instance. It is never used of proclaiming or announcing anything to God. Moreover the shewing or announcing is in the act of the communicants taking and eating bread and drinking wine and not in the act of the priests consecrating or consuming the bread and wine as a sacrifice. If St. Paul knew anything of the modern ideas of the Mass he has elected to conceal them from his readers. He knew neither the word nor the thing. The word in its most harmless sense comes from the Latin services. Bishop Cosin may be cited as a witness here. In his genuine Notes on the Prayer Book we find: "The word 'Mass' was used by the ancients in the Latin Church with quite a different meaning than that which now prevails among the Papists. But the old Fathers used the expression, 'Go, it is Mass,' that is, 'dismissal,' and hence all the sacred acts are called by the one name, Mass, from a single act, and that the last of all. But the word Mass, as it is now used by the Papists for a true and proper sacrifice of Christ offered every time to God the Father for the living and the dead, is nowhere found among the ancients. And for this reason the very word Mass (in its new, not in its ancient signification) is rejected by the English Church, which desired to abolish that wrong opinion about the Sacrifice of the Mass." As for the thing, I have already quoted Salmeron, a brother Jesuit to Father Johnston, as admitting that the Church of Rome receives the theory of the Mass from tradition. He would not have said that if he could cite a passage from St. Paul clearly setting forth the thing. So embarrassed were the French Roman Catholics by this obvious fact that when the Huguenot preachers challenged their opponents and cited Scripture against them, the Roman Catholic divines issued the notorious Bordeaux New Testament which reads in French in Acts XIII, "While they were offering the Sacrifice of the Mass and praying." Again the Roman Catholic divines would not have mistranslated the New Testament if they could have found in it a text to suit their purpose. It is strange that these facts are repeatedly brought to the notice of the controversial radio leaders, but they are never answered or explained.

But there is need to consider the further view that the Mass was paganised or corrupted in the Middle Ages. Father Johnston thinks it a sufficient answer to this charge to quote a few verses from a hymn found in "The Lay Folk's Mass Book." It would be easy to whitewash any system if this method were all that was required. Confucius has marvellous sayings, yet we dare to assert that Confucianism is pagan and corrupt and would point to the practice of child exposure amongst its professed adherents as one example. Buddha was an imageless religious philosophy. We claim that Buddhism is now pagan and corrupt. The generous sentiments which can be found in some of its leaders are praiseworthy but cannot, unhappily, affect the general verdict. As Protestants, of course, we contend that the very notion of repeating or continuing the sacrifice of our Lord on Calvary is in itself a return to a pagan conception and a corruption of the sacred sacrament of Holy Communion. The term Mass is, as Scudamore declares, a most unfitting title for the Sacred Feast. But apart from the fact that it is unfitting, it was in its origin innocent of the later more serious deviation from truth. But unpleasant as it is to follow this dark page of history, candour compels us to avow that there are corruptions even beyond the deviations from the truth of Scripture to which attention has been drawn.

Professor G. G. Coulton is one of the leading students of Mediaeval History. He has spent a long period making available to English readers the exact conditions of mediaeval life and worship. Until his statements are examined in detail and his arguments successfully refuted it will be a painful duty to declare that the doctrine of the Mass and the practice of hearing and saying masses were accompanied with gross superstitions and corruptions. The gross conceptions that prevailed are given to us not in the writings of enemies but in monkish chronicles. That there were earnest and devout worshippers is no doubt true. But it can be safely said they were not as numerous as to-day and it was not until the shock of the Reformation forced the Church of Rome to put her house in order that the present orderly condition of affairs began to exist. Giraldus Cambrensis complains: "Moreover—I say it even weeping—some have turned this great sacrament to magic arts, celebrating Masses over waxen images to curse a man; or, again, by way of imprecation they sing a Mass of the faithful ten or more times over, that he may die before the tenth day or soon after, and that he may be laid with the dead" (Five Centuries of Religion, p. 114). The same writer tells us: "It is plain also that the Eucharist should be given to the thief who begs it at the gallows, foot and who is penitent; yet many do abhor to grant this; either lest the Body of Christ, if by chance it were not swallowed but kept in the mouth, should seem once again to suffer hanging; or again, lest perchance the thief should take it whole from his mouth and keep it to work his liberation, as it is certain this hath sometimes befallen in fact" (p. 115). When a plea was made for the observance of the Decree that required the Eucharist to be given to criminals who desired it, and who showed signs of penitence, the Religious argued against the restoration of this enactment of Canon Law and exclaimed: "If the Eucharist were given to thieves, then the country-folk would say: 'Lo! Christ is racked on the wheel'" (p. 116). Myrc informs his fellow priests "that no man on the day whereon he has seen the Host elevated at Mass, can lack food, or have his idle words and oaths recorded against him, or die by sudden death or lose his eyesight" (p. 117). Is it any wonder with such gross materialistic conceptions passed from mind to mind by the chronicles of the day, clerical chronicles be it noted, that a prisoner accused of heresy thought it sufficient to protest, "I am not a heretic; for I eat flesh, and lie, and swear, and am a faithful Christian" (p. 117).

Surely Father Johnston has read of the many tales in which the Sacred Host was used by evil priests for purposes of witchcraft and of the popular belief that the water used in the ablutions was an excellent eye-salve. Already in the 5th century Augustin tells the story of a lad who was cured of blindness by a poultice made from the consecrated bread. But at least it can be said that however revolting this superstition appears, in those days there was not the added horror that the cure was believed to be effected by the real Body and Blood of our Blessed Lord. Is it any wonder that this paganism and corruption was abroad when we find in the evidence of the same authority, Professor Coulton, that "The Episcopal registers 'show' that there were two distinct categories of parish clergy. On the one hand were the beneficed clergy, who generally belonged to the rich and influential classes, and of whom about 75 per cent. had been presented with livings not only before they had taken holy orders, but even in their youth or their boyhood. The first act of such clerics, on receiving their benefices, was often to go to the university. On the other hand were the poor curates, who might or might not have studied, but who were generally doomed to vegetate on the lowest wages, while the fruits of their parishes were mainly consumed by absentees" (Religious Ed. before Ref., p. 71). If Father Johnston believes that he can make a case for the reverent observance of Mass as it is now used in the Church of Rome in the period under review he will require to do much more than he has hitherto attempted by way of reply to Canon Maynard. He will have to deal with the accumulated evidence concerning the existence of superstitions with which I am sure he has personally no sympathy. He will need to explain the evil system by which parishes all over the country were left in charge of men of doubtful morals and scant learning. He will have to justify the clergy against the recurring charges in Councils and by Bishops which accuse them of such shameful neglect of their flocks that multitudes grew up ignorant of the Lord's Prayer and without the rite of confirmation then regarded as a Sacrament. He will have to correct his former assertion by at least admitting that both priests and people used the consecrated Host for purposes of witchcraft. He will have to account for the vehement denunciation of idle gossiping during Mass found in the preachers' sermons of that day. He will have to explain how it came about that burghers conducted their cases in Church while Mass was being celebrated. He will have to disprove the serious allegation that so little did the populace understand of the Mass that during an Interdict when the celebration of the Mass was forbidden by the Pope, the monks eased the minds of the people by simply ringing the bells. And he will have to accomplish all this while admitting that the witnesses whose evidence he has to rebut were all loyal sons of the Church. Father Johnston may be able to do all this, but personally I do not envy him his task.

places so unsatisfactory, it is pleasing to report that in Spain matters have been improving in certain respects. Six months ago a decree was issued by the Government granting the right of civil marriage to persons who can submit documents proving that they do not now profess the Roman Catholic religion. Such marriages had been refused in Galicia and in other places but they are now pending final decision and a Spanish evangelical leader says, "We are confident that this problem is now completely solved for any future case". Last month a letter was sent by the Spanish Nuncio to all the Roman Bishops in Spain urging them to accept the decree. In February the First Baptist Church in Valencia received a permit to move to their new building, and in Badalona, near Barcelona, the Baptist Church has moved to a larger building without any disturbances. This easement in conditions affecting Spanish Protestants calls for thanksgiving.

Colombian Persecution.

Again we have to call attention to the persecution of Protestants in Colombia. A month ago the Presbyterian chapel and manse in Galilea, Tomlima, Colombia were broken into by armed men who destroyed cups and plates used for Holy Communion, and also chairs, pews, and tables. They burned Bibles and hymn books. A hole was made in the manse roof. Galilea is a mountain village in the Andes. Five years ago the chapel suffered similar desecration by armed police and civilians. At that time also a ruling elder was stabbed in the chest and died after crawling to a nearby house. The following day a Protestant family had their house searched by the Inspector of Police with two police officers. Bibles and Christian literature were confiscated and a month later the home was fired and partially destroyed. Last March at San Carlos a Protestant service being conducted by a licensed Presbyterian preacher was interrupted by a Roman Catholic priest. Their right to assemble was questioned, the police called in, and the preacher directed to stop his services under threat of arrest. Other similar acts have long made it unsafe to be a practising Protestant in this backward land. Earnest prayer is requested that the persecuted may stand fast in trial and that liberty of worship may soon be secured.—"The Christian," 10/5/'57.

Church In England Has Opened Centre To Give Information.

Prompted by the flood of inquiries that come in to radio and television stations after religious programmes have been presented, the Church of England has decided to establish an inquiry centre to which people can write for advice and instruction.

The Roman Catholic Church has long been alert to the need for a medium of information, and carries on widespread advertising in the press offering to answer questions about "Roman Catholic truth."

In charge of the Anglican venture is Richard Tatlock, new rector of St. Dunstan-in-the-East near the Tower of London. Mr. Tatlock, who has had considerable experience in the British Broadcasting Corp's religious broadcasting services, plans to recruit a team of advisers to help him answer the inquiries.

His own church, which was destroyed during World War II, is to be rebuilt as a church social centre in the City of London, with restaurant, library and clubrooms for the use of city workers.

PASSING EVENTS.

The State of Israel.

Israel has commenced this month its tenth year of independence with fine enthusiasm. What it has accomplished in the past years is most impressive, indeed, well nigh incredible. No wonder the ninth Independence Day was celebrated with a wide range of activities. There were parades and festivities, fireworks and illuminations, receptions and services. Much has happened since the first Independence Day with its smashing of barriers, flooding of streets and a crush of almost suffocating people. Great advance has marked the years in trade, education, agriculture, transport and shipping. The population has risen from three-quarters of a million to nearly two million. Financially its economy is not sound, but hope abounds. A brilliant writer in "The Times" has this sentence—"An observer who knew this patchy country of bare highlands, plains and arid desert nine years ago would delight in the green and vibrant transformation visible and felt to-day." Not only is a permanent home provided for disgracefully persecuted members of the Jewish race, but prosperity is in sight. The future has few terrors for such a forceful people. In the next year one hundred thousand immigrants are expected and each costs the state three thousand dollars to put on his feet. It is a land of opportunity with roots in a distant past, a present of questions with many possible answers, and a future promising "beauty for ashes."—"The Christian," 17/5/57.

Roman Catholic Bishop's Charges against Ireland's Religious Minority.

Speaking in Dublin at the concluding meeting of the Social Study Congress of the Dublin Institute of Catholic Sociology, the Most Rev. Dr. Philbin, Bishop of Clonfert, said that at present it seemed necessary to point out that a concerted effort was being made by the religious minority to secure a dominating position in our public life. One had only to read a succession of statements from their spokesmen to see that that was true.

Offensive statements about the Church were now common form with them, he said. They claimed that leadership in every community belonged to a minority, and recalling their long ascendancy in the past, they asserted that they should be the dominant group to-day. They recognised that they had positions of influence far out of proportion to their members; yet they were exhorting their members to secure more leadership and power. It was a leadership in thought and ideals that was in question, not mere personal prominence.

"I suggest that this is an explicit challenge to a Catholic nation which it would be unwise to overlook," declared Dr. Philbin. "Even if it does not succeed in making us desert our Faith, it may do much towards neutralising our Catholicity and preventing the application of its principles. It may have done much to this effect already. We may have reached a stage when calling Ireland a Catholic nation will be regarded itself as a challenge and deplored by some Catholics."

Even in Ireland, Dr. Philbin said, it was necessary to be vigilant. Specious reasons would be alleged for policies of indifference or neutralism. It was suggested, for example, that concessions should be made with a view to conciliating a dissident minority. "No doubt," he continued, "we can have unity tomorrow if we are ready to go over to the minority standpoint. It is difficult to see why the religious sphere rather than others is chosen for compromise. We shall be false to our responsibility if we give less than full expression to the Faith and principles we have inherited."—"Irish Times," 1-7-1957.

[We can see no evidence whatever that "the religious minority"—a euphemism for "Protestants," a word Roman Catholics find hard to pronounce nowadays—has the smallest desire to dominate the public life of Eire. The religious minority has one or two spokesmen in politics who have courage to say publicly what many good Roman Catholics think but hesitate to ventilate.

Not one of them says anything really offensive, but of course anything but acquiescence is "offensive."]

Israel's Immigrants.

Ten years ago there were 650,000 Jews in Israel. By the end of next year, according to present plans, the number should reach two million. Already, 400,000 Jews are registered to come to Israel within the four years to the end of 1969. Of this year's quota of 100,000, half have already arrived. The magnitude of the task Mr. Ben-Gurion's Government has set itself in lodging temporarily this great influx of newcomers from Europe and other lands, building permanent houses for them, and settling them in productive work, would tax the resources of a much larger country than Israel. Nevertheless the problem is not as formidable as might appear at first sight. Most of the newcomers are European Jews, educated according to European standards, and skilled persons sorely needed in Israel at the present juncture. A large proportion of Jewish immigrants hitherto, have been unskilled men and women from Oriental lands; in fact, they have created a social problem. Government plans include absorbing 7,000 or more families in industry this year, and over the next four years it is hoped to set up 400 new enterprises and to extend 200 others already in existence. The question naturally arises whether these efforts to build up a more numerous and stronger Israel will increase tension with her Arab neighbours. In the opinion of "The Times" correspondent in Jerusalem, this ambitious scheme is likely to influence Israel's Government to adopt a cautious and more friendly attitude towards the Arabs. For one thing the enormous cost of the immigration will leave little to spare for increased armaments. There is also a greater readiness to take account of Arab susceptibilities. If only the refugee problem could be amicably settled the whole Near East would benefit. It is to be hoped that as time goes on the various Arab States will accept the logic of the situation. Israel is in Palestine to stay, and her neighbours would benefit themselves greatly, both politically and economically by recognizing the fact.—"The Christian," 12-7-1957.

Huguenots led way—First Protestants came to Brazil 400 year ago.

A message from Sao Paulo, Brazil, recently states:

On March 21st we celebrated the 400th anniversary of the arrival of the first Protestants in this country. It was in 1557 that a little group of French Protestants, led by Pastor Riquet, landed

HABITUAL CONFESSION

(A broadcast in "The Case for Protestantism" Series by Archdeacon T. C. Hammond).

I have been challenged to prove that the practice of habitual confession has been attended with any evil consequences. My interrogator says, "You objected some time ago to Dr. Rumble making assertions and giving no proof. You have given no proof of the evil of confession."

I thought I did give some proof. I thought I quoted Dr. Von Hirscher, a Roman Catholic divine who spoke of the evils in the case of the penitents. Perhaps my questioner thinks that is only Dr. Von Hirscher's private opinion. I think it is based on his observation. But at any rate it is not my assertion. It is the opinion of a distinguished Roman Catholic. Still I agree that in matters of this kind we must remove as far as possible the danger of acting on mere prejudice and we must support our theorizing with facts. But the average person who practices habitual confession will not be impressed by any proof I might attempt to give out of my own experience. He will think I am prejudiced. In these circumstances I think it best to supply some extracts from history and from recognised authorities that might help to establish what I believe to be the case.

There are several sides to this important question. Protestants have rejected habitual confession because of the evil effect on the penitent. I think I quoted Richard Hooker who said "We labour to instruct men in such sort that every soul which is wounded with sin may learn the way how to cure itself; they, clean contrary, would make all sores seem incurable, unless the priests have a hand in them." ("Ecc. Polity" Bk. VI, VI, 2). It is now generally believed that the Sixth Book of Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity from which this extract is taken did not form part of his original work in Ecclesiastical Polity but was a separate treatise on the question of Confession and Absolution. But there can be no doubt as to the genuineness of the opinion quoted.

How does the practice of habitual confession act deleteriously on the penitent? Perhaps the first well-known instance of the abuse of private confession whereby evil was wrought on the soul of a penitent is the case that occurred in Constantinople in the time of Nectarius who occupied the See before Chrysostom and lived in the year 388. Archbishop Usher thus repeats the story: "In the time of Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople, upon occasion of an infamy drawn upon the clergy by the confession of a gentlewoman, defiled by a deacon in that city, it was thought fit that (the presbyter penitentiary) should be abolished; and that liberty should be given unto everyone, upon the private examination of his own conscience, to resort to the holy Communion" (Answer to a Jesuit p. 87). Nectarius is an interesting figure. He was baptised and made a bishop at the one time or at least the two ceremonies of baptism and consecration were so close together as to make the interval negligible. As Archdeacon Sinclair puts it:—The praetor (Nectarius was at this time an important City magistrate) a few days ago a catechumen stepped at once to the presidency of "The Second General Council." But he made a good Archbishop. It strikes my hearers that the offence was committed with a deacon and it may be said, of course, that this has nothing to do with the effect of habitual confession on a penitent. But two facts somewhat qualify that first and natural judgment. The circumstances were peculiar. The lady in question was offering prayer after confession as enjoined by her confessor. Also according to Socrates the historian the lady confessed to habitual sin on these occasions. Obviously the secrets of the confessional were not kept as closely as some would have us believe. Indeed Sozomen the historian makes no bones about it at all. He tells us "Upon notice of which horrid fact the deacon was cashiered and cast out of the Church." So that the whole matter is very closely connected with the confession and proves that the excitation of confession in that woman's case so far from leading her to true repentance opened up occasion for sin. We are justified in saying that there is great danger that evil results will follow from the habitual use of confession. After this scandal the practice of private confession was abolished in Constantinople and remained abolished for very many years. The successor of Nectarius, the famous Chrysostom, expounds the Apostle's words, "But let a man examine himself and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup," in the following way. "Let everyone examine himself, and then let him come. He doth not bid one man to examine another but everyone himself making the judgment private and the trial without witnesses." (Hom. XXVIII).

When the practice of secret auricular confession was again revived, it might be supposed that, taught by previous mistakes, great care would be taken to prevent any recurrence of scandals of the sort that threw the Church of Constantinople into a ferment. Unfortunately the pages of history reveal that the danger to penitents instead of diminishing seemed to increase. There is one instance in the early Church and it can be said it is indirectly though clearly connected with confession. Paul IV occupied the Papal throne during the period when the persecutions under Mary were in full sway in England. An old man of eighty when he ascended the Papal throne he was a fiery opponent of the Reformation. At the same time he showed some desires for reform. He attempted to check the evils that were rampant in Spain and issued a bill condemning Monks and Priests in Spain who in the fiery Pope's strong language "broke out into such heinous acts of iniquity as to abuse the sacrament of penance in the very act of hearing confessions . . . by enticing and provoking or trying to entice or provoke females to lewd actions." Lea the historian asserts that the result of this Bull has been grossly exaggerated by hostile writers and I have no desire to fall under that condemnation. That there was occasion for it may readily be discovered by the fact that Lea himself analysed 3,775 cases among the Inquisition Archives, of whom 2,794 were monks or friars and 981 parish priests. Nor is that the end of the story. The evil persisted through generations and every attempt to stamp it out met with ill success. St. Bonaventura in the thirteenth century laments that there are few parish priests free from this or other defects that should incapacitate them from holding their sacred office.

It is at least remarkable that this evil, a danger to penitents, should dog the steps of the Confessional from very early days up to the time when the awakened conscience of a great body of people banned it in the sixteenth century. But, of course, someone may say, "Yes! These were evils attendant on the Confessional but things would have been worse without it." I would like to treat that argument with due respect. If it could be established much that I have adduced as concrete evidence would be no longer valid. But it cannot be established. The countries that came under the sway of the Reformation have not deteriorated morally as a result of abandoning habitual confession. There is much that we deplore in the general conduct in such countries. But there is nothing that can establish a claim to superior sanctity in the countries that have retained this particular practice. No one doubts that there are rare souls of the highest spiritual character in the ranks of those who have not, unhappily, embraced the fuller spiritual liberty to be found in Protestantism. But the general standard is no higher. If the confessional did all that is claimed for it, then the general standard should be higher. Professor Coulton has given good reasons for his conclusion that "After four centuries of separation from the Roman Church, the average non Romanist citizen is apparently on the whole, a slightly less criminal person than the average of those who clung to the Only Saving Faith." I agree that criminal statistics omit many important particulars. I also agree that there is much too little of the teaching of Christ manifest in adherents of any creed. But I plead that here statistics fail, as they do fail, to give a clear contrast in moral superiority to a system that includes habitual confession the ground is still to seek on which habitual confession may be justified by results.

Perhaps it may be best to close this defence, from one point of view, of the Protestant position by the following quotation from a declaration made by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury in 1873. It runs as follows: "In the matter of Confession, the Church of England holds fast those principles which are set forth in Holy Scripture, which were professed by the Primitive Church, and which were re-affirmed at the English Reformation. The Church of England, in the Twenty-fifth Article affirms that Penance is not to be counted for a Sacrament of the Gospel: and as judged by her formularies knows no such words as 'sacramental confession.' Grounding her doctrines on Holy Scripture, she distinctly declares the full and entire forgiveness of sins, through the blood of Jesus Christ, to those who bewail their own sinfulness, confess themselves to Almighty God, with full purpose of amendment of life, and turn with true faith unto Him. It is the desire of the Church that by this way and means all her children should find peace. In this spirit the forms of Confession and Absolution are set forth in her public services. Yet, for the relief of troubled consciences she has made special provision in two exceptional cases: (1) In the case of those who cannot quiet their own consciences previous to receiving the Holy Communion the minister is directed to say 'Let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned minister of God's Word, and open his grief, that by the ministry of God's Holy Word, he may receive the benefit of Absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice.' Nevertheless, it is to be noted that for such a case no form of Absolution has been prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer; and further, the Rubric in the first Prayer Book of 1549, which sanctions a particular form of Absolution, has been withdrawn, from all subsequent editions of the said Book.

(2) In the Order of the Visitation of the Sick, it is directed that the sick man may be moved to make a special confession of his sins if he feels his conscience troubled with any weighty matter, but in such case Absolution is to be given when the sick man shall humbly and heartily desire it. The special provision, however does not authorize the ministers of the Church to require from anyone who may repair to them, to open their grief in a particular or detailed examination of all their sins, or to require private confession as a condition previous to receiving the Holy Communion, or to enjoin or even encourage any practice of habitual confession, or the being subject to what has been termed the 'direction' of a priest, as a condition of attaining to the highest spiritual life."

In the year 1903, the Rev. T. W. Drury, B.D., then Principal of Ridley Hall, Cambridge and afterwards Bishop of Sodor and Man published an inquiry into Confession and Absolution with special reference to the teaching of the Church of England in which he stated. "No words can more exactly express the outcome of this study or more fitly bring it to a close than the wise and weighty utterance which I have just now re-produced."

It is not pleasant to recall the sad lapses from Divine truth and probity that have marred the fair beauty of the visible church of God. But it is expedient to meet every perplexity that presents itself to any inquiring mind. I have tried fairly to present the case that all the Protestant Churches under the guidance of history make against the practice of habitual Confession. If the past offers any indication of the consequences of our actions by tracing their results through the long centuries then surely the past advises us that what the Homily calls "the numbering of our sins" in a regular rotation of secret confessions so far from helping our journey along the strait path that leads to life is calculated to hinder our every step.

FETHARD-ON-SEA— UNSETTLED STILL!

Fethard boycott has been called off—"It's wonderful," say the Rector.

Protestants in Fethard-on-Sea, Co. Wexford, who have been boycotted by the Roman Catholic community of the district since May, were on Wednesday welcoming the news that the boycott had been lifted. The rector of the parish church, Rev. A. C. P. Fisher, said: "It's wonderful news—really wonderful."

Mr. Fisher, who in the past number of weeks has made several appeals for a return of peace among the 100 inhabitants of the village, said he knew nothing about the agreement to end the boycott until he read it in the newspapers.

"If it has really ended, and please God it has, then this is a great day in Ireland," he said, speaking from the rectory.

"The past ten weeks have been awful. What had been a happy little community seemed to be torn asunder. I can't say how happy I am that the trouble has ended."

Mr. James J. Kennedy, chairman of Wexford County Council and Roman Catholic representative at a meeting on Tuesday at which it was agreed to bring the two sides together again, said: "The Fethard affair has ended, and everybody is very happy. The village is back to normal."

"But," he added, in a telephone interview with the "Belfast Telegraph," "the word boycott was not mentioned at our meeting and should not be mentioned in the papers. There never was a boycott."

Meanwhile, the whereabouts of Mrs. Cloney and her two children are still unknown. Her mother, Mrs. Kelly, said to-day: "I don't know where my daughter is."

Asked whether the boycott had in fact ended, Mrs. Kelly, speaking from her home at Fethard, replied: "I couldn't say. I have not been outside the house this morning."

A statement issued after the meeting in Dublin between Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Tom Kelly, father of Mrs. Cloney, and his son, Mr. William Kelly, said that Mr. Kelly had given an undertaking to do everything possible to ascertain the whereabouts of the two Cloney children.

On behalf of the Catholics, Mr. Kennedy accepted the undertaking.

The meeting was arranged, Mr. Kennedy said, by lay members of the community on both sides. Clergy did not take part in any of the negotiations.

The boycott started when Mrs. Sheila Cloney, a Protestant, left her Roman Catholic husband and took her two children with her. Afterwards her solicitor said she had taken this course because she did not want her children to be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith.—"Belfast Weekly Telegraph," 9/8/57.

Little change yet at Fethard.

There seemed to be no change at Fethard-on-Sea yesterday, and the joint statement published on Wednesday by representatives of the Catholic and Church of Ireland communities was still the main subject of discussion among the villagers.

Several villagers, however, said that the statement had certainly resulted in the beginning of a restoration of harmony. People on both sides, however, still seemed to be expecting something more definite than the joint statement, which many have interpreted differently.

Those who were aware of the negotiations leading to the joint statement still were confident that the road had been opened to full harmony. Many are awaiting the week-end to receive further assurances from their neighbours, and from the representatives of their communities.—"Irish Times," 9/8/57.

Boycott in Fethard Not Yet Ended.

Irish Times Reporter.

The boycott of Protestant traders at Fethard-on-Sea, Co. Wexford, continues, in spite of the statement which was made following a meeting of representative Catholics and members of the Church of Ireland on Tuesday last.

The Protestant traders in Fethard have not regained any of their lost customers. The boycott of Protestants in the area has been in operation since the middle of May this year, and it is now felt that only a direct statement by the local Catholic clergy will bring about an improvement in the situation. Any hope that the statement made after last Tuesday's meeting would end the boycott has faded. It is now apparent that the statement has not made the slightest difference.

Miss Betty Cooper, one of the two Protestant traders in the village told an "Irish Times" reporter yesterday that there had been no change in the situation. Not one of her former customers who stopped making purchases in her shop when the boycott began had since returned. Miss Cooper, who is the local news-agent, said that she had not had occasion to order one single extra newspaper since last Tuesday's statement.

Good Business

"Although it is only a small shop, I used to do a good business here," Miss Cooper said, "I had a very good trade in novels and magazines, but it has practically disappeared. It will probably take years to build it up again."

Fethard is no longer awaiting a return to normal conditions. It is now felt that no development could immediately restore the life of the village to the state in which it was before the boycott began. But there could be an improvement, and now that a statement by representatives of Catholic and Protestant laity has failed to produce such an improvement, it is felt that the next move must lie with the local Catholic clergy. It is hoped locally that they will make a statement at the Masses in the village to-morrow.—"Irish Times," 10/8/57.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

MARTIN LUTHER.

AN ENQUIRY

Elsewhere in our pages is a letter from Mr. J. A. Dickinson. It is plain that he raises an important question, and it is in the interest of evangelical religion and of the Reformation that an attempt should be made to answer it.

* * *

Let us say at the outset that Christians who are not Lutherans are not urgently required to defend Luther. The Reformation in England, Scotland and Ireland was not a Lutheran movement in the sense in which the Reformation in Scandinavian lands was. Those islands owe something to Luther, but not as much as Northern and Central Europe do. But that does not mean that we should acquiesce in every slander levelled at the Saxon reformer, or join with certain Roman Catholic writers in supporting a certain sort of propaganda against him.

The kind of slander or insinuation is that Luther was "a bad man," and that he said things that were obscene and blasphemous against the Redeemer Who suffered and died for us. Mr. Dickinson has referred us to an instance of this in the case of Mr. Arnold Lunn's book on "The Revolt Against Reason." Arnold Lunn is an experienced writer of biography (we remember a book of his on John Wesley which we enjoyed reading immensely) and of personal reminiscences, and of mountaineering history, and of Swiss topics. His father was a respected Methodist minister who served as a Medical Missionary in India and in after years was well-known for his concern for Christian reunion.

* * *

Some twenty years ago Mr. Lunn engaged in a theological correspondence with the Roman Catholic writer, the Rev. Ronald A. Knox (now a Monsignor). The letters which passed between them were published under the title "Difficulties." We thought, when we were reading the book, that Mr. Lunn's difficulties were real obstacles to Rome's claims, and that Fr. Knox was by no means convincing in his answers. Strange to say, some years later, Mr. Lunn became a Roman Catholic. Since that change of faith he has written some things on theology, and also the book Mr. Dickinson refers to. "The Revolt Against Reason" is full of information, and witnesses to its author's wide reading. We ourselves have no desire to rebel against reason. We wish to maintain the rationality of the universe as seriously as Mr. Lunn, but we make no pretence to Mr. Lunn's extensive knowledge or literary ability: we simply want to discuss the point he makes against Luther.

* * *

Luther is thought to have been the Reformation's arch-enemy of Reason. He could of course refer to "the strumpet Reason." But that was in the context of Reason as the enemy of Faith. Luther never yielded a point of Faith to Reason, and his years of study of scholastic philosophy and theology meant that he knew quite well the things he protested against. The arid if skilful arguments of the classroom seemed to him barren when compared with the rich, invigorating and renovating winds of Faith which swept from the New Testament into his soul.

It is natural then that Mr. Lunn should consider Luther as one of the people responsible for driving reason out of its place of authority in human life.

His charge against Luther centres upon certain observations found in Luther's Table Talk. One of these, probably, some will say, quite the most reprehensible, relates to a statement about Our Lord and certain women. It is the obscene and blasphemous (when superficially noted) suggestion that Our Lord's relations with the woman at Jacob's well, (as also with Mary Magdalene and the adulterous woman) were not innocent.

To all Christians this is a horrible and distressing thing and we recoil in pain and disgust from one who could insinuate such a thing. But how does Mr. Lunn study this passage from the Table Talk? He is not inclined to give Luther much benefit of doubt. The existence of this passage can be explained by Mr. Lunn on one ground only—the fact that the editor of the Table Talk did not suppress the saying is a sign of the collapse of moral standards in Germany in the days of the Reformation under Luther.

Now we hope we do not belong to a school of thought which when an inconvenient or discreditable point turns up, asks the question “why did the Editor not suppress the passage?” The fact that the Editor of Luther’s Table Talk did not suppress this, or one or two other sayings, seem to us to show that he never imagined the reader would put upon them the meaning now usually accepted by Roman Catholic writers.

Luther put forward the suggestion that Our Lord sinned with the persons named, that is, if the saying is authentic (which is not capable of proof). Now Mr. Lunn assumes that nothing else can have been meant by Luther, because, he says, “a whole universe separates the conception of a Christ who suffers for our sins and a Christ who commits them.”

We can readily agree with Mr. Lunn, but we are not sure that what he says is really on the point at issue. We can see that Luther may have been thinking about these three sinful persons who met Our Lord, and about the extraordinarily mild reception He gave them, and the surprisingly spontaneous forgiveness He granted them. A rigorist would have denounced and penalised them. Our Lord forgave; and the thing people find so hard to believe about God’s forgiveness is that it is free and unmerited. They think that if forgiveness is so easily granted, the sin is being condoned or connived at. If Luther was trying to instil into the minds of his hearers Christ’s attitude to sinners rather than the attitude of the Pharisees (past or contemporary), the way he chose was striking and may be effective.

There is also another aspect of the Christian doctrine of forgiveness which Mr. Lunn seems to ignore in practice—the truth that Our Lord not only died on the Cross for our sins, but in fact took them on Himself. Recall the words of Isaiah the prophet. “The Lord laid on Him the iniquity of us all.” Recall the words of St.

Paul (2 Cor. 5. 21) “Him Who Knew no sin He (God the Father) made to be sin on our behalf.” “Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us.” (Gal. 3. 13). Do these passages not show us an aspect of Christ’s atoning work in which He identifies Himself with the sinner? He is not the Saviour ab extra, but is intimately involved with the sinner as Man.

We may illustrate this truth by some verses of a very valuable hymn—“Lord Jesus, are we one with Thee?

“O height, O depth of love!
“Thou one with us on Calvary,
“We one with Thee above.”
“Such was Thy love, that for our sake
“Thou didst from heaven come down;
“Our mortal flesh and blood partake,
“In all our misery one.”
“Our sins, our guilt, in love divine, “Confessed and borne by Thee;
“The sting, the curse, the wrath were Thine,
“To set Thy members free.”

We say that Mr. J. G. Deck, the writer of this hymn (No. 391 Irish Church Hymnal), had a sound grasp of the deeper truths of Christ’s redemption work, and so had Martin Luther.

* * *

As a matter of principle we are bound to say that it is inconceivable that Luther intended to disparage, insult, slander, or blaspheme Our Lord. Whatever be the explanation of that objectionable and profane utterance (taking it as it stands) it cannot be interpreted in opposition to the general witness to Christ which Luther bore.

As we have said, we know nothing of the context and circumstances and history of the passage Mr. Lunn has discussed, and we are not required to explain or justify everything said by Luther or by any other Reformer. They were all fallible men like the rest of the human race. The Church reformed is not inerrant or infallible any more than the unreformed Church was, or is.

Mr. Lunn says, no doubt quite correctly, that you would not have heard at Sir Thomas More’s table the vulgarities and indecencies supposed to have been common at Luther’s table. Sir Thomas More was Lord Chancellor of England, and his guests, we may take it, were persons of breeding and courtly habit. Luther’s table was surrounded by vagrants, undergraduates, traders, soldiers, ex-monks, and, at times, knights and barons and divines. The talk was pretty coarse and the jokes crude on many occasions. The facts of life were not always talked about "sotto voce," but that frankness was not salacious but typical of the age of von Hutten and Rabelais.

* * *

Another Mr. Lunn, Brian Lunn, wrote a book on Luther in the 1930's. It is worth reading, and gives a clear portrayal of Luther and his problems. We quote two sayings of Brian Lunn—

"Luther was passionately truthful."

"He was gifted with the profound truthfulness of genius."

We have said enough for the present, but we propose to keep the promise we made some months ago to examine a Catholic Truth Society pamphlet on Luther which was being distributed last spring in Dublin.

CORRESPONDENCE

Edinburgh.

To The Editor,
"The Catholic."

Sir,

Is it right for the Christian Church to be entangled with religious films and plays? For thirty years ministers have been trying such things on, in connection with the Church. What good have they done? There is less true religion now than before and professing Christians, in the Church and out of it are so wordly-minded that the words of Jesus are true, should He come in our day, when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith—the faith—on the earth?

Some branches of the Church are always looking back to Luther and the Reformation. Did the Apostles in their writings refer much to Samuel and the great reformation wrought in Israel by the Spirit of God through him?

Other branches of the Church are engrossed with the idea that there should be one Church with one common name, forgetting that, in his epistles, Paul mentions the names of many churches, viz—the Churches of Asia, the Churches of Galatia, the Churches of Judæa and so on. Many Churches there may be; but there is only one Gospel, one Master and one Head, the Lord Jesus Christ. Rather let us consider what a Christian really is—a disciple, a follower, a friend of the Lord Jesus Christ who is the one Redeemer, exalted by the right hand of God to be a Prince and a Saviour in order to give repentance and forgiveness of sins.

The Luther Film and other religious films are plays, first and foremost, and can never take the place of preaching the gospel of Christ. Indeed, it is true to say they have been the means of hindering the gospel and of choking the true study of the Bible. God's Word enters the mind and heart by hearing and through reading the Bible. Let those who feel drawn away by the pictures to-day know that there is such an evil which is described as "the lust of the eyes." The Psalmist's prayer—Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity, is a prayer for all who name the name of Christ.

—C. Kirk.

[We are glad to print Dr. Kirk's letter, and we admit the force of her point that we often tend to recall the past too much. However, we have the New Testament example of recalling the heroes of the past in Hebrews, chapter xi. Is it not a good model to follow? Every "visual aid" has disadvantages, but the old-fashioned method was a new technique once!]

Dear Friend,

I have been greatly interested in reading for some time past your paper "The Catholic" which I receive through the generosity of the Hope Trust.

Your article on the Luther Film in the May issue and comments on it in the June issue have emboldened me to write you concerning very severe criticisms of Martin Luther which appear in Arnold Lunn's book, "The Revolt against Reason," which I obtained from our local free library.

There is much in this book that I think is very good and although I take it that he is a Roman Catholic he speaks very kindly of a number of Protestant authors and teachers. He attacks Darwinism forcefully and speaks well of the late Douglas Dewar of The Evolution Protest Movement.

Of course I was aware that Luther has been regarded as an immoral man by R.C.'s, but I thought that was only because that he and many other priests and monks who had left the Church had entered on the married state. But in chapter 6 of his book Lunn brings serious charges against Luther and the worst are in a note at the end of the book, which is headed "The Inexplicable Blasphemy." Some terrible statements purporting to come from Luther's "Table Talk" are given. I have not come across any review of Lunn's book nor do I know if any answer has been published. Could you, in your goodness, give me any guidance on these matters.

Although my own background has been Calvinistic rather than Lutheran I have always admired the great Reformer Luther, but the only works of his which I have read are the "Commentary on Galatians" and "The Bondage of the Will," both in English translations.

With all good wishes,

Yours in the grace of the Lord Jesus,
J. A. DICKINSON.

"The Fethard boycott."

To the Editor of "The Catholic."

Dear Sir,

Perhaps you would be good enough to publish the following (which the "Irish Times" failed to do.) and oblige.—J.L.D.

With reference to the above, might I be allowed to remind your readers that several prominent Irishmen, viz. Dan O'Connell, Chas. Gavin Duffy and Thomas Davis have expressed themselves as follows.

O'Connell said "That man is a tyrant who interferes between the conscience of his brother man and his God. All he wanted was liberty of conscience. That religion should be left between man and his Creator and that conscience should be free."

Chas. Gavin Duffy said "A man must walk by the light of his own conscience and judgment in the last resort."

Davis maintained "that a man has as good a right to change from Catholicism to Protestantism as from Protestantism to Catholicism."

Dear Editor,

I am wondering if you will be good enough to allow me to appeal to the women readers of "The Catholic."?

I am an invalid and have to earn my living at home. I supplement my disability pension by making doll's clothes and furnishings, patchwork quilts and cushions, etc., and miscellaneous small items.

I am now at my wits end for further supplies of "raw materials," i.e., scraps and remnants, having exhausted my own and friends'.

I would be so thankful for any valueless scraps and oddments of any kind, however small—bits of leather (old bags, belts, odd gloves, etc.), fur, fur fabric, plastic, discarded straw & felt hats, stockings, clothing, wool oddments, beads and buttons, broken jewelry and trinkets of all sorts, used cosmetic containers, small fancy boxes, jars, tins and bottles, old needlework, dolls, (broken or whole), magazines, or other books with patterns, paper patterns, transfers and knitting leaflets,—in fact, anything at all.

I would, of course, gladly refund postage.

Please help me to continue my small business by giving my appeal publicity in your columns.

Thanking you very much,

Yours sincerely,

WAYS OF READING YOUR BIBLE

by D. R. DAVIES

"The best way to help a later generation is to tell the truth to your own generation."

The name of Peter Taylor Forsyth is one that I frequently mention in these pages. He is one of the few British theologians of this century of colossal stature and prophetic character. He is one of those very rare theologians whose vindication requires both time and events. And this is what precisely history has done, and done completely. It has taken the collapse of social systems, atomic fission and resurgent barbarism for the Church to understand what Forsyth was talking about. Today, Forsyth stands a veritable Matterhorn among the theologians of the twentieth century.

I do not allow any length of time to elapse without re-reading Forsyth, who is more relevant today to our situation than when he was turning out his epochal books forty years ago, which only a very tiny minority read at that time. I used to read Forsyth forty years ago but without understanding him. I had to be churned into mincemeat, broken to bits, and re-created, born again, before I could understand him. The key to Forsyth is new birth.

What Did The Bible Say?

The other day I was re-reading for the umpteenth time Forsyth's marvellous book on the death of Christ and its atoning significance—among the first four books on atonement, "The Work of Christ." Have you read it? Take a month's holiday, and go to some lonely place with this one and only book. You'll come back a different being.

As I turned over the pages I came across a passage on the Bible, which I had forgotten. How could I have forgotten it? But I had. Here it is, and please be grateful to me for quoting it.

"Supposing, then, we return to the Bible. Supposing the Church did—as I think it must do if it is not going to collapse . . . supposing we return to the Bible, there are three ways of reading the Bible. The first way asks, What did the Bible say? The second way asks, What can I make the Bible say? The third way asks, What does God say in the Bible?" ("The Work of Christ, p. 37). The Bible will have a lot more to say to us if we can learn to read it in these three distinct ways.

Now in order to discover what the Bible said, we must obviously get to know something at least of the historical circumstances and situation in which the Bible was written, and to which it was addressed. This is what this question means. Let me very briefly give two examples of what this implies.

(1) In Isaiah 31, we read: "Woe to them that go down to Egypt for help; and stay on horses and trust in chariots, because they are many, and in horsemen because they are very strong; but they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, neither seek the Lord . . . Now the Egyptians are men not God, and their horses flesh, not spirit . . ." What did Isaiah mean when he wrote these words? What did he have in mind? And whom did he have in mind?

It is obvious, surely, that he did not have Colonel Nasser in mind. He wasn't thinking of the Suez Canal and the conflict over the oil of the middle East. This does not mean that these words cannot have any application at all to the Egypt of today. They may have. But it does mean that when he wrote these words, it was not of the Egypt of 1957 A.D. that Isaiah was thinking. He was thinking of the Egypt of his own time, which was a strong imperial power. So in order to learn what Isaiah meant by these words, we have to get to know the situation that Isaiah and the nation were facing at that time. When we know that, then we can learn what the Bible said at that time.

Necessity of Research

Here then is the argument for Biblical research and scholarship, for all that tremendous investigation into history, for all that vast labour of examination of, and comparison of, documents which devoted scholars and theologians have been carrying on ever since the Reformation. It has enabled the Church to get to know what the Bible said. It is a work which has been inspired by none other than the Holy Ghost Himself.

(2) The same thing applies also to the New Testament. When Paul wrote his epistles, he didn't have the divided state of the Churches in 1957 in mind. As far as the future was concerned, Paul didn't look very far ahead, because he expected the world to end very soon, perhaps before he himself died. What he was concerned with was his own contemporary situation and its problems. In Corinth, for instance, there was an intense controversy being carried on by the Church about "meat for idols."

One of the customs of the Roman world in New Testament times was to sacrifice beasts and birds in the pagan temples. After these had been killed and placed upon the altars, their flesh was then sold in the butchers' shops of the cities. Was a member of the Church justified in buying such meat? Was he committing a sin in eating that meat? These were the questions that were put to St. Paul. And these (and similar) questions were the ones he had to answer. In answering them, St. Paul said many things that would apply to entirely different situations in much later times. But Paul wasn't thinking of those later times, but of his own particular time. And this proves one thing: that the best way to help a later generation is to tell the truth to your own generation.

Proof of Inspiration

The second way of reading the Bible is to ask—"What can I make the Bible say?" Let me quote Forsyth once more.

"The second way of reading the Bible is reading it unto edification. That is to say, we read a passage, and we allow ourselves to receive any suggestions that may come to us from it, and we do not stop to ask whether that was in the writer's mind, or whether it was in the mind of the people to whom he wrote. That is immaterial. We allow the Spirit of God to suggest to us whatever lessons or ideas He thinks fit out of the words that are under our eyes. We read the Bible not for correct or historical knowledge, but for religious and spiritual purposes, for our own private and personal needs. That is, of course, a perfectly legitimate thing—indeed, it is quite necessary. It is the way of reading the Bible which the large mass of the Church must always practise. But it has its dangers. You need the other ways to correct it." ("The Work of Christ," p. 39).

One of the many, many proofs of the divine inspiration of the scriptures is that the Bible lends itself to this way of reading: that words that were written centuries ago to a situation that has passed away can become the medium of truth in a situation entirely different. No other book lends itself to this way of reading.

I can still see my mother, who was known by her friends and neighbours as "a mother in Israel," reading her Bible at six o'clock of a winter's morning, when I used to come home after my night's work in the pit. With her cheap and utterly unscientific spectacles well down her nose, she pored over the sacred and shattering pages of the Book. As she prepared my breakfast (she never neglected to get me my breakfast in her Bible-reading) she would tell me what she had been reading, and apply it to me, or herself, or some immediate problem. She derived hope and wisdom and physical energy from her Bible-reading—yes, even physical energy. She was reading the Bible in Forsyth's second way! And my word! It was some reading, believe me.

What does God say in the Bible?

The third way of reading the Bible is a way about which no rule whatsoever can be formulated. It just happens. It is wrapped up in the mystery which surrounds every operation of the Holy Ghost in the hearts of men and women. You are reading the Bible, perhaps, with no specific purpose. Or perhaps you are reading the Bible with the idea, say, of preparing an address or a sermon. And suddenly you are bowled over, flattened out, with some thought, an emotion, an instantaneous vision, insight or understanding. Something suddenly, without any rhyme or reason, without any preparation or forethought grips you, chokes you almost. How that comes you just simply cannot explain. But of one thing only are you certain: that when it comes, you know that it is a moment of revelation. You can no more question it or argue with it or doubt it than you doubt the fire which has burnt your hand. That is God speaking to you direct!

That is what Martin Luther felt one day in his monk's cell, after months of wrestling and despair, when he read the supreme words—"and the just shall live by faith." Whoosh! Luther knew! The thing that gripped him in that moment shook Europe to its foundations. It tore a rent in the Church of Rome, and awakened dead souls to new life. When God speaks to man in the Bible, nothing is safe—absolutely nothing. So, be careful!

Well! There you are. From this mighty Matterhorn of a theologian, Peter Taylor Forsyth, whose body has dissolved into dust, comes this guidance to us in the reading of the Bible. It is counsel that is loaded with dynamite. So—beware. You may decide to ignore it. But, in the name of God, think of what you will miss.

ISRAEL'S PLACE IN HUMAN HISTORY

Israel's Contribution

The Divine call that came to Abraham, to leave his house and country, and his spontaneous response to the call was an act of unsurpassed obedience and faith. He accepted the promises made to him, and went out, by faith, not knowing whither he was going. Heb. xi. 8. The initial step having been taken, there followed a series of experiences, increase in wealth and power. Then came the unveiling of the Divine purpose in the call of Abraham, the revelation of the covenant that was destined to affect the whole human race. The terms of the covenant—Abraham's seed, culminating in the Messiah, and the provision for Abraham's posterity, the promise of the land for an everlasting possession. The latter part of the covenant is current history, and the whole world is made strangely aware of events in that land at the present time. In the experience of Abraham, the supernatural is the chief factor. His call and conversion, justification and sanctification recorded in Gen. xii-xvii. The birth of Isaac and so named of God before he was born. The birth apart from miracle is incapable of explanation. The successors to the covenant are also noteworthy. The choice is Isaac and not Ishmael, Gen. xvii. 18-19. Jacob and not Esau. Mal. i. 2-3.

1. The Removal to Egypt. Gen. xvi. 1. The time came when the promise of chastisement for Abraham's doubt, Gen. xv. 7-13 was to become a practical experience, and Israel was sent to Egypt. Israel the father of the race went down to Egypt with fear and a strong premonition of trouble of trouble to come. Gen. xvi. 3. So far the Divine dealing was with the individual, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, now it is transferred to the family. Israel's family numbered seventy souls that went down to Egypt. Gen. xvi. 27. Presently it passed from the family to the nation. During the four hundred and thirty years of their sojourn in Egypt, Ex. xii. 40-41, they were Divinely protected and abundantly increased, until the time of the birth of Moses, they had "waxed exceeding mighty and the land was filled with them." Ex. i. 7.

2. The Redemption from bondage Ex. i-xvii.

(a) The persecution of the people. Pharaoh that knew not Joseph sought to destroy the people by murdering all the male infants. Israel was made to serve with great severity and their lives were made bitter to them with hard bondage. This very persecution kept them together and kept them from assimilation, reminded them that they were "in a land not their own."

(b) The preparation of a Mediator. In spite of the fiery furnace of affliction there was the watchful care of Jehovah God, and amid the destruction of the male children, one was preserved alive to be God's messenger to Israel. The birth, training, and commission of Moses fitted him to be Israel's deliverer; Ex. ii-iv.

In the commissioning of Moses, we have not only the Divine revelation in the burning bush, but also the declaration of God's omniscience. He declared to Moses—I am the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob: I have surely seen the affliction of my people: I have heard their cry: I know their sorrow: I am come down to deliver them: Ex. iii. 6-9. Moses is a grand type of the Lord Jesus as Saviour and Mediator. Israel and Egypt a type of the church and the world.

(c) The plan and progress of redemption. Ex. v.-xii. Though this passage sets forth the progress of Israel's redemption, it is at the same time a section full of spiritual significance for us, wherein is revealed that the battle between Moses and Pharaoh was, in reality, a conflict between God and the power of darkness. The struggle ends in victory, on the Lord's side, and the triumph of His people. There were three elements in the progress of redemption—the manifest power of Jehovah God, the token of salvation, the sprinkling of the blood; the complete destruction of the enemy.

(d) The Pilgrimage to Sinai. During the two months which it took Israel to reach Mount Horeb, God revealed Himself to His people as equal to their every need, meeting every contingency, providing, supplying and saving. Horeb was the site of their constitution. Here God constituted Israel as a nation and a people of Divine purpose. The constitution of such magnitude is in itself surprisingly brief. "If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation." Ex. xix. 5-6. This is not a constitution that Israel formulated but given by Divine order, and as the covenant remains indestructible so does the constitution remain indissoluble—I.E.D.

in Brazil to found a colony. Thus they hoped to escape persecution such as they had endured in their homeland. Through the years, however, Protestants were persecuted here also.

Since 1859, when the Presbyterian Church was founded on the arrival of Ashbel Green Simonton from the United States, they have enjoyed more freedom.

Writing about the anniversary for the secular newspaper "Folha de Manha," Prof. Flaminio Favero of the University of Sao Paulo declared that the strong Brazilian Protestantism of today owes much to the humble beginnings represented by the French settlement of 1557.

As a conservative Protestant, Favero opposes union of the churches, fearing that it would quench the enthusiasm and the "commendable emulation" that inspires the several sects. But he urges co-operation among the various Protestant groups to the end that they may contribute more effectively to the "moral greatness of Brazil, which is more important than material greatness."

Next year the Presbyterian Church of Brazil and the Independent Presbyterian Church will celebrate the centennial of the founding of Presbyterianism here by Mr. Simonton. As part of the celebration, the two groups which stem from that event will study the possibility of reunion.—"Ulster Protestant," Aug., 1957.

Roman Scholar-Monk Joins the Church of England.

Mr. Amand de Mendieta, one of the leading scholar-priests of the Roman Catholic Church and for twenty-one years a Benedictine monk, has been accepted as an Anglican clergyman, and is now undergoing a course of instruction at St. Augustine's College, Canterbury. He will shortly be licensed as a priest in the Church of England.

Mr. de Mendieta holds the degrees of Doctor of Philosophy and of Letters from Louvain University. His work on the early Fathers gradually led to his conviction that he could not accept certain teaching of the Roman Catholic Church, including "the universal and absolute supremacy of the Pope over the bishops, priests, churches and Roman Catholics of the world; the personal infallibility of the Pope; the adulation of the Pope, and the insidious increase of the cult of the Virgin Mary—on which the Church of Rome is gradually becoming based, rather than on the fact of Christ."

Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, has elected him to the S. A. Cook bye-fellowship, which will enable him to continue his researches at Cambridge for three years. An eminent textual scholar, he is one of the world's greatest authorities on St. Basil and at Louvain was one of the editors of the "Revue d'histoire Ecclesiastique."

Dr. W. H. C. Frend, the Church historian, who is a Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, says, "Mr. de Mendieta's coming into the Church of England has filled a gap in Anglican scholarship for which we are truly grateful."

On this subject of variety, I, for one, am glad that many and varied are the rivulets that are now feeding the Church's theological colleges. He is reading at St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, and is going to Cambridge. He is a Doctor of Philosophy and of Letters of Louvain University.

Evangelicals in Spain.

Reports in Spain state that in some areas the Roman Catholic authorities are trying to hinder the effective application of the recent Government decree permitting civil marriage to Spaniards who can prove that they have ceased to be professing Roman Catholics. One Evangelical pastor writes: "There are still some places, especially in Madrid, where the Catholic hierarchy is fiercely opposed to the civil marriage of those who have been baptized in the (Roman) Catholic Church. In other places the judges try to put as many hindrances as possible. It is taking two months for a couple in my Church to get married." In Britain, Roman Catholic leaders usually refer to Protestants in the most friendly terms. Instead of being denounced as "heretics," we are described as "our separated brethren." We suggest that the Roman hierarchy would provide even more convincing proof of their regard for us if they would call upon their co-religionists in Spain and Colombia to cease their persecution of those who have embraced the Reformed Faith.

Church of Ireland Bishop's Answer to Most Rev. Dr. Philbin—The Bishop of Kilmore, Rt. Rev. Dr. Tyndall.

Dr. Tyndall referred to a statement by the Bishop of Clonfert, the Most Rev. Dr. Philbin, when he said: "It seemed necessary to point out that a concerted effort was being made by the religious minority to secure a dominating position in our public life. One has only to read a succession of statements from their spokesmen to see that this was true."

I have an uncomfortable feeling," said Dr. Tyndall, "that I am one of these spokesmen, but I cannot think of many others. On one or two public occasions during the last year I have exhorted our Church people, particularly those of the Unionist tradition, to think of this country as their own and to lend their gifts to various civic enterprises. At Tara recently I referred to the need of unity of ideals amongst Christian people and a new dedication to the country, so that the insidious infiltration of a Communist materialism might be met. One or two other bishops, including the Archbishop of Dublin and a prominent Methodist leader, have voiced much the same sentiment, but there is no conspiracy. There is no intention of undermining 'Catholic social principles,' and there is not the faintest idea of 'recalling the long Protestant ascendancy.' On the other hand, there is a longing to find a principle of unity between the different sections of the community and a desire to serve.

"I feel strongly on this point and I shall continue on every possible occasion, despite the suspicions of Dr. Philbin and others, to try to teach Protestant Irishmen that they are not resident aliens but citizens.—"Irish Times."

Will Brazil Become Protestant?

Roman Catholic Bishop Agnello Rossi said recently that the rapid growth of Protestantism in this country is viewed with "serious apprehension" by the Brazilian hierarchy. Considered a "specialist" on Protestantism, about which he has written several quite objective books, Bishop Rossi warned that if the present trend continues, Brazil ("the greatest Catholic country in the world") may find itself within a few decades "a great Protestant country." He urged the nation's Catholics to stir themselves to stop the march of the Protestant "heresy." Since Bishop Rossi is acknowledged as an expert on Protestantism in this country, some of the figures he gives are interesting. In 1954, he says, Brazil had 2 million Protestants, but to-day, because of "proselytising activities," it would not be an exaggeration to say that between 4 and 5 million Brazilians are "under Protestant influence, directly or indirectly." In no other country in the world, Bishop Rossi declared, has Protestantism made such advances in the past 20 years. Its churches have become autonomous and national, and are now sending their own missionaries to Bolivia, Paraguay, and Portugal.—"Christian Century."

Girls at 12 may marry in Republic.

A suggestion that it was time the law in the Republic relating to legal marriage age was changed to bring it into line with Britain and Northern Ireland, was made by the Rev. Canon R. W. Heavener, rector of Monaghan, when he proposed the adoption of the Moral Welfare Report at the Clogher Diocesan Synod in Clones.

The Moral Welfare Society, he said, was pressing to have the legal age raised from the present figures of 14 years for a boy and 12 years for a girl.

Canon Heavener said that he regretted to say that the report opened with a complaint that not enough support has been given to the work in this diocese. It noted with apprehension a decrease of almost £24 in the total amount contributed by the parishes and he wanted to point out straight away that he considered this association was doing a splendid and necessary work and deserved the whole-hearted support of every parish in the diocese.

Adoption Orders.

"This report," he continued, "quotes some of the facts from the Northern Ireland annual report: 'Of 129 new cases dealt with during the past year, 85 were expectant mothers of first babies, 13 were mothers and babies with no plans or prospects, five were mothers of more than one child, and three were married women with children born out of wedlock,' and in the analysis of the year's work of the Southern Branch of the Moral Welfare Association there is shown the increasing youth of those in difficulties. Of the unmarried mothers, 10 were under 19 years of age, five were 17 years, two were 16, and two were 14. A total of 139 cases were dealt with during the year. Of the children, 25 were placed for adoption,

THE LAND OF ISRAEL.

"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them: and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose." Isa. xxxv. 1.

Palestine was a wild desert till within our living memory, as is Syria and Transjordan to this day. Though the Turks were in possession of that area for four hundred years, till the first world war, they were not interested in it and made nothing of it, though there is great potential wealth there. To-day there is a scramble for the Middle East, because of its wealth and raw materials. Palestine is only a small part of the area. But Palestine is being developed by the Jews, whilst the lazy Arab has neither the brains nor the means of developing those vast areas outside Palestine.

The Negeve—This is the name of Southern Judea, and has for its border, Egypt on one side and Jordan on the other side, and touches at the southernmost point, almost in a narrow strip, the Red Sea. Here begins the Gulf of Akaba. Within the last six years, great development of the land was carried out. Literally hundreds of towns and villages were brought into being, and at Eilat, the ancient Ezion-geber, of the days of King Solomon (I Kings ix. 26). There is a five year plan, for the Negeve being prepared, to settle in this area another one hundred thousand Jews. It is intended that the mining and processing industries should provide the means of livelihood for fifty thousand people, the other fifty thousand to be engaged in agriculture and other vocations.

It is estimated that peanuts will yield, this year, 2,200 tons. Eleven hundred acres are under vine plantation. Five hundred acres are fruit bearing, the probable yield this year is estimated at 1,700 tons. 600 acres have been set aside for orange groves.

This desert area that has been brought to life within seven or eight years, seems to be rich in oil. There was great excitement in Jerusalem, at the announcement on the 8th of June last, of the discovery of new oil deposits at Bror Hayil, in the northern area of the Negeve, about ten miles north of the Gaza strip. The discovery was made after two months drilling, at a depth of five thousand feet. Two miles southward is Heletz. A couple of years ago, oil was found in this area. Sixteen wells are producing seventy thousand tons of oil per annum.

The Hula Basin—in the north eastern corner of Israel, is a narrow triangular valley of approximately forty-five thousand acres of land, in which three streams merge to form the River Jordan. The southern part of the valley, about seven thousand acres was marsh land, swamps infested with mosquitos and malaria. The shallow Lake Hula, a long mud-pond, covers another three thousand five hundred acres. The reclamation of fifteen thousand acres of potentially fertile farm land here, had been planned for many years. In 1934, the Palestine Land Development Company, acquired from the British Mandatory Government, the concession of draining the swamp and lake. Work on the project was interrupted by the disturbed political conditions of the country, so that the main development was only undertaken in the fall of 1950. This was the widening and deepening of the Jordan, south of the Lake Hula, and which lowered the level of the lake, and required the excavation of some 500,000 cubic metres of earth and rock.

In 1951, Syria interfered with the work and invaded the demilitarized zone between Syria and Israel. The matter had to be brought to the Security Council of U.N. Syria's attempted interference was abortive, the Council upheld Israel's rights. The drainage of Lake Hula has successfully continued, and is now nearing completion. What was once festering swamp has become fertile farm land, and thousands of people will make their home in this area.—"Immanuel's Witness," Sept., '57.

THE DEITY OF CHRIST.

By C. F. Hogg.

Before we consider the teaching of the New Testament concerning the Deity of Christ it may be well to attempt to define certain limitations and conditions that call for recognition.

I. Arguments are of two kinds, cumulative and consecutive. In the latter the strength of the chain is the strength of its weakest link, that and no more; in the former the weakness of any part does not invalidate the rest. The arguments for the Deity of Christ are of the cumulative order if one should prove defective the value of the others is not thereby impaired.

II. Different subjects demand different treatment. The methods appropriate to chemistry, for example, are not applicable to geology. So is it also with Christianity. The Deity of Christ, like His resurrection and the divine inspiration of Scripture, cannot be demonstrated in a way analogous to that by which it can be shown that water is composed of oxygen and hydrogen organically combined, or that the angles of any triangle together equal two right angles. What is meant by the proof of a doctrine is the evidence that it is taught in some part of Scripture, and that it is agreeable to all Scripture.

III. Not all questions that can be asked can be answered. How can God be Trinity in Unity? is only one of these. How can God be at all? How can I, that ask the question, be? These are questions equally unanswerable. Life on the lowest plane is full of mystery. How much more must this be the case on the higher planes of mind and spirit? Electricity, e.g., is the most potent force known to man, who does not ignore it because its "what?" and "how?" remain hidden behind a veil impenetrable to his intelligence.

IV. The evidential value of subjective experiences is nil; therefore the Christian is to be ready to give a reason to every man that asks him for the ground of his hope in God, see 1 Peter iii. 15. Moreover, for his own sake, he is to "try the spirits," and to "prove all (teachings)." See 1 Thess. v. 21, and 1 John iv. 1.

V. The finite mind labours in vain to comprehend the infinite. Hence the wisdom of the ignorant is to say, "I do not know." There is an old rule to the effect that what we do not know must not be permitted to weaken our hold upon what we do know. Convictions, not doubts, should rule the mind.

VI. Moreover, the Scriptures do not provide material for the construction of a complete doctrine of the Person of Christ even if the task lay within human power, as it does not, see Matt. xi. 27. But Scripture does contain sufficient to preserve us from such thoughts about Christ as would prevent us honouring the Son even as we honour the Father, see John v. 23.

VII God is not concerned to prove Himself to those who are willingly ignorant of Him, see Rom. i. 28.. He is willing to reveal Himself to all who desire to acquaint themselves with Him. see John xiv. 9. To know the Son is to know the Father; to deny the Son is to deny the Father also, that is to deny God (see 1 John ii. 22, 23).

VIII. Knowledge of the Son of God is a matter of individual experience; the doctrine of the Deity of the Lord Jesus is a matter of theology. A man may be a good theologian without being a Christian in the vital sense of the term; a man may be a good Christian, knowing Christ and adorning His doctrine, and yet be a poor theologian.

IX. What may be proved is that, according to the records of His words contained in the Four Gospels, the Lord Jesus claimed to be God, and that, according to the rest of the New Testament, His true, full, and essential Deity was taught by the apostles, and held by the primitive churches.

X. The claim of the Lord Jesus to be divine in the unique sense was rather implied than asserted. He did not so much speak of His Deity as exhibit it in His ways and in His words, in what He did, and in what He suffered. Hence men are called upon not so much to acknowledge a claim as to recognise a fact, "Dost thou not know Me?"

XI. "Trinity" is a non-scriptural term, but the idea that lies behind it is not unscriptural. God is One (see Mark xii. 29, et al.), yet the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Spirit is God. At present we are concerned only with the second of these, who is described as "the Mystery of God—Christ" (see Col. ii. 2).

XII. A mystery is, in Scripture, a revealed secret; a matter that, lying beyond the range of investigation, has been made known by God.

XIII. These lines are written for confirmation, not for controversy. If any man willeth to do the will of God he shall know (see John vii. 17). There are things that come within the cognisance of the spiritual faculties only, and of these the man that has been "born anew" alone is in possession (see 1 Cor. ii. 14). But faith, while it moves on a plane above reason, is never unreasonable.

XIV. The argument of these lines will have weight only with those who acknowledge, at least, the historic credibility of the New Testament. The writer is convinced of the divine inspiration of these writings, that they are the word and the words—the logos and the rhémata—of God, but the lower claim is sufficient for his present purpose.

It is necessary now to describe briefly the religious pre-possessions of the Jews, "of whom is Christ as concerning the flesh." Through law-giver and prophet in past generations had been declared to them that Jehovah was not merely the One God of Israel, He was the One God in the universe. The gods of the nations were not gods at all. As a people they had been slow to assimilate this truth, but under the stern discipline of captivity and exile in idolatrous lands, and of the yoke of an idolatrous people in their own, it had at last burned itself deeply into their minds.

At the beginning of the Christian era, then, they were the only Monotheistic people on the earth, fanatically attached to this doctrine of the being of God, and ready to die rather than surrender their faith at the bidding of their Polytheistic conquerors, or for the sake of advantage among the nations within whose borders many of them dwelt.

That the Messiah of the Jews foretold in the Old Testament, was to be more than a mere delegate from God, that He was to be associated with God in a unique intimacy, is plain from the records. The "Arm of Jehovah," His "Servant," was the "Mighty God, the Father of Eternity," "whose goings forth are from of old, from ancient days" (Isa. ix. 6; liii. 1; Micah v. 2). These, and many such words as these, remained an enigma until they could be read in the light of the later revelation. "Of old time" God made His character known to men in His acts and in His Word; "at the end of these days" He revealed Himself in His Son.

The purpose of the coming of Christ was to bring men to God; the means He took for its accomplishment was to attract their attention to Himself, and so to associate Himself in His words and deeds with the Old Testament language concerning Jehovah that those who heard and observed Him became gradually conscious that He meant to identify Himself with God, while at the same time He called God His Father, so distinguishing Himself from God. The effect was as He intended. Friend and foe alike perceived the implications of His words and actions, the one with perplexed sympathy, the other with indignant hostility.

Turning now to the Four Gospels we find that the Lord Jesus:

1. Claimed to do what the Old Testament states Jehovah alone can do.
2. Actually did what the Old Testament states Jehovah alone can do.
3. Claimed to be what the Old Testament states Jehovah alone is.

THE STORY OF A PRIEST.

This is the story of the Rev. J. A. Fernandez, who after many years in the Roman Catholic faith became an evangelical Protestant. We wish to emphasise the description "evangelical Protestant" for there are, nowadays, many non-Roman Catholic sects which are loosely termed "Protestant," but which have little or no connection with traditional orthodox Protestantism. We may name a few of them to show what we have in mind—they are such sects as "Christian Science," "Mormonism," "Christadelphianism," "Millennial Dawnism," (alias "Jehovah's Witnesses"), "New Thoughtism," "Theosophy." It may incidentally be noted that these are all from the Western Hemisphere, from the United States of America, where among many faithful and beneficent spiritual developments there are luxuriating religious errors, and spiritual weeds of many sorts and contrasts.

If these are carelessly called Protestant then we must try to define our position as orthodox, scriptural, reformed, and hence we are bound to claim for ourselves the title and designation "Catholic," for in fact we hold to the ancient orthodox Trinitarian and Biblical faith against modern innovations on the one hand, and modern perversions on the other!

* * *

The Rev. J. A. Fernandez is a native of Spain. It is much to be regretted that former Roman Catholic clergymen who are Spanish by race find it so difficult to minister in their native land where the need of evangelical witness is great, but the conditions of today do not permit this, and the environment of Fr. Fernandez's career was not subject to his own choice. He spent his early years in Spain, and then went to the United States of America and in due course became a member of the Dominican Order in which he officiated as a priest in the State of Louisiana. For a number of years he had pastoral care of a parish in New Orleans, until changes in administration brought it about that Spanish Dominicans had to transfer their Louisiana parishes to American Dominicans.

Fr. Fernandez has not claimed to have been fanatical; rather, he found that his convictions in regard to certain dogmas of his Church were not too strong. He has specified the doctrine of Transubstantiation, and the power of priestly Absolution as main matters of doubt. This is what we would expect, for the more an intelligent man meditates on these, and on Transubstantiation in particular, the more difficult they must be to hold in any really lucid manner. If, in addition, note is taken of the spiritual sense of the New Testament, the difficulties become overwhelming.

* * *

When he became free from parochial duties he was able to resume the community life, and in his convent, he tells us, he was able to become acquainted with the tenets of evangelical Christianity. This may appear strange and may even sound improbable, but the explanation is that Fr. Fernandez had time to study Holy Scripture. In addition, he had the task of giving instruction in Church history. It does not strike us as in the least remarkable that closer acquaintance with Church history should have this result. Church history, honestly studied, is heavily in favour of moderate ecclesiastical claims and cool surveys of developments of doctrine.

Pursuing these lines Fr. Fernandez came to have increasing admiration for Luther, Calvin, and other reformers. No doubt he saw that they were not revolutionaries or atheists, but chiefly concerned to restore old Christianity to its freedom from the burdensome as well as misguided developments of a thousand years. Above all he recognised in them spiritual convictions and purposes which he knew to be faithful to the teaching of the New Testament.

* * *

By this time the Second World War had begun and the United States had entered into it. Fr. Fernandez had reached the point of decision, and the ideals of Western democracy had sunk deep into this son of Spain, so he left his convent and enlisted in the United States Army as a private soldier. The erstwhile soldier of St. Dominic was now a soldier in the armies which liberated the West from totalitarian tyranny.

Private Fernandez was not an evangelical Protestant as yet. In the course of his duties he was brought into contact with a chaplain who belonged to the Dutch Reformed Church in U.S.A. This led to his attending services conducted by the chaplain whose preaching he admired. As one of the Order of Preachers (to give the Dominicans their official title) he began to discuss a sermon with the chaplain, and they had recourse to the Greek Testament to settle a point in the text, James 2, 24—"By works a man is justified and not by faith only." This central issue of the Roman versus the Reformed faith led to further study and argument with the result of a firm friendship based on respect and growing agreement.

When demobilisation came the ex-Dominican had been for some time a member of the Presbyterian Church. He was given licence to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and in 1945 was admitted to the Presbyterian Ministry. He was installed in a congregation in Philadelphia, and began studies for a degree in Theology at Princeton.

The Rev. J. A. Fernandez is an instance of the invigorating and liberalising influences of American democracy, as well as of the converting and illuminating grace of God. He is but one of many hundreds of Roman Catholic clergymen in the United States who have in recent years entered the ministry of reformed churches. They are numerous in the ranks of the Protestant Episcopal Church in U.S.A. as well as in Presbyterian churches.

EDITOR'S CHAIR

I. UNITY.

The following is an extract from "The Dublin Evening Mail" of 16th Sept. 1957. Probably the Rt. Revd. C. Cowderoy's words have been reported more fully in the Roman Catholic papers though they contain nothing new, only tiresome reiteration.

Issue In Church Unity.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Southwark, Right Rev. C. Cowderoy, speaking at a pilgrimage to Canterbury, referred to the unity of the Church, and said: "The only thought of re-union which is logically possible is a return to the obedience and unity of the Catholic Church."

To substitute for the "visible organic unity of the Church, this ridiculous notion of an inter-denominational Christian fellowship in which all agree to shut their eyes, if they can, to their fundamental differences, is to confuse the issue, and give cause for rejoicing to the enemies of God," he said.

"For such fellowship, whatever else it may be, is a mockery of ecclesiastical unity."

The Churchman who does not apologise for the Reformation, or belittle it, knows Rome's terms of Reunion, and knows that he would falsify four hundred years of history as well as the teaching of primitive Christianity and the New Testament if he assented to them.

We do not share the delusion of some that

Rome will give up her claims, or modify her beliefs and practices, in order to accommodate us. Rome as a church and system must remain as she is, or cease to be Rome. When people talk hopefully about reunion with Rome they are out of touch with reality. If a reformed church were to unite with Rome, be it a Lutheran or an Anglican or a Presbyterian Church, it would have to abandon all testimony, condemn its historic career as a false witness to Christianity, and believe all that is prescribed at this present hour for all Roman Catholics. The Church of Rome is not coming over to us. No sign, not even the faintest indication of one, exists to point to anything different.

When non-Romans talk about Reunion and about "keeping the door open for Rome" they are, in effect, maintaining an ideological barrier against any union among Protestants. We do not say that that is their object: but it is a necessary consequence.

Dr. Cowderoy is so far right then in his statement that reunion is "return to the obedience and unity of the (Roman) Catholic Church."

We of course consider this as evidence of the wrongness of the Roman position. Rome has long deserted the true obedience and the true unity of the true Catholic Church. As a Church she is authoritarian rather than fraternal. She has added much to the ancient Catholic faith. She has been persecuting, not loving. Beliefs which are manifestly wrong when tested by the sole Rule of Faith, the New Testament, are imposed on all as terms of communion, whereas the true obedience of the true Catholic Church requires Scripture as the standard of faith: not late tradition or no tradition at all.

The true unity of the Church is unity in Christ as the Head—"All one in Christ Jesus" is the Christian concept of unity. New Testament and ancient apostolic unity knew nothing of a hierarchical organisation or papal supremacy. Spiritual and inner unity is the only unity which can justify exterior co-ordination or even co-operation.. Agreement in truth is not irrelevant to unity either.

* * *

On the latter part of Dr. Cowderoy's statement we say this that "the ridiculous notion" he expounds has never existed anywhere. It is his fancy, not ours, or the World Council of Churches'!

Far from merely "shutting our eyes to fundamental differences" the ideal of the ecumenical movement is to open the eye of all professing Christians to fundamental agreements. The ecumenical movement is not bonded by negations, but by its affirmations. It has abundant faults and may even show the failings which have marked the career of Rome—personal ambitions, manoeuvrings for power etc., but we must look to the good within it, and to the ideal of Christian brotherhood and understanding it upholds.

So far it has not been the case that fellowship among Protestants and Orthodox "gives cause for rejoicing to the enemies of God"—rather the reverse. Phrases such as "the enemies of God" sound very well, but what persons and organisation are intended? The enemies of God cannot rejoice in the growing effectiveness of non-Roman Catholic Christian witness throughout the World. By enemies we may understand Atheists, Communists, deliberate and obstinate sinners. We believe that the combining of Christian witness is more likely to win over God's enemies than to multiply them.

* * *

In the fellowship where men can meet and talk and pray and think together (in which Rome will never join, being fettered by her past) there may be an absence of "ecclesiastical unity," but there is the prospect of a more important unity—the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

* * *

Someone may say "Why is there all this talk in ecumenical circles about being ready to welcome the Pope if he comes and giving him the chairmanship?" We ourselves think this sort of talk is rather ingenuous and perhaps a little too hearty, but we see behind it the fact that if the Bishop of Rome came it would show that he had given up the inadmissible claims and errors which now keep him aloof. We are ready to meet him, not on his terms, but on Christ's.

II. PROSELYTISM.

The word "proselytism" and its cognates have an ill sound in Ireland. They are "pejorative" (to use a modern vulgarity). The simplest way to put it is to say that Protestants try to proselytise, whereas Roman Catholics do not. Proselytism is associated in the common mind with inducement of a material sort, and it is generally implied that an element of bribery exists. A Protestant who tries to enlighten Roman Catholics may very likely be called a "souper," i.e. one who took advantage, in famine times, of the hunger of the people, and offered food if they would change their religion.

We have never known the practice, but we have often met Roman Catholics who professed readiness to become Protestants if we "made it worth their while." These obliging but worthless persons are generally given a wide berth.

But we should say this, that when we look back on the famine times a hundred years ago we must feel that any man who preached Christ's gospel to starving people and who could feed the hungry and clothe the naked, and would not do it, was not doing what Christ teaches us to do. The fact is of course that the Gospel is no peculiarly Protestant invention it is God's good news, and everybody is entitled to hear it. It is not Protestant or Roman Catholic, but Christian.

* * *

Those days are long past, but the gospel is still preached in Ireland to all who are willing to hear it; and as the gospel is nineteen hundred years old, and "Protestantism" only four hundred years old, the gospel cannot be a novelty, except to those who have never heard it.

* * *

Nowadays the Roman Catholic Church says plainly that she wants to convert all Protestants to her view. It has been plainly stated that this is her policy in England and in America. She has not been so open in Ireland. Irish Protestants (unless contemplating a "mixed" marriage) do not generally change their religion. Some do yield to the seduction of exotic and alien sects, but in the main we continue in our ancestral creeds. The Roman Catholic Church has not made any very sustained efforts to convert the Irish Protestant, though her lay agents (Legion of Mary and the like) often make overtures. But of late a certain effort has been made even if it is a rather diffident one.

* * *

What sort of effort? Sometimes a day's outing is advertised. The curious have been invited to travel from Dublin to Co. Cavan, sixty miles or so, on a Sunday bus excursion to be present at Mass, to be entertained and lectured. Sometimes a similar day's outing has been arranged in a Dublin suburb. A report of one such affair came to our notice in one of the papers, and from it we gather that the Protestant who accepted the invitation found himself almost the only Protestant present, so this sort of procedure was not, on that occasion, very successful.

Protestant attempts at "proselytism" never rise to this level of organisation. The Protestant declares the truths of the Gospel, and all are welcome to listen, whether at an open-air meeting or in a Church or hall, or by personal contact, but the generous hospitality now practised by some Roman Catholic groups is not to be found in the Church of Ireland or among the Presbyterians—"the soup," so to speak "is on the other foot" to-day.

* * *

We have noticed an advertisement in a Dublin paper to the effect that during the autumn months weekly talks are to be given by a Roman Catholic priest "for those who are not members of the Catholic Church but who wish to know what it teaches." The subjects are—

What God revealed: how we know.
Sin, Redemption, God's plan.
Jesus Christ, who is He?
Jesus Christ founds the Christian Church.
Growth and life of the Church.
The Sacraments.
The Eucharist—the Mass.
The Eucharist—Christ really present.
Confession.
The Catholic Church and Marriage.
The Pope—what is Infallibility?
The Reformation—The Catholic view.
Death and after?
Are Catholics reasonable about the Virgin Mary.
Summing up.

Readers of this paper know that nearly all these matters have been discussed in recent years in our pages, but of course our view of these questions is not the view to be expounded at Westland Row, Dublin during the next three months. It is announced that "the talks are non-controversial" which we take to mean that argument will not be possible. It is, however, reasonable enough when the talks are intended to give information, but how differently the evangelical Churchman explains the great truths of redemption and of the Christian life. We have not scope at the moment to go into these questions, but we believe that a useful work would be done if our readers for their own edification, would ponder these things, and examine God's word, the Scriptures, to see what it teaches about them. Strengthened with such knowledge each of us may be able to give a good account of our faith, and be able to resist the various winds of doctrine which are blowing around us, and not only from Westland Row.

CHRIST PLEADS FOR US.

When Our Lord died for us on Calvary He spoke the words "It is finished". We know that they mean "It is accomplished," or "perfected," and we are right to believe that they refer to much more than the brief experience of earthly life now drawing to its appointed close. We believe those words meant that the object He came to achieve was then complete. That object was the redemption of His people. He became sin for us, that we might become righteous. He took away our sin by the sacrifice of Himself.

Our Lord on the Cross did not surrender His life in the hope that He might effect some good by dying. He yielded up the ghost in the certain knowledge that He had effected our Salvation for eternity. He could not fail; therefore He did not fail. Nowhere in the New Testament do we find redemption considered to be a possibility: nowhere is it thought to be a probability: everywhere it is accepted as a fact. It is an act of God in Christ about which there is nothing wanting—

"Glorious—more glorious—is the crown
"Of Him that brought salvation down,
"By sweetness called Thy Son:
"Thou that stupendous truth believed:—
"And now the matchless deed's achieved,
"Determined, Dared, and Done."

Christopher Smart who wrote these lines in his "A Song to David" realised the central truth of the Gospel, that the "matchless deed" is the victory of Christ on the Cross over sin and death.

* * *

But if there is finality, and full redemption in the Cross why do we use the phrase "Christ pleads for us"? Why do we think of Him as now engaged in a task which might be thought of as in some sense supplementary to His atoning work on Calvary? The answer must be, of course, that this is a lesson we are taught in the New Testament. It must harmonise with the lesson which teaches the full sufficiency of the Cross. In fact, it must be the same lesson, as we shall see.

* * *

It will be better to take our subject in an orderly manner, and treat it as a series of questions—

1. Where is Christ interceding?
2. For whom is He interceding?
3. On what ground is He interceding?
4. For what is He interceding?
5. Why is He interceding?

1. Where is Christ interceding?

We know something of Our Lord's intercession while He was on earth. He prayed in secret; on the mountain-side; in Gethsemane—now He prays elsewhere now—"It is Christ Jesus that died, yea, rather, that was raised from the dead, who is at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us" Rom. 8. 34. "Christ entered not into a holy place made with hands, like in pattern to the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God for us" Heb. 9. 24. The eighth and ninth chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews are quite clear in their emphasis that Our Lord now intercedes at the Father's throne in heaven. We should not think of Him as merely a suppliant before the throne, but as one on the right hand of power, dispensing, by virtue of His sacrifice, the everlasting mercy of God.

* * *

2. For whom is Christ interceding?

The words we have quoted from Hebrews, chapter 9 tell us that Christ now appears before the face of God "for us." "Us." must mean here, first, the writer of the epistle and the people to whom he wrote, and then secondly, the Christian community, or Christ's flock on earth. If this should be thought a very narrow statement, let it be remembered that the extent or limits of His flock must be unknown to us. We cannot define the significance of His words recorded by St. John—"Other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear My voice, and they shall become one flock, one shepherd" (John 10. 16).

But what we know with certainty is that He prays for His people—"He hath His priesthood unchangeable: wherefore He is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them" (Heb. 7. 25). "I pray not for the world, but for those whom Thou hast given Me" (John 17. 9). It may be said that this prayer, then offered in the days of His Flesh, has no bearing upon Our Lord's present intercession. In that case it becomes a prayer that the chosen disciples may be steadfast during the distresses and perplexities about to confront them. This is supported by the 12th verse which is explicit in its reference to the twelve apostles.

But the sense of the words "them that draw near unto God through Him" should not be diluted by sentimentality, nor expanded till it has lost meaning. Let us be content with what we are told, and delight in saying with John Newton—

"Saviour, if of Zion's city
"I through grace a member am,
"Let the world deride or pity,
"I will glory in Thy name."

That name is "Jesus" for "He shall save His people from their sins," (Matt. 1. 21).

3. On what ground is Christ interceding?

We turn to the seventeenth chapter of St. John and find in what is often called "Our Lord's high priestly prayer" a decisive statement which was spoken in anticipation of the consummation on the Cross—"I have glorified Thee on the earth, having accomplished the work which Thou hast given Me to do." We may recognise from this that the ground of Christ's heavenly intercession is the abiding fact of the work which He perfected on earth. The evidence of that accomplishment is the Precious Blood—"Christ having come a high priest of the good things to come . . . through His own blood entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption (Heb. 9. 11 & 12).

The vision of St. John "I saw in the midst of the throne a Lamb standing as though it had been slain"; and the song he heard sung in Heaven "Thou was slain and didst purchase unto God with Thy blood now of every tribe and tongue and people and nation" (Revelation 5, 6 and 9), point to the Precious Blood as the effective basis of the Redeemer's prayer, and it is the guarantee that the prayer is answered.

4. For what does Our Lord intercede?

The obvious reply is that He is asking for all the gifts and encouragements we need. We can say at once that the supreme gift is the Holy Spirit; and that He is not merely an encouragement, but the encourager, which is the sense of our A.V. word "the Comforter." The continuous outpouring of grace, and the call to the present enjoyment of communion with the Holy Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which is our glory now, must be considered elements in Our Lord's praying for us.

Everything that the Christian heart, reflecting upon the work of Christ and the truths of Holy Scripture, can legitimately gather, may be associated with Our Lord's pleading on our behalf.

All that the Church on earth needs for her wellbeing and for her warfare must form part of Christ's prayer, for the Church is His Bride, and He wills her perfection.

* * *

5. Why does Our Lord intercede?

No doubt we have already given much in the way of answer to this question, but there is far more in the question than man can answer, for ultimately the answer rests upon the nature and purposes of God, and upon the mysteries of Providence and Grace.

Still, we can be sure of some things and may believe that we would not be told about them if they were not necessary for us. We are certain that Christ prays for His people when they sin against Him—"These things I write unto you, that ye may not sin. And if any man sin we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the whole world," (1 John 2. 1 & 2).

The same epistle also tells us that we receive present cleansing from sin when we sincerely acknowledge and repent of our faults—"If we confess our sins He is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," (1 John 1. 9). It cannot be wrong to believe that Our Lord prays for our cleansing as well as for our forgiveness at the Father's hands.

We are invited to come boldly to the throne of grace that we may receive mercy (Heb. 4. 16). The mercy is already there, and is ours to receive. That is because Our Lord has sought it for us.

Further, Our Lord intercedes that we may have answers to our prayers. That is the meaning of His words in St. John 16, 23 and 24—"If ye shall ask anything of the Father He will give it you in My name."

Finally, He prays that we may have victory. "He is able to succour them that are tempted," (Heb. 2. 18). If He comes to our assistance the final victory is not in doubt.

* * *

It may be noticed that our New Testament references are principally to St. John and the Epistle to the Hebrews. Those who have allowed themselves to be impatient towards evangelical testimony have often protested that the evangelical view of experimental religion is based on St. Paul almost exclusively. They tend to suggest that the New Testament contains another sort of Christian faith which we may follow instead of Pauline views. It strikes us that what we have written here (thought not resting on what St. Paul says) may be fully paralleled in St. Paul's letters. That is what we should expect since we believe that Paul, John, and the author of Hebrews were enlightened and taught by the one Holy Spirit of God. Just as God "cannot deny Himself," so the Holy Spirit is unlikely to have taught one lesson to Paul, and a divergent one to John.

The heavenly work of Christ "who ever lives to make intercession for us" is a constant joy to contemplate, a perpetual strength to rest upon, and a guarantee that because He lives, we shall live also.

OBITUARY.

During this past summer we have suffered great loss through the deaths of two of our most senior members of the Connellan Mission Committee. It is with great sorrow that we record the passing of the Reverend Robert Weir, M.A., and the Rev. Richard Bird, M.A., D.S.O.

Mr. Weir, a native of Dublin, and a graduate of Trinity College was ordained in the Church of Ireland in 1914. After a brief period as assistant chaplain of the Mission Church, Dublin he worked for a spell with the Y.M.C.A. in France during the first World War. Later he was Rector of Mountrath, and then for many years was Rector of St. Matthew's parish in the City of Dublin. He retired a few years ago, but was deeply devoted to evangelical causes to the end.

Mr. Weir was a man of vision and perseverance. He worked with great diligence and success to secure justice for the large numbers of Southern Irish loyalists who suffered severely in the troubles in Ireland in the years preceding the Treaty of 1921. He also gave the most thorough attention to the problem of keeping young Church of Ireland farmers and farmers' sons on the land. Many hundreds of Church of Ireland country families owe their present well-being in their own land to Mr. Weir's efforts.

All through his ministry Mr. Weir was a friend of the Society for Irish Church Missions, which owed much to his independent and vigorous advocacy.

We, in the affairs of our paper and other concerns, found him constantly helpful and encouraging. His business abilities were most useful to us, but of course his great qualities lay in his open honest evangelical faith, in his loyalty to his Church, and, above all, in his deep spiritual convictions. All these were combined with a very lively and constructive attitude to all his interests.

As a parish clergyman Mr. Weir was devoted to the eternal interests of his flock, and also took much pains to advance the temporal concerns of all who sought his help. We cannot but record our own deep sense of loss, and at the same time our gratitude for many years of co-operation and friendship.

The Reverend Richard Bird was a native of Co. Cork, and one of a family which was closely identified with Church of Ireland matters in the South of Ireland. His father was outstanding for his insistence over long years that the Church should do all it could to get its young men in country districts to settle down to farming. It is good to record that his sons shared his concern for this important work and helped to develop it.

Mr. Bird and his brothers were deeply attached to the Church of Ireland, and gave it life-long service in various capacities. They were all staunch Protestants, and, what is of eternal consequence, were earnest Christians. Richard Bird, after graduating at Trinity College, spent some years in rural parishes and then became an Army Chaplain in the first World War. For his services he received the Distinguished Service Order. For some time he was a prisoner in German hands.

As a chaplain Mr. Bird was always a faithful and devoted pastor. This quality marked his ministry wherever he was. On demobilisation he returned to Ireland and succeeded the Rev. T. C. Hammond as Rector of St. Kevin's Church, Dublin. Mr. Hammond had resigned in order to become Chaplain of the Mission Church, Dublin and superintendent of Irish Church Missions. He is now Archdeacon in the diocese of Sydney, N.S.W.

After a long ministry in St. Kevin's, Mr. Bird became Rector of Delgany and Canon of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, from which office he retired a few years ago.

Like Mr. Weir, Canon Bird was always a great support to our work, and to many other evangelical causes. He was long interested in Irish Church Missions, the Church Education Society, the Church Mission to Jews, the Mission to the Deaf and Dumb etc. He never joined anything for the mere sake of joining, and always conscientiously laboured to promote any cause he became identified with. We knew him well for over thirty years, and always found that he put first things first. His innumerable acts of kindness and charity will long be remembered.

These two men, now gone into Heaven, have left precious memories behind them. Great numbers of friends all over Ireland will share with their families and relatives thankful remembrances of their influence, their examples, and their faith.

25 in resident nurseries, and eight were kept by the mother or a relative."

He would like to commend the work of the Protestant Adoption Society. Upwards of 200 adoption orders had been issued in the past three years. Many of these children came under the work of the Moral Welfare Society. In every case infinite care and pains had been taken to guard as far as possible the future happiness and safety of the child involved.

Minors Married.

"We must continue to press for the raising of the legal marriage age," said Canon Heavener. "The legal age here in the Republic is 12 for a girl and 14 for a boy, and because 16 is the marriage age in Northern Ireland and England, many young people come to the Republic to be married and many of us are deeply concerned about it."

In 1946, 14 female minors of under 16 years were married. Up to January of this year, the law did not require ages to be entered in the Marriage Register. It was necessary only to enter "full" or "minor." Therefore, it was impossible to give a complete record of ages and obviously exact figures about these "child-bride" marriages were very difficult to obtain. But to-day, the dates of birth of the contracting parties must be entered in the Register and, consequently, more definite information would be available in the future.

The anomaly under the Children's Act of 1941 was that a delinquent young person could be brought before the Juvenile Court in the Republic up to the age of 17 years, yet a girl could be married at 12 years. The legal age for consent for a girl under the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1955 was 17 years, yet she could be married at 12 years. These minimum age marriages always were tragic. Often they took place, he was sorry to say, because a girl in "trouble" was a nuisance in the home, and because the man involved wanted to escape a prison sentence, and so persuasion was used on both sides. Surely it was time that the law should be changed.

Canon Heavener referred to the increasing youth of those in difficulties, and said that when the facts were considered it might be asked if we were not failing these young people. The Statistical Abstract 1956 showed, that of the 2,000 juvenile offenders in the State in 1955, 807 were due to lack of parental control. There was the crux of very many of moral and social problems. Environment and upbringing were of paramount importance in every young person's life and the Christian moral standard of honour, integrity and self-control could best be fostered by parents in the home.—"Irish Times," 22/6/57.

"The Temere" Promises and Mixed Marriages.

In view of the present troubles and boycott at Fethard in Ireland, which have arisen from a mixed marriage the following article from "The Sentinel," Toronto may be of interest.

The Pre-Nuptial Pact.

The "Question and Answer" column in the "Toronto Daily Star" recently contained the following:

"Q. Is there any legal action that may be taken by the Roman Catholic Church or the Roman Catholic party to a marriage to enforce any or all of the solemn promises made by a non-Roman Catholic party, if they are not observed?

"A. Yes, if such solemn promises made in consideration of marriage are in writing they fulfil the requirements of the Statutes of Frauds. Action may be taken for breach of contract just as in any other contract."

This an important question and the answer given here, if correct, could have serious consequences. As it is we say it is challengeable to say the least, for it presupposes that the canon law of the Church of Rome is recognized in the Courts of Ontario. It may have authority in some courts of Quebec, but certainly not in the other provinces.

Frankly we have never heard of the Statutes of Frauds being brought in to prevent a recanting Protestant of a mixed marriage from insisting that the children be brought up in the Protestant faith, despite the pre-marital agreement the Roman Church has the couple sign. In this connection it must be remembered that the Roman Church's pact is often signed under duress by the Protestant in any case and if such a case has been decided by an Ontario judge on the basis of this Statute of Fraud we should like to hear of it.

To our knowledge any difference regarding the faith of children in a mixed marriage in courts outside Quebec, have usually been decided by the judges on the basis of the welfare of the children and not according to any pre-marriage agreement the Protestant partner may have signed. Besides, why should any court uphold an agreement that decides the faith of people yet unborn? We feel if any court did rule in the Roman Church's favour in a case of this kind it would be reversed on appeal.

It is pertinent to recall that the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa, Oct. 24, 1956, overruled the finding of a district court judge that the divorced Protestant wife of a Roman Catholic was in contempt of court when she refused to bring up her son, aged 8 years, as a Roman Catholic. An agreement to do this had been made with her former husband before she married him, and this was also stipulated in the divorce decree. According to the decree, the boy was to "be reared in the Roman Catholic religion" and his mother was hence faced with a charge of contempt in that she failed to obey a court order. There seemed to be nothing about "fraud" in the indictment.

The Iowa Supreme Court held that to punish the mother for failing to carry out her pre-nuptial agreement and the subsequent decree stipulation would be the equivalent of forcing her to violate her constitutional right to freedom of religion. The court quoted the late Justice Robert H. Jackson of the United States Supreme Court in a West Virginia case in which he said:

"If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion or other matters of opinion, or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein."

That seems to settle the question in the U.S.A. and the Iowa high court must be commended for its just ruling in this case. We feel that the courts of Canada, including the Supreme Court, would decide similarly in such a case for, as we say, it has always been held legally that the welfare of the children is the deciding factor. That being so, the pre-nuptial agreement should have no effect in law. Contracts of the kind demanded by the Roman hierarchy have no place in Canadian life and should be outlawed by any judicial body that has to consider them.

Irish Church Missions

Ireland for Christ. That is the vision of our workers. Nothing less.

Call us ambitious if you will. But the task before us is not self-imposed. The call is from God. We have no choice save to answer as did the Prophet of old: "Here am I, send me."

May we solicit your kind help, in this work of bringing the Gospel of Redeeming Love, in all its purity, to our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen.
